Baron, Charles R.
Barringer, Malcolm L.
Barry, Thomas M.
Barthelenghi, George H., Jr.
Bassett, Jerry S.
Bassett, Melvin S.
Bates, David H., Jr.
Bates, John A., Jr.
Bath, Alan H.
Bathurst, Robert B.
Bauchspies, Rollin L., Jr.
Baum, Joseph H.
Bayer, David A.
Beard, Donald W.
Beat, Robert O.
Beaulieu, Reo A.
Beaumont, Eugene A. G.
Becker, Glynn R.
Beers, Robert C.
Beeton, Harvey J.
Bekkedahl, Clifford L.
Bell, Clyde R.
Bell, Gershom R.
Bell, William R.
Benero, Manuel A., Jr.
Benner, Leslie W., Jr.
Bennett, Richard W.
Bennie, Donald B.
Bentley, William C.
Benton, Jerry S.
Bergbauer, Harry W., Jr.
Berge, Norman K.
Berglund, Lester W., Jr.
Berkley, Lawrence N.
Berry, Joel H., Jr.
Berry, William H.
Best, Eddie F.
Bird, Charles F.
Bird, Joseph W., Jr.
Bishop, Richard D.
Bivens, Arthur C.
Blackington, Richard N.
Blackmore, Thomas A.
Blackwood, Jack D.
Blanchard, Robert C.
Blandine, Robert E.
Block, Stanley H.
Blum, Frederick J., III
Blundell, Peverll
Boggs, Steve V.
Bohannan, William L.
Bolst, Albert L.
Bolster, Harry E.
Boncer, Lawrence
Booth, Roger G.
Booth, Theodore W.
Borthwick, Robert B.
Botula, Bernard C.
Bowen, John H., Jr.
Bowen, William S.
Bowers, Henry H.
Bowling, David H.
Bowman, Lawrence F.
Boyd, John H., Jr.
Boyer, Walton T., Jr.
Boyett, Stephen G.
Boyle, Darrell D.
Bozeman, Henry G.
Bradbury, John I.
Braden, Melvin E., Jr.
Brady, Francis T.
Brady, John H., Jr.
Breaux, Fred J., Jr.
Bridge, James A., Jr.
Bridges, Kenneth K.
Bristol, Robert B.
Britton, William L.
Brooks, Edwin H., Jr.
Brouillard, Donald C.
Brown, Cloyde I.
Brown, Donald N.
Brown, Harold
Brown, Jacob C.
Brown, James R.
Brown, Kenneth R.
Brown, Larry J.
Brown, Robert M.
Brown, Walter H., Jr.
Browning, Siras D.
Brownley, John H.
Bruce, George W., Jr.
Brummage, Richard L.
Bruning, Richard A.
Brunson, Wright "A", Jr.
Bucher, Lloyd M.
Bucy, John T., Jr.
Bull, Joseph L., III
Bullard, John R.
Bunnell, William P.
Burdon, Eugene R.
Burgess, James A.
Burke, William C.
Burley, John R.
Burriss, John R.
Burt, Thomas E.
Bush, James T.
Bushong, Brent
Butcher, Nathan T.
Butcher, Paul D.
Butler, Archie P., Jr.

Butler, Charles T.
Butrym, Stanley B., Jr.
Buys, Jay R.
Byrd, Sam R.
Byrnes, Robert E.
Cahill, Charles A.
Callicott, Jack D.
Cameron, Kenneth R.
Cameron, Norman A.
Campanella, Anton M.
Campbell, Edward L.
Campbell, George R.
Campbell, John A.
Campbell, James B.
Campbell, Jack
Campbell, William N.
Canfield, Gerald I.
Cann, Tedford J.
Cannell, Donald T.
Cannon, David E.
Cannon, Leo J.
Canon, George A., III
Cantacuzene, Rodion
Carelli, Francis L.
Carey, William R.
Carl, William T.
Carlin, Robert J.
Carlson, Olof M., Jr.
Carlson, Ronald F.
Carnevale, Angelo M.
Caron, Robert R.
Carosia, Joseph J.
Carr, John H.
Carr, Nevin P
Carrington, James H., Jr.
Carroll, William E.
Carson, Ernest H.
Carson, Ralph
Carter, James D.
Carter, Robert D.
Carterette, Robert T.
Cash, Eugene J.
Cashman, Michael, II
Cassell, Dean G.
Cassen, John S., Jr.
Cassidy, Thomas J., Jr.
Causey, Donald F.
Cave, Thomas H.
Chadwick, John K.
Champlin, Gerald B.
Chapman, Frederick L.
Charest, Philip G.
Chase, Edgar M.
Chase, Warren A.
Chesley, James F.
Chewning, Robert W.
Christensen, Eugene J.
Christensen, Raymond J.
Christon, Paul W.
Clark, Charles R.
Clark, David P.
Clark, Donald E.
Clark, Richard G.
Clark, Stanley D.
Clarkin, James J.
Clements, Billy R.
Clew, William M.
Clingenpeel, William A.
Cloughley, William D.
Coe, David C., Jr.
Cole, Edgar E.
Cole, William S., Jr.
Coleman, James O.
Collier, Larry D.
Colligan, Thomas R.
Collins, Philip K.
Combs, Martin F.
Comey, Robert W.
Conn, Lannie, Jr.
Conolly, Robert D.
Conrad, Charles, Jr.
Conrad, Peter C.
Converse, Douglas
Coogan, Richard D.
Cook, Charles L.
Cook, William H.
Cooke, Donald L.
Cooley, Arthur W.
Cooper, Robert G.
Cooper, Tommy G.
Corbett, Eugene A.
Corbin, Malcolm R., Jr.
Cormier, Conrad R.
Cornell, Arthur F.
Coscina, Michael A., Jr.
Coskey, Kenneth L.
Coston, Stanford W., Jr.
Cottrell, Walter N.
Cotugno, Paul J.
Coughlin, Eugene F.
Coughlin, Paul G.
Cour, Edward E.
Crader, Clifford L.
Craig, Earl C.
Crain, James D.
Crater, Ray F.
Craven, Robert C. E.
Crawford, Nace B., Jr.
Crepeau, George A.
Cricchi, John V.
Crinklaw, Douglas L.
Cronin, Francis W.
Crosby, Charles A.
Cross, Charles H.
Cruden, David S.
Cuccias, Leo P.
Cunningham, Edward F.
Curl, Kent W.
Curran, Robert W.
Curry, Thomas E.
Dally, David F.
Dalton, Charles W.
Dalton, Richard V.
Daly, Harry P., Jr.
Daly, Richard G.
Damian, John L.
Daniels, James M.
Daniels, Verlyne W.
D'Arville, Edmond J.
Davidson, Charles H.
Davidson, Christie H.
Davidson, David D.
Davis, Bill N.
Davis, Frank E.
Davis, Henry J., Jr.
Davis, John B.
Davis, Michael C.
Davis, Noble J., Jr.
Davison, John W., Jr.
Day, Arthur R.
Deal, Walter C., Jr.
De Hart, William
Delaney, William E.
DeMaris, Darryl A.
De Martini, Edward J.
Denman, Charles C., Jr.
Denton, David N.
Derr, John P.
DeTonnancourt, Arthur E.
Devereaux, John R., Jr.
Dick, Joseph L.
Dickman, Jerry A.
Diesel, Charles N.
Dietz, Richard J.
Di Giacomo, Joseph G.
Dillingham, Paul W., Jr.
Dillon, Harlan K.
Dimon, Charles G., Jr.
Di Nola, Michael J.
Divelbiss, Dallas R.
Dixon, Edward R.
Dobyns, John E.
Dodds, Robert M.
Doelling, Robert D.
Dolan, William R.
Donaldson, Robert S.
Donaldson, Robert J.
Donnelly, Raymond D., Jr.
Donnelly, Robert G.
Donovan, James F.
Doroshuk, John, Jr.
Dotson, Gene E.
Douglas, Jack R.
Douglas, James G., Jr.
Dowe, Robert M., Jr.
Dowe, William J., Jr.
Dowse, Herbert B., Jr.
Doyle, William J.
Drago, Anthony J., Jr.
Drain, John F.
Drew, Russell C.
Drummond, Scott E., Jr.
Dubino, Andrew D.
Dubois, Roland H.
Duckering, Donald W.
Duckett, Philip VanH. L.
Dudley, Paul L., Jr.
Duffy, Joseph A., Jr.
Duhrkoph, Don J.
Duke, Marshal D., Jr.
Dunaway, John A., Jr.
Dunbar, Vance O.
Duncan, Dale W.
Dunkin, Ray L.
Dunlop, Thomas E.
Durbin, Peter
Eberhart, Robert S.
Eckhouse, Morton A.
Eddleman, Gilbert H.
Eddy, Denver D.
Eddy, William P., III
Edwards, Forrest L.
Edwards, Jerry J.
Edwards, William R., Jr.
Eibert, Don C.
Ellis, David E.
Ellis, George D., Jr.
Ellison, John C.
Elster, James M.
Emerson, Jesse R., III
Engel, Francis J., III
Engelbrecht, Richard H.
English, Francis W., Jr.
Erwin, Donald E.
Evans, David W.
Evans, George J.
Evans, Thomas B.
Everist, Philip W.
Ezzell, Leon J.
Falconer, Alastair S.
Fall, David R., Jr.
Farber, Karl H.
Farnham, Charles G.
Fawcett, Craig R.
Fead, Louis McP.
Feeks, Edmond M.
Fehl, Frederick C., Jr.
Feller, Donald L.
Fellingham, Robert W.
Fellowes, Frederick G., Jr.
Fellows, Charles D.
Felt, Donald L.
Felt, Joseph A.
Feltham, John C., Jr.
Fenn, Dan E.
Ferguson, Andrew C.
Ferguson, William W.
Fergusson, Ernest W.
Fernandes, James E.
Ferrell, Dewitt T., Jr.
Fette, Estal J.
Field, Harford, Jr.
Filkins, William C.
Finneran, William J.
Finney, Jack L.
Fischbein, Ernest
Fischer, David H.
Fischer, Edward J.
Fisher, John C.
Fisher, Russell H.
Fisher, William G., Jr.
Fitzgerald, Thomas W., Jr.
Fleeson, Richard J.
Fleischmann, William H., Jr.
Fleming, Raymond T., Jr.
Fletcher, Richard M.
Florance, John E., Jr.
Fong, Chong S.
Font, Carlos G.
Fonville, Henry P.
Fossum, Paul G.
Fox, Charles W., Jr.
Fox, Richard V.
Frank, Benjamin L.
Fraser, George K., Jr.
Fraser, Robert "E"
Frederick, Donald R. A.
Freeman, Linus W., Jr.
Freeman, Robert W.
French, Fred H.
French, William L.
Frick, Joseph F.
Friedel, Gordon W.
Frier, John M., Jr.
Friese, George A.
Friesen, Floyd A.
Frost, John F., III
Fudge, David A.
Furey, Laurence T.
Furgerson, John A.
Furmanski, John A.
Gall, Daune M.
Gallagher, Hugh L.
Gallagher, Robert S.
Gallipeau, Richard W.
Gallup, Shelley P.
Galvin, Bernard J.
Gantt, Richard G.
Garcia, William V.
Gardner, Kenneth R.
Gardner, Louis J.
Garner, Pat M.
Garnett, Walter W.
Garrett, Bernard D.
Garrett, John E.
Gatewood, Tommy L.
Gavazzi, Robert R.
Gennette, Robert L.
George, Charles A., Jr.
Gibbs, Charles E., Jr.
Gildea, Joseph A.
Giles, Thomas N.
Gillette, Halbert G.
Gilmore, Arthur H.
Giovanetti, William C.
Glaves, Robert H.
Glazier, Alvin S.
Gleim, Ernest H.
Godek, John
Golde, Morton
Goldner, Robert R.
Goldsmith, Watson W.
Goldstein, Jonas L.
Good, Ronald P.
Gooden, Richard O.
Goodfellow, John
Goodman, Kelsey B.
Goodrich, John R.
Goodwin, Frank O., Jr.
Goodwin, William D.
Gordon, Richard F., Jr.
Gowing, Richard M.
Gradel, Robert
Graf, Frederic A., Jr.
Graffam, Earl H.
Graveson, George L., Jr.
Greeley, Michael T.
Green, Harry J.
Green, Thomas B.
Greer, Wayne C.
Gregory, George B.
Gress, Donald H.
Grier, Robert W., Jr.
Griffith, Philip G.
Griffith, Webster
Griggs, Norman E.
Groder, Robert E.
Groff, Peter F.
Grogan, Lee R.
Gross, Arthur J.
Gross, Ralph, Jr.
Gunn, William J.
Gunning, Patrick J.
Gurnsey, Ronald A.
Hackney, Benjamin F., III
Haggquist, Grant F., Jr.
Hahn, Frederick, Jr.
Haig, Robert B.
Hall, Donald F.
Hall, John P.
Hall, William C.
Halsey, Charles H., Jr.
Halverson, Richard K.
Hamel, James K.
Hamilton, Glenn D.
Hamilton, LeRoy A.
Hamm, Clement D., Jr.
Hammock, John W.
Hamrick, Thomas D.
Handford, Richard C.
Hangartner, Lyle G.
Hannegan, Frank N.
Hannula, Brian K.
Hansard, Stonewall
Hansell, Emerson L., Jr.
Hansen, Norman T.
Hansen, Robert F.
Hansen, Rodney V.
Hanson, Albertlea
Hare, Charles W.
Harney, Russell F.
Harns, John H.
Harper, William W.
Harris, James W.
Harris, James W.
Harris, Richard A.
Harrop, Robert D.
Hart, John R.
Harter, Raymond B.
Hartley, John D.
Harwood, John B.
Harwood, Lewis D.
Hatch, Harold G.
Hatcher, Robert E., Jr.
Hatcher, William K.
Havens, Stanley L.
Haverty, Alvin D.
Havird, Lloyd B.
Hawk, Arthur L.
Hawkins, Richard McK.
Hayes, Albert M., Jr.
Hayes, Jerome B.
Hays, Estel W.
Head, William N.
Headland, Carl B.
Headley, Allen B.
Headrick, Billy J.
Heasley, Waldo L.
Heath, Frederick T.
Hebbard, LeRoy B., Jr.
Hedberg, Arthur J., Jr.
Heise, Paul R.
Helgemoe, Raymond A.
Helgeson, Harry E., Jr.
Helms, Harlie B., Jr.
Henderson, Charles G.
Henderson, Nathan S., Jr.
Hendrick, David R.
Hennessey, Aloysius G., Jr.
Henry, Lee L.
Henson, John M.
Herkner, Richard T.
Hertwig, William G.
Hetu, Herbert E.
Hickman, William J.
Higginbotham, Allen B.
Higgins, Hugh W.
Higgins, Raymond F.
Higgins, Thomas G.
Hill, Charles D.
Hill, Frank W.
Hill, Lucio W.
Hill, Marshall E.
Hilz, Harold J.
Hiniker, Peter J., Jr.
Hinman, Albert H.
Hipp, Ronald N., Jr.
Hoare, Haydn F.
Hobgood, Ray A.
Hoch, John E., Jr.
Hodges, George P., Jr.
Hodson, Theodore L., Jr.
Hoffman, Robert B.
Hogan, Walter V.
Hoge, James H.
Holbert, William H., Jr.
Holcomb, Gordon B.
Holcomb, "M" Staser
Holland, James N.
Hollenbach, William T.
Holt, Ivey B., Jr.
Holt, John J.
Holway, Nathan C.
Hope, Edgar G., Jr.
Horton, Edward R.
Hostettler, Stephen J.
House, Edward C.
Houser, Richard M.
Houston, Albert W.
Howard, Albert W., Jr.
Howey, Robert E.
Hoye, James M., II
Hozey, Ira D., Jr.
Hubal, Augustine E., Jr.
Hubbard, Samuel W., Jr.
Hubbell, Walter B.
Huffman, Malcolm L.
Hughes, Kenneth P.
Hukill, Henry D., Jr.
Hull-Ryde, Donald
Humber, Marcel B.
Humphreys, Felton "M", Jr.
Hunter, Herbert P.
Hurd, John B.
Hurley, Robert J.
Hyde, Robert A.
Ingraham, Talcott L., Jr.
Inman, Wayne D.
Isaacks, Marion H.
Jacobs, Edward J.
Jacobs, Edward J., Jr.
James, Joe M.
Jaycox, Randall E., Jr.
Jaynes, Jack K.
Jefferies, Allen S.
Jenkins, Folsom
Jenkins, James R., Jr.
Jeter, Norman L., Jr.
John, Robert P.
Johns, Arthur J.
Johnson, Arne C.
Johnson, Clifford D.
Johnson, Clarence A. E., Jr.
Johnson, Eldon D.
Johnson, Emil L.
Johnson, George M.
Johnson, Oren D.
Johnson, Theodore F.
Johnson, William R.
Johnston, George T.
Johnston, John M.
Johnston, James I.
Jones, Alfred L., Jr.
Jones, Arthur L., Jr.
Jones, Donald W.
Jones, Donald S.
Jones, Henry R.
Jones, Thomas W., Jr.
Jordan, James S.
Joy, Bernard I.
Kaai, Samuel W.
Kallaus, Richard L.

Kane, Paul E.
Karcher, Robert K.
Karpaitis, Anthony J.
Kassel, Robert H.
Kattmann, Roger H.
Kauderer, Bernard M.
Keefe, Thomas J., Jr.
Keenan, Richard L.
Kehoe, Thomas R.
Keimig, Allen D., Jr.
Kelley, Alfred G., Jr.
Kelley, Roy A.
Kelly, James F.
Kelly, John S.
Kelt, William N.
Kendrick, William O.
Kennedy, William B.
Kennedy, William E.
Ketzner, Harry T.
Kidd, Vernon G.
Kiewel, Frank W., Jr.
Kilduff, Paul E.
Killian, Donald J.
Kimzey, Walter F.
King, Everett D.
King, John E., Jr.
King, Wilbert A.
Kinsley, Harry W., Jr.
Kirksey, Robert E.
Klee, Robert E.
Kleeman, Leonard
Kling, William T.
Knight, Charles H.
Knight, Robert H.
Knipp, Walter J.
Kniss, Donovan E.
Knoerr, Don H.
Koch, Donald F.
Koenig, Edgar F.
Kohler, Walter, Jr.
Kratz, Marshall L.
Kretzschmann, Curt H.
Krochmal, Alfred F.
Kruse, Charles T., Jr.
Krusi, Peter H.
Kucyk, Peter M.
Kuffel, Robert W.
Kugler, Kenneth D.
Kunstmann, Clarence M.
Kutzleb, Robert E.
Labeau, Thomas J.
Lafferty, Jerry D.
Lage, Robert L.
Laib, Ernest E., Jr.
Lake, Walter W.
Lamb, Marion G.
Lamm, William A.
Landersman, Stuart D.
Lane, Archie G.
Lane, Terry L.
Lang, James M.
Langford, John McC.
Langstron, John L.
Lardis, Christopher S.
Larson, Howard J.
Lashbrook, Durwood E.
Latham, William B.
Latta, Robert L.
Laube, Clarence E.
Lauber, Ronald M.
Laughlin, Gerald F., Jr.
Laux, William J., Jr.
Lavender, Robert E.
Lavin, Charles V.
Lawler, William A.
Lawrence, Donald S.
Leavitt, Horace M., Jr.
LeBlanc, Georges E., Jr.
Lenahan, Robert P.
Lent, Willis A., Jr.
Leonard, Robert W.
Levenson, Lee E.
Levey, Sanford N.
Lewis, Harold M. J., Jr.
Lewis, Robert
Limerick, Christopher J., Jr.
Lindsay, Robert B.
Lipford, Charles E.
Litwin, William S.
Lloyd, Theodore L., Jr.
Locke, Barrie B.
Lodge, Billups E.
Loftus, Robert McN.
Logan, Joseph B.
Lohr, Chester H.
Longman, Richard D.
Lorden, Lawrence R.
Lorge, Eugene P.
Low, Frederick M.
Ludwig, George E.
Luthin, Richard B.
Lykes, William F. G.
Lyman, John S., Jr.
Lynch, William A.
Lynn, Robert E.
Lyon, Peter W.
Lyons, James A., Jr.
Lyons, Thomas W., Jr.
MacGregor, John
Mack, Chester M.
MacKenzie, William W., Jr.
MacKinnon, James C., III
Mahony, Wilbur J.
Malaney, Robert E.
Malone, John S.
Malone, Thomas L., Jr.
Maloney, Peter M.
Mandel, Cornelius E., Jr.
Manduca, Theodore W.
Mangin, Joseph N., III
Mann, Horace D., Jr.
Mann, James D.
Markham, Lewis M., III
Marsh, William C.
Marshall, John C.
Martin, Alan F.
Martin, Charles W., Jr.
Martin, Donald E.
Martin, James K.
Martin, Robert C.
Mason, Wesley R.
Masse, Donald M.
Matais, George R.
Matheson, Eugene C.
Mathews, Bobby D.
Mathews, Donald W.
Mathews, Thomas H.
Matthews, William B., Jr.
Mattson, Donald J.
Mauldin, Richard A.
Maxim, Rodney E.
Maxwell, Philip H.
Mayberry, Thomas A., Jr.
Mays, Clayton P.
McAlevy, John H.
McBrayer, John E., Jr.
McCafferty, William E.
McCall, John M.
McCanna, Marvin G., Jr.
McCardell, James E., Jr.
McCarthy, Eugene W.
McCarty, Charles M.
McCarty, Richard W.
McCausland, Robert G.
McClain, Joseph E.
McComb, Robert B.
McConnell, Donald L.
McConnell, Giley R., Jr.
McCormack, William E.
McCormick, Daniel G. III
McCoy, Roy E.
McDaniel, Johnny B.
McDonald, Raymond T.
McDowell, Russell N.
McGathy, Charles L., Jr.
McGovern, Joseph J.
McGrath, William D.
McGreevy, Walter J., Jr.
McHugh, James J.
McKay, John H.
McKee, Jack V.
McKenna, Patrick
McKeown, William G., Jr.
McLaird, Preston, Jr.
McLaughlin, Bernard R.
McLuckie, James D.
McMurtray, Robert A., Jr.
McNaughton, James M.
McNett, William T.
McPadden, Donald F. X.
McQuesten, John T., Jr.
McVay, Donald H., Jr.
McWaters, William A., Jr.
McWilliam, John R.
Mead, George R.
Melchers, Arthur C.
Melton, Edward C., Jr.
Meredith, Stuart T.
Merget, Andrew G.
Merwin, Paul L.
Metzler, Donald M.
Meyer, William C., Jr.
Mhoon, John E.
Miale, Robert E.
Middleton, Charles O. III
Milano, Vito R.
Miller, Blount R., Jr.
Miller, Clarence W.
Miller, Curtis W., Jr.
Miller, Evan K.
Miller, Floyd H., Jr.
Miller, James H., Jr.
Miller, John R.
Miller, Joseph J., Jr.
Miller, Richard J.
Miller, Robert L.
Mills, James R.
Miner, Jack B.
Mircheff, Robert A.
Mitchell, Allan R.
Mitchell, Edgar D.
Mitchell, Grant L.
Mitchell, Howard C.
Mitchell, Robert C.
Mock, Roy L.
Moncure, Edwin C., Jr.
Monroe, Edward H., Jr.
Monroe, William D., III
Moonan, Raymond L.
Mooney, John B., Jr.
Moore, Carlton H., Jr.
Moore, Charles E.
Moore, Clarence E.
Moore, Joseph O.
Moore, Raphael B.
Moore, Rufus J.
Moran, Clifford D.
Moreau, Arthur S., Jr.
Morford, Dean R.
Morgan, Houston M.
Morgan, Joseph R.
Morgan, Leroy W., Jr.
Morin, Ronald D.
Morris, Robert E.
Morse, Edward A.
Morton, Charles B., III
Moss, Daniel J.
Moury, Roger F.
Muench, Gerald W.
Muka, Joseph A., Jr.
Mulcahy, William J., Jr.
Mulloy, Paul J.
Mumford, Charles E.
Murdoch, Alan G.
Murnane, Frederick C.
Murphy, Elbridge F., Jr.
Murray, Joseph E., Jr.
Musorrafiti, Francesco A.
Myers, Coleman E.
Mylander, Stig J.
Naschek, Marvin J.
Nason, Charles F., Jr.
Neill, Louis D., Jr.
Nelson, George E., Jr.
Nelson, Herbert F.
Nelson, James McC.
Nelson, Keith
Nelson, Leroy C.
Nelson, Teddy N.
Nesbitt, Harry J.
Nevarez, Antonio
Newcomb, James A.
Newman, Robert L.
Nichols, John F.
Nichols, Richard L.
Nicholson, John L., Jr.
Nielsen, Donald E.
Nielsen, Richard
Nokes, Neil M.
Nomady, Verne G.
Norby, Merlin R.
Nordmeyer, Philip J.
Nordtvedt, Ernest R.
North, Dean B.
Numbers, Earl W.
Nunnally, Edward H., Jr.
Nystrom, Frederic L.
O'Brien, Terrence P.
O'Bryan, Michael E.
O'Connell, John D.
O'Connor, Joseph E.
O'Der, John T.
Ogle, William J.
O'Hara, John T.
O'Keefe, James L., Jr.
Olson, Conrad B.
Olson, John R.
Olson, Richard S.
O'Neil, Louis C.
O'Reilly, Charles W.
Orell, Quinlan R.
O'Rourke, Bernard J.
Ortega, Joseph J.
Osborne, Arthur M.
Oster, John S.
Owens, Robert M.
Padgett, Harry E.
Painter, George V.
Pajak, Michael M.
Palmieri, John J.
Paolucci, Donald C.
Paris, Thomas A.
Parker, Thomas C., Jr.
Parks, Joe
Parr, Donald R.
Passantino, Sebastian P.
Pattee, Arthur W.
Pattridge, Roger H.
Paul, David L.
Paul, John E.
Paulk, John E.
Pearlman, Samuel S.
Peckworth, Dana
Pedersen, Alton A.
Perkins, Joseph "A", Jr.
Perkins, Richard L.
Perrault, Mark E.
Perrey, Philip L.
Perry, Lowell E.
Perry, Robert P.
Person, Ross H.
Personette, Alan J.
Pertel, Joseph A.
Peters, William J.
Petersen, Edwin J., Jr.
Petersen, Fred D.
Peterson, George E., Jr.
Peterson, John W.
Peterson, Richard N.
Petry, William A.
Pfromer, Robert A.
Phillips, Charles A.
Phillips, John T.
Phillips, Lawrence, Jr.
Phillips, Walter M., Jr.
Pickett, Gordon D.
Pitkin, Ronald E.
Pitts, Paul D.
Place, Allan J.
Platt, Grafton S.
Platt, Ralph E.
Ploss, John H.
Podaras, Nicholas C.
Pohli, Richard R.
Poland, James B.
Poling, William E.
Pollum, Edgar W.
Poor, Robert A.
Pope, Daniel K., IV
Pope, James F.
Porter, David N.
Porter, Robert D.
Porterfield, Robert E.
Potter, Arthur M., Jr.
Powell, George W.
Prentiss, Dickinson
Preston, Edgar H.
Price, Oliver L.
Price, Walter P.
Prickett, Bruce L.
Priddy, Clarence L., Jr.
Pritscher, Robert L.
Profilet, Clarence J.
Pugh, Jack M.
Purdum, William H.
Purvis, Ronald S.
Quartararo, Michael A.
Quick, Jaye E.
Quirk, William J.
Radeff, Lewis J.
Raffaele, Robert J.
Ralph, Steve, Jr.
Ramsey, William E.
Randall, Howard W.
Randall, Howard F., Jr.
Rasmussen, Robert L.
Ratcliff, Stephen D.
Ray, Glen P.
Rayder, Daniel F.
Read, Carlyle D., Jr.
Reddick, Robert E., Jr.
Reed, Charles A.
Reed, Robert G.
Reeg, Frederick J.
Reffitt, Raymond E.
Reger, William L.
Reilly, William F.
Reischauer, Robert E.
Reith, George, Jr.
Renz, Donald J.
Reynolds, James H.
Reynolds, Robert F., Jr.
Rhodes, John P.
Rhodes, Randolph L.
Rice, Daniel W.
Rice, Stanley G.
Rich, Richard
Richards, Lloyd W.
Richardson, Harold M.
Riley, Raymond T.
Ritz, Merlin C.
Roach, Francis L.
Robbins, Noel
Roberson, George D.
Robertson, Coll E.
Robinson, Kirby L.
Robinson, Percy E., Jr.
Robinson, William A.
Rodgers, Dean T.
Rodgers, Harvey P.
Rodgers, James B.
Rodgers, James R.
Rodgers, Thomas A.
Roepke, John R.
Rogers, Charles E., Jr.
Rogers, Ralph E.
Rorie, "C" "J"
Rose, Hardy N.
Ross, Orrin B.
Rosson, James W.
Rowan, Thomas C.
Rubb, Milton R.
Ruch, Martin, Jr.
Rudolph, Francis A., Jr.
Ruhsenberger, Roger H.
Rumplik, Rudolph H.
Rusch, John M.
Russ, William A.
Russell, John J., Jr.
Ryan, James A., Jr.
Ryan, William A.
Sacks, Harold H.
Sanden, Oscar E., Jr.
Sanders, Ben T.
Sanford, Stephen J.
Sanks, David R., III
Sapp, John, Jr.
Sargent, Richard E.
Saucier, Gerald Saunders, Thomas J.
Sawyer, George A., Jr.
Sayer, William D.
Schaaf, Thomas W.
Schaefer, Gene R.
Schaub, John R., Jr.
Schermerhorn, James R.
Schimansky, John A.
Schroeder, Robert E.
Schulte, Jean H.
Schuster, Dale G.
Schutz, Albert C., Jr.
Schwartz, Wallace J.
Schweitzer, Robert J.
Scott, Edward T.
Scott, Frank P.
Scott, Kenneth M.
Scully, John J.
Sebring, Leland H.
Seeba, Herman A.
Seitz, Richard L.
Self, David L.
Semple, William C., III
Sesow, Anthony D.
Seymour, Conrad L.
Seymour, Ernest R.
Shafer, William J. E.
Shakespeare, Franklin B.
Shappell, John R.
Sharrah, Ronald L.
Shaw, John H.
Shaw, Warren L.
Shay, Fred L.
Sheehy, Eugene E.
Sheeley, Elmer E., Jr.
Sheets, Jean P.
Sheets, Roger E.
Shelley, Leon R.
Shepherd, David C.
Sherman, John W.
Shilling, John D.
Shine, Maurice J.
Shirley, William B.
Shrewsbury, Lawrence H., II
Shuler, Ashley C., Jr.

Shuler, Olin J.
Signor, Philip W., Jr.
Sillars, Donald G.
Sima, Frederick F., Jr.
Simmons, Arlis J.
Simmons, Clayton M.
Simms, James T.
Simon, Douglas M.
Simpkins, George C.
Simpson, Bryan L., Jr.
Siska, Edward
Skerrett, Robert J.
Skolnick, Alfred
Skomsky, Louis J.
Skubinna, Myron A.
Slater, Donald L.
Slyfield, Frederick J.
Small, Joseph F.
Smevog, Herbert W.
Smith, Alfred A.
Smith, Delvin W., Jr.
Smith, Frederick D., Jr.
Smith, James H.
Smith, Jason J.
Smith, John P.
Smith, Joseph C.
Smith, Morgan H.
Smith, Paul J., Jr.
Smith, Robert M.
Smith, Thomas J.
Smith, William L.
Smith, William L.
Snively, Abram B., III
Snouse, William H.
Snuffin, Jerry A.
Snyder, Aaron W. S.
Snyder, Fred D.
Snyder, Ned "C"
Solan, Thomas V.
Sothan, Norman L.
Southerland, Thomas C., Jr.
Spanagel, Herman A., Jr.
Spar, Edwin F.
Spaulding, Robert E.
Spear, Willard W., Jr.
Spencer, Harry A., Jr.
Spradley, Van E.
Squier, Lucius R., Jr.
Stafford, Kenneth B.
Stallings, Clyde, Jr.
Stanard, John D., Jr.
Stanley, Edward E.
Stanley, Joseph K.
Stanley, Thomas A.
Stark, Arthur R., Jr.
Stark, Gerry L.
Stark, Peter A., Jr.
Stevens, Jack D.
Stewart, Douglas A.
Stocking, William B.
Stolle, Edward St. C., Jr.
Stone, James M.
Storm, Richard E.
Story, Warren L.
Strasheim, Don N.
Strawn, James H.
Stromme, Donald J.
Strong, Dean L.
Struven, Robert L.
Studebaker, Clayton A.
Sturgeon, William J., III
Sudduth, Roger M.
Sullivan, Joseph E., Jr.
Sullivan, Patrick G.
Sullivan, Thomas J.
Sullivan, Walter F.
Sullivan, William W.
Sutherland, Doyle L.
Swarztrauber, Sayre A.
Sweeney, John F.
Sweet, William J.
Sykes, Lewis B.
Talbot, Frank R., Jr.
Talbot, James R., Jr.
Tally, Billy F.
Tappan, Jeremy R.
Tarlton, Joe E.
Tarpley, William A.
Taylor, Edmund B., Jr.
Taylor, Reeves R.
Taylor, Richard F.
Taylor, Thomas H.
Tennyson, Richard B.
Terry, Daniel G. W.
Thole, Charles P.
Thomas, Donald P.
Thomas, Don W.
Thomas, Douglas N.
Thomas, Earl G.
Thomas, Frederic J.
Thompson, Arthur R., Jr.
Thompson, Clifford E.
Thompson, George I.
Thompson, Jack C., Jr.
Thonneson, Earling R.
Throop, James R.
Todd, Alexander M.
Toland, Hugh J. C., Jr.
Tortora, Anthony M.
Trammell, Webb D.
Traweek, Billy B.
Treber, Gerald R.
Trebor-MacConnell, Barrie K.
Trost, Carlisle A. H.
Trowbridge, Vern H.
Truax, Evan C.
Trueblood, William E.
Turk, Herman L.
Tuttle, John R.
Umberger, Robert C.
Upshaw, Donald E.
Usilton, William B.
Vaden, Donald E.
Vahlkamp, Eugene W.
Van Hoof, Eugene R.
Van Horssen, David A.
Van Houton, Laurence P.
Van Valkenburg, George B.
Van Westendorp, Steven Varner, Duane L.
Varney, Jack E.
Vaughan, Edgar, III
Velazquez-Suarez, Francisco A.
Vernon, Everett L.
Volatile, Thomas M.
Vosseller, John H.
Voyer, Irving L., Jr.
Wachtel, Joseph J.
Wade, Thomas R.
Wagner, David F.
Waite, Charles E.
Wakeman, Curtiss O.
Walker, Harold E., Jr.
Walker, Henry McD.
Walker, Peter R.
Wall, Joseph E.
Wallace, Thomas McC.
Walling, Eugene K.
Wallner, Michael P.
Walls, Richard B.
Walters, James B.
Wanamaker, John F.
Ward, Conley R.
Ward, Gene P.
Ward, Robert B.
Warren, Thomas C.
Warthen, Donald Wasson, John E.
Watson, Max H.
Watson, Wyatt P.
Weaver, James J.
Weaver, John H.
Webb, James I.
Webster, James McA.
Weddington, George L., Jr.
Weedon, Robert E.
Weeks, Alan L.
Weeks, George H.
Weeks, Wayne F.
Wehrman, Philip W.
Weissman, Marvin M.
Wellings, John F.
Wellman, Harold N.
Wells, Don V.
Wells, Eugene R., Jr.
Wells, Walter H., Jr.
Wenker, William A.
West, Gordon R.
Westmoreland, Ralph M.
Wetz, James E.
Wev, Bosquet N., Jr.
Wheeler, James B.
Wheeler, John R.
Whiddon, Elmer C., Jr.
Whitcomb, Richard A.
White, Charles E.
White, Donald C.
White, John E.
White, Richard E.
Whittaker, Don J.
Whittier, James F.
Wilder, William E.
Will, Otto W.
Willenbrink, James F.
Willever, Edward L.
Willhauck, Marion
Willhauck, Aarion
Williams, Clyde V., Jr.
Williams, David W.
Williams, James G., III
Williams, Kenneth A.
Williams, Louis A., Jr.
Williams, Randall L.
Williams, Ralph T.
Williams, Ralph E., Jr.
Williams, Wallace E.
Williamson, Paul W.
Williamson, Robert L.
Willis, Jack R.
Wills, Doyne R., Jr.
Wilner, Jack D.
Wilson, Jack L.
Wilson, Richard V., Jr.
Wilson, Robert W., Jr.
Wilson, Samuel B.
Wilson, Vaughn E., Jr.
Winfield, Gordon T., Jr.
Winfree, Herman D., Jr.
Winkler, Thomas Q., Jr.
Wise, Peyton R., II
Witcher, John R.
Withrow, John E., Jr.
Wolf, James D.
Wolff, William F.
Wolke, Victor B. C.
Wood, Edgar K., Jr.
Wood, John P.
Woodall, Franklin T., Jr.
Woodberry, Earle B.
Woodburn, Craig E.
Woods, Paul G.
Woods, Robert C.
Woodyard, Jon C.
Worth, Edward R.
Wright, Charles H., Jr.
Wright, James D.
Wright, Kenneth L., Jr.
Wright, Richard T.
Wright, William W.
Wunsch, John R.
Wyatt, Charles M.
Wynn, Carl E., Jr.
Yanaros, John O.
Yeager, Donald R.
Yoder, Dwane F.
Young, Alfred A., III
Young, David B., Jr.
Young, Joseph A.
Youngjohns, Richard P.
Youse, James A.
Zastrow, Robert R.
Zebrowski, Joseph P.
Zeithaml, Donald P.
Zemaitis, Robert J.
Zirkle, Forrest E.
Zirps, Christos

LIEUTENANT, MEDICAL CORPS

Alleman, Howard
Anctil, Arthur O., Jr.
Anderson, Robert F.
Anderson, Daniel G.
Applegate, William V.
Arness, John A.
Baird, Robert M.
Baker, John H.
Baker, Robert F.
Baker, William J.
Balas, George I.
Balster, Vernon H.
Barker, Dell J.
Bason, William M.
Beach, Thomas B.
Beaumier, John H.
Beddo, Byron L.
Beeby, James L.
Benoit, Fred L., III
Bergee, Harold E.
Betts, Gordon D.
Biemer, James J.
Biser, Christopher H.
Borin, Robert S.
Boucher, Wesley W.
Bouterie, Ronald L.
Boylan, Charles E.
Brighton, Carl T.
Brooks, Herbert E.
Bryan, Frank S.
Burr, John B.
Cagle, Donald R.
Cameron, Ronald R.
Cassidy, Walter J., Jr.
Chappelka, Alfred R., Jr.
Christian, Maynard S.
Coil, Edmonston F.
Colgrove, Robert C.
Collentine, Marvin E.
Collier, Terry M.
Corbett, John R.
Cosgrove, Theodore J.
Cremona, Frederick J.
Cureton, Richard K.
Daum, Jere J.
Davis, John W.
DeCaprio, Vincent H.
Defiebre, Bruce K., Jr.
DeFries, Hugh O.
Dewey, Albert W., Jr.
Doland, Kenneth D.
Dolan, Michael F.
Douglass, William C.
Elliott, Robert C.
Evans, Eldon L.
Evans, Fred S.
Ferre, George A.
Finch, John R.
Finney, Louis A.
Fisher, Elbert L., Jr.
Fithian, William W., Jr.
Folkner, Albert L.
Fortenberry, Ralph M.
Gallent, James H.
Garcia, Nicolas A. III
Giard, Henry L.
Gilbert, Allyn E.
Gillespie, James T., Sr.
Glover, James B.
Gramlich, Edwin P.
Greaves, Edward D.
Greene, Donald H.
Hamilton, Thomas P.
Hansen, James E.
Hargrave, Robert L.
Harmon, Stanley D.
Harper, Charles R.
Hayes, Jude R.
Hebert, James E.
Hillis, Jon K.
Huseby, Helmer W. S.
Irons, Howard S.
Jacobs, Edmund P.
James, Stephen H.
Kendra, Stephen J.
Kent, Tommy S.
Kinkel, Donald M.
Klingle, Francis L.
Knapp, Robert W.
Knox, Henry D.
Kohl, David H.
Koller, Elmer C., Jr.
Krepps, Arthur C., II
Kuehn, John L.
Langevin, Jack A.
Lansinger, Donald T.
Larocque, Normand P.
Larson, Willard A. E.
Lee, Joseph D.
Livingston, William O.
Loew, Albert G., Jr.
Lukash, William M.
MacCarthy, Denton E.
Madison, Gilbert I., Jr.
McHale, James J., Jr.
McMahon, George J.
Meehan, William L.
Menzel, Richard E.
Meredith, Robert C.
Merrill, Raymond E.
Metz, George E.
Miles, Donald R.
Millington, Richard A.
Milner, Johnny E.
Mitts, Murray G.
Modell, Jerome H.
Moquin, Ross B.
Morgan, Jacob R.
Mortensen, Norval
Mukomela, Arthur E.
Nelson, George A., Jr.
Nickel, Alvin L.
Norton, Robert K.
Norwood, Otar T.
Oldershaw, John B.
Olesijuk, Andrew
O'Neal, David M.
Pardue, Andrew M.
Payne, Stanley R.
Pearson, John M.
Pine, Harry L.
Posatko, Robert J.
Quinlan, Edward J.
Rack, William A.
Rehme, Arthur L.
Rogers, Richard L.
Ryskamp, James J., Jr.
Sacks, Ellsworth J., Jr.
Sand, Richard E.
Schaefer, David F.
Seeley, Richard J.
Segaul, Arthur I.
Sengstack, George F.
Settipane, Guy A.
Shackner, Alvin A.
Sheldon, Edward J.
Sierchio, Gerald P.
Sirois, Joseph L., Jr.
Smith, Bradley E.
Smith, Ronald W.
Southworth, Alvin J.
Spence, Kenneth F., Jr.
Steyn, Rolf W.
Strange, Robert E.
Svendsen, Fred J.
Sweeney, Lawrence
Talmadge, Bruce A.
Thillet, Ives C.
Thorp, James H. M.
Tolchin, Sidney
Torsney, Philip J., Jr.
Toussaint, Harold E., Jr.
Townsend, Guy B.
Trout, Monroe E.
Trump, Richard C.
VanPeenen, Peter F. D.
Voiss, Daniel V.
Wade, James B.
Wagner, Kenneth E.
Weiss, Edward B.
Weitzman, Gerald
Wentworth, Alan F.
Wood, George H., III
Woody, Ronald H., Jr.

LIEUTENANT, SUPPLY CORPS

Adair, Joseph P.
Alderman, Charles B.
Allinder, Joe A., Jr.
Almen, Richard E.
Ashton, Merton E., Jr.
Ayling, Charles W.
Baker, Ernest L.
Bates, Robert L.
Bell, John L., Jr.
Blue, Frank H., Jr.
Bogorowski, Robert J.
Bolander, Jack "C"
Boyer, Charles L.
Brainard, John W.
Briggs, Irving G.
Brown, Boyd F., Jr.
Brown, Russell M.
Brunson, Robert L.
Bruyneel, Louis K.
Bryant, Robert K.
Bunker, Donald J.
Burlingham, Nathan N.
Canon, Roscoe H., Jr.
Carberry, Raymund G., Jr.
Carpenter, Charles F.
Carpenter, Arthur J.
Causey, Bruce M., Jr.
Christensen, Harvey J.
Christopher, Robert N.
Clancy, John F.
Clark, Roger S.
Coleman, Ernest B.
Connelly, Charles T.
Conner, Walter E.
Corn, James R.
Curtin, Pat
Curtis, Richard E.
Davis, William W.
Dempster, Darrell D.
Derby, Francis A.
Donzell, Richard J.
Drabek, Stephen J.
Earl, Bobby J.
Eastwood, William O., Jr.
Ebert, Scott W.
Ethridge, James D.
Felthousen, Charles E.
Fishback, Burney L., Jr.
Fiske, Leon S., Jr.
Flolid, Robert E.
Flores, Joseph L.
Freese, Ralph F.
French, Robert T.
French, Robert C.
Frost, Shirley D.
Garabedian, Edward J.
Giagni, Vincent J.
Gilmore, Roger W.
Gilpen, Franklin M.
Gilrod, Roy O.
Gray, Jack E.
Greenwood, Joseph L., Jr.
Greer, Merwyn C.
Gunther, Roy W.
Haggard, Howard F.
Hamilton, Thomas, Jr.
Hemmert, George V.
Hendrickson, Richard
Hennessy, William J.
Henry, Gerald R.
Hill, Jesse R., Jr.
Hill, Robert E.
Hodges, William J.
Hohenstein, Charles R.

Hopgood, Roy E.
Howe, Donald K., Jr.
Hubbard, Charles C.
Jackson, Reuben J.
Jacobs, Frank S.
Jernigan, Joseph W.
Johnson, Jerry D.
Johnson, Richard L.
Jordan, Alva F., Jr.
King, Braxton R.
Kispert, Lane A.
Kling, Fred A.
Knox, Arthur F., Jr.
Kollios, Achilleas E.
Kreutzinger, Donald R.
Kuhlmann, Dietrich H.
Lane, Anthony D.
Lang, Charles, Jr.
Larson, Nelson S.
Lashley, Ralph E., Jr.
Lathrop, Charles F.
Lazarus, Steven
Lemly, William D.
Lenz, Allen J.
Lewis, John C.
Lindsay, William E.
Livermore, Robert E.
Long, Charles W.
Lovell, Donald E.
Lukens, Robert F.
Maldonado, Teodosio
Marek, Gardiner
McCandless, Claude C., Jr.
McCoy, Thomas E., Jr.
McGee, James E.
McGillivary, Duncan P.
McMahan, Paul T.
McNeill, Neil E.
Mercier, Arthur G.
Miller, Richard K.
Morehouse, Charles W.
Moyer, William R.
Mullen, James V.
Neelley, Charles G.
Newman, John F.
Normand, Robert L.
O'Donnell, Terrence F.
Olson, Harvey T.
O'Neil, Raymond L.
Osborn, Robert H.
Palmer, Donald R.
Paul, John W.
Pavlisin, Frank
Pokorny, Frank J., Jr.
Pomponio, Bruno A.
Pyper, Arthur G.
Quinn, Carl S.
Recher, Bernard L.
Ross, William T., Jr.
Rothenberger, Donald J.
Russell, Frederick R.
Sabec, Edwin J.
Salgado, Paul R.
Sammons, Joseph E.
Sankey, Harry W.
Schanz, Thomas L.
Schlaufman, Louis C.
Schucker, Robert McB.
Schwenz, Richard W.
Scolpino, Frank J., Jr.
Sebes, Edward A.
Shipley, Robert W.
Stevenson, Robert G.
Stewart, George W., III
Strange, Hubert E., Jr.
Stumbaugh, David C.
Sumner, William M.
Taylor, James M.
Teaford, Sidney J.
Temte, Knute P.
Trimble, Philip
Van Scoyoc, James S.
Vogel, Ralph H.
Vollmer, Merle J.
Wadsworth, Ben A., Jr.
Waid, Stanley B.
Waldvogel, Henry J.
Walker, John A.
Ware, Arthur T.
Watt, Robert C.
Webb, Robert F.
Weber, Robert J.
Weisend, John G.
White, Frank L.
Wiener, Lawrence "S"
Wilczynski, Jeremiah
Williams, Raymond L.
Williams, Rex M.
Wolfe, William D.
Wong, Ronald M.
Woodward, Ralph C.
Woolley, Herbert T.

LIEUTENANT, CHAPLAIN CORPS

Andress, Gene B.
Auel, Carl A.
Baker, Marvin D.
Beck, John T.
Bigler, Robert L.
Boreczky, John V.
Carpenter, Elbert N.
Clardy, William J.
Clifford, William "J"
Dietrich, Raymond J.
Dillard, Donald H.
Dodson, Leonard W., Jr.
Feagins, Walter B., Jr.
Fogarty, Daniel F.
Ford, Thaine E.
Gillis, Edward F.
Hershberger, John R., Jr.
Howard, Marvin W.
Ingebretson, Ervin D.
Janeway, James A.
Jensen, Andrew F., Jr.
Johns, Harry D.
Keen, Homer E., Jr.
Keenon, John C.
Kinlaw, Dennis C.
League, William C.
Letten, Lloyd W., Jr.
McAlister, Fred R., Jr.
Ota, Peter I.
Perry, Johnie L.
Plank, David P. W.
Ramsey, Vernon J.
Reagan, Ernest McD., Jr.
Richards, Sherman B.
Rittenhouse, James C.
Robertson, Donald L.
Samuel, William R.
Schmidt, Calvin F.
Schneider, Otto
Scott, Knox O.
Seim, James E.
Stevenson, Neil M.
Swenson, William R.
Thornberry, Roy V., Jr.
VanBeck, Alfred F.
Vanlaningham, Maurice R., Jr.
Veltman, Dean K.
Wuebbens, Everett P.
Zemites, Joseph F.

LIEUTENANT, CIVIL ENGINEER CORPS

Agee, Aaron B.
Allen, Roy L.
Barber, Horace M.
Belton, Edward H.
Bigelow, David S.
Bischof, Ernest J.
Borberg, James R.
Bowers, Richard A.
Carioti, Bruno M.
Cottingham, Edward L.
Crowley, Irwin D., Jr.
Deady, Ralph E.
D'Emidio, Joseph A.
Ecklund, Glenn L.
Erickson, James A.
Falk, Harvey A., Jr.
Gates, Charles W.
Gates, Paul R.
Hartell, William K.
Hines, John C.
Hoffner, Carleton C., Jr.
Houghton, Robert J.
Hrnjez, Nicholas C.
Hughes, Edmund C.
Johnson, Clarence B.
Johnson, Durrell A.
Jones, Horace B., Jr.
Jones, Thomas K.
Keegan, Robert D.
Koblos, Michael C.
Lapolla, Joseph
Lawson, LeRoy D.
Leavitt, Fred O.
Lewis, Frank H., Jr.
Mangan, Thomas J., Jr.
Mathews, Charles J.
Merica, Charles A.
Mitchell, Thomas J.
O'Leary, John F.
Paulsen, Raymond E.
Reese, Joseph L., Jr.
Reeves, Ronald B.
Rickels, Jack C.
Robinson, Charles F.
Schellhardt, Richard H.
Scherer, Clark H., Jr.
Schoenagel, Fred C., Jr.
Smith, George L.
Smith, Matthias J.
Stultz, Bobby E.
Taylor, James T.
Thoman, Charles L.
Trunz, Joseph P., Jr.
Tyhurst, James E.
Uhe, James L.
VanBelkum, Kenneth D.
Wear, John R.
White, Robert K.
Wilson, Dean G.
Woodring, John W.
Wright, John A.
Yoshihara, Takeshi

LIEUTENANT, DENTAL CORPS

Allen, Robert W.
Argue, William F.
Baker, Ronald D.
Barlow, Doil E.
Bodner, Joseph A., Jr.
Bottomley, William K.
Bradford, Paul L. J.
Brewster, Jerry G.
Brown, Kenneth E.
Butler, George R., Jr.
Carrothers, Richard L.
Comcowich, William L.
Coombs, Paul S.
Cross, George B.
Cummings, Matthew R.
Cunningham, Charles J.
Dattilo, Bruno F.
DelGrande, Patrick A.
Diem, Charles R.
Dodds, Donald N.
Donofrio, Albert M.
Driscoll, John M.
Edwards, Richard C.
Eichel, Frederick P.
Fenster, Robert K.
Ferguson, David A.
Forte, John T.
Gensior, Arthur M.
Gherardi, Roy F.
Gholson, Dan C.
Giles, Norman B.
Good, Richard J.
Gordon, Jim D.
Grady, Charles J., Jr.
Grimsley, William A., Jr.
Grove, David M.
Hands, Dale F.
Harland, Robert J.
Heckel, Robert D.
Hill, Robert L.
Jacobson, Rudolph
Jayne, John H.
Kennedy, Larry H.
Kieny, Richard J.
Kimbrough, Harris McD., Jr.
King, Gordon E.
Landes, Robert P.
Lattner, Richard A.
Lolla, Richard V.
Mainous, Elgene G.
Marino, Louis J.
Mark, Leonard E.
Martin, William R.
Mayberry, Richard M.
McAndrew, James R.
McCann, Thomas F.
McDonald, Edwin E., Jr.
McDonnel, William J.
McGary, Charles W.
McLeod, Carlton J.
Messer, Eugene J.
Mielke, Dean T.
Miller, James E.
Moffitt, William C.
Molacek, Marvin J.
Moore, Robert E.
Muldrow, Lewis M.
Newell, William J.
Olson, Fred A.
Page, Roy C.
Peck, Robert B.
Perlitsh, Max J.
Petruccelli, Francis
Porter, William J.
Rusell, David T.
Ryan, Joseph P.
Schaeffer, Peter K.
Scharpf, Herbert O.
Sipe, Kenneth D.
Smith, Jerome A.
Strange, Charles G., Jr.
Stump, Thomas E.
Tibbetts, Van R.
Tietzer, Herbert O., Jr.
Tramontana, Joseph S.
Trusz, Edward J.
Valasek, Arden D.
Westerhoff, Warren R.
Whited, Don H.
Williams, Frederick B.
Wirthlin, Milton R., Jr.
Witte, Ernest T.
Wright, Henry G., Jr.

LIEUTENANT, MEDICAL SERVICE CORPS

Adams, Chauncey C., Jr.
Ambrose, Edward A.
Arns, William E.
Ash, Lloyd M.
Bailey, Jack S.
Bauerschmidt, Alan D.
Becker, David E.
Buckley, Emanuel N.
Campbell, Howard B.
Cole, James R.
Cook, Paul E.
Dean, Jerdon J.
DeGrotte, Henry C., Jr.
Diener, Richard V.
Dobbs, George I.
Elliott, Gordon E.
Feith, Joseph
Furrey, William R.
George, Robert E.
Havice, Andrew J.
Howard, John E.
Howard, Vaughn
Jones, Philip E.
Jordan, Ray D.
Kelley, Donald R.
Knight, Jerry B.
Longest, Clifford "B"
May, Carl R.
McDuffie, Wilbur B.
Nyman, George A.
O'Neill, Joseph M.
Peake, Stanley C.
Pribnow, James F.
Roach, Leon M.
Roller, Billie
Rowell, Dalton A.
Smith, Bill J.
Smith, Robert L.
Steward, Edgar T.
Storms, Jack R.
Turner, David H.
Voas, Robert B.
Wagner, Carl M.
Wetzel, Orval B.
White, Leland E.
Wimberly, Clyde O.
Wolf, John W.

LIEUTENANT, NURSE CORPS

Alexiou, Grace E.
Barry, Dorothy M.
Belair, Danya A. B.
Beveridge, Robina W.
Brogan, Mary A. M.
Burke, Lois E.
Burns, Patricia J.
Callahan, Dorothy H.
Davis, Rosemary
Durkin, Veronica A.
Fate, Phyllis B.
Fitzpatrick, Mary E. A.
Green, Dorothy J.
Gurgul, Stephanie D.
Hessel, Jane C.
Hockenberger, Charlotte E.
Job, Lucy A.
Lane, Grace A.
Martin, Zuleime L.
Mooney, Geraldine T.
Motomatsu, Toshiko
Peterson, Eleanor V.
Redgate, Janet M.
Roberts, Catherine V.
Shelton, Mildred L.
Smith, Margaret A.
Stack, Patricia J.
Walsh, Elizabeth A.
Warren, Ellen G.

The following-named (Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps) to be ensigns in the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

Robert E. Anderson
David E. Atkinson
Edward W. Bailey
William C. Ballamy
William P. Bancroft
William A. Barclay
William W. Bartlett
Lawrence A. Bennigson
Dennis P. Bowen
Ralph B. Brown
Lawrence T. Browne
Robert LeR. Brower
Robert D. Burke
Gary LaV. Carlson
Paul A. Casey
Charles W. B. Connors
James H. Cunningham
John B. Dalton, Jr.
Duane L. DeWerff
Lawrence H. Dietrich
Robert F. Estes
Homer D. Evans
Phineas D. Evans
Eugene J. Flath
Earle S. Florance
George H. Foster, Jr.
Thomas G. Freeman, Jr.
Thomas H. Gabbard
Paul R. Gage
Will H. Gassett
Ronald E. Gast
Richard A. Geudtner
Richard A. Harris
Daniel R. Hegg
Boyd A. Henderson
John K. Hewitt
James R. Hutchins
Henry C. Jeffries, Jr.
Larry D. Johnson
Gordon S. Jones
Deane D. Judd
Ronald H. Julian
Jackie L. Keltner
George N. Keyser
Phillip K. Knouse
Ronald S. Koener
Tom B. Larsen
Emil H. Levine
Robert C. McConnell
William B. McCormick
Lawrence J. McDonnell
Thomas N. McDowell
LeRoy E. McLaurin, Jr.
Andrew J. Macaulay
Harry P. Mann
William B. Martin
Tatsuo Matsushita
Melvin D. Miller
Richard B. Mills
Joseph R. Musolino
Philip A. Nelson
Alan R. Newhouse
Theodore N. Pateas
Willis B. Perkins III
Paul E. Penn
Peter P. Philhower
John W. Pieper
James S. Poor
Thomas J. Powers
William A. Press
Norman A. Proffitt, Jr.
William W. Rhoades
Wendell C. Ridder
Harold P. Riley
Rex G. Roberts
Jack "W" Ross III
James H. Russell
John V. Russo
Loren L. Sanders
John E. Simkins, Jr.
Gerald M. Simmons
Thomas D. Smith
William J. Stewart
Thomas M. Tait
Frederick R. Taylor
Jonathan A. Topham
David A. Trebour
David W. Twigg
Paul D. Varady
Kenneth E. Vought, Jr.
Daniel D. Weber
Richard D. Wentzel
James R. Wiegley
Raymond G. Zeller

The following-named (Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps) to be ensigns in the Supply Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

John E. Barber
Forrest R. England
Dan W. Sargent
Arthur D. Bert
William P. Hickey

The following-named (Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps) to be ensigns in the Civil Engineer Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

Donald R. Bradford
William H. Dittman
George H. Ginn
Stephen Staley Groves, II
John C. Kiefer
Richard Albert Schaeffer

Robert R. Gillespy, Jr., Naval Reserve officer to be a permanent lieutenant commander and a temporary commander in the Medical Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law.

*Charles H. Miller (civilian college graduate) to be a permanent lieutenant and a temporary lieutenant commander in the Medical Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law.

*Herbert L. Pope, Naval Reserve officer to be a permanent lieutenant (junior grade) in the Medical Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law.

The following-named Naval Reserve officers to be permanent lieutenants (junior grade) and temporary lieutenants in the Medical Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

*Warren C. Boop, Jr.
*Walter J. Cassidy, Jr.
*Jerry Cassuto
*Nicholas A. D'Amato
*Charles H. Dockhorn
*Vernon L. Goller
*Francis M. Highly, Jr.
*Elmer C. Koller, Jr.
*Louis E. Potvin
*William C. Prescott
*James J. Ryskamp, Jr.
*Howard A. Levin
*Robert C. Meredith
*Richard A. Millington
*Norval Mortensen
*Donald W. Sobel
*Alan C. Stormo

The following-named Naval Reserve officers to be permanent lieutenants in the Medical Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

*Claude A. Barnhill
*Arthur A. Beaudry
*James K. Cooke, Jr.
*Tommy E. Hall
*Francis T. Kostohryz
*Robert H. Saxton
*John T. Vincent

The following-named Naval Reserve officers to be permanent lieutenants and temporary lieutenant commanders in the Medical Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

*Tor Richter
*Frank G. Steen

*Robert M. Jennings (civilian college graduate) to be a permanent lieutenant in the Dental Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law.

The following-named Naval Reserve officers to be permanent lieutenants in the Dental Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

*Philip R. Falcone
*Joseph J. Lawrence, Jr.
*Robert R. Thomason
*James McC. Wilson

The following-named Naval Reserve officers to be permanent lieutenants (junior grade) and temporary lieutenants in the Dental Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

*Joseph A. Bodner, Jr.
*Joseph H. Burke
*Richard L. Carrothers
*Sam Castronovo
*Bruno F. Dattilo
*John S. Eppolito
*Robert E. Howe
*Robert P. Kuentzel
*Robert P. Landes
*James H. McLeran
*Leonard E. Mark
*Robert J. Pinkerton
*George W. Rice, Jr.
*Ronald M. Romaniello
*Harry E. Semler, Jr.
*Kenji Seo

The following-named Naval Reserve officers to be permanent lieutenants and temporary lieutenant commanders in the Dental Corps of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

*William R. Brown
*Thomas J. Charles, Jr.
*Robert V. Peterson

The following-named graduates from naval enlisted scientific educational program to be ensigns in the line of the Navy, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

*Lexie B. Boswell
*Richard F. Dehler
Robert F. Noland

*John P. Dobson, U.S. Navy retired officer, to be a permanent captain in the Medical Corps of the Navy, pursuant to title 10, United States Code, section 1211.

*Henry T. Koonce, U.S. Navy retired officer, to be a permanent captain in the line of the Navy for engineering duty, pursuant to title 10, United States Code, section 1211.

*Richard F. Johnston, U.S. Navy retired officer, to be a lieutenant in the line of the Navy for temporary service, pursuant to title 10, United States Code, section 1211.

*Clyde L. Ido, U.S. Navy retired officer, to be a lieutenant commander in the line of the Navy for temporary service, pursuant to title 10, United States Code, section 1211.

The following-named to be ensigns in the Navy, limited duty only, for temporary service, in the classification indicated, subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law:

*Chester A. Adams
*William R. Andrews
*Dale E. Alexander
*Leon Austin
*Samuel S. Bable
*James E. Bagley
*Willie H. Ball, Jr.
*George J. Bauer, Jr.
*Willis D. Bender
*Frederick C. Bowley
*Anthony Ciotti
*William J. Clemente
*Willis D. Conner
*Anthony C. Coulapides
*Charles E. Craig
*Richard W. Culbertson
*Edward M. Deloury
*Merrill L. Dennis
*Victor C. Evans, Jr.
*Cornelius W. Fisher
*William F. Flannery
*John E. Flinn
*Wayne E. Fryman
*Norman H. Gelinas
*James E. Goforth, Jr.
*Cecil M. Greene
*Raymond E. Haney
*Edward M. Hart
*William C. Hatton
*Clifton W. Jenkins
*William T. Jennings
*Robert H. Keepin
*Alexander H. Kerns
*John N. Kull
*George E. Labor
*"J" "D" Lane
*Robert C. Lee
*Gordon E. Lindstrom
*Richard J. Logue
*Robin C. MacFadden
*James R. McCall
*George C. Meiers, Jr.
*Raymond R. Mulhearn
*Stanley E. Mumford
*Ernest E. Olds
*Walter H. Otte
*Stanley D. Peckham
*Charles R. Pilcher
*William F. Polzin
*Fred H. Qualls
*Arthur O. Richartz
*Lloyd T. Ritchie
*Laurentino Rodrigues
*Henry F. Rooney
*Earl W. H. Schultz
*Robert E. Shuford
*Gordon H. Simms
*Robert W. Smiley
*Billie J. Smith
*Fairon J. Smith
*Henry B. Stenson
*Thomas N. Thompson
*Video V. Tonelli
*Morris E. Upham
*Downey M. Ware
*Robert R. Warren
*Donald C. Wheeler
*Loran A. Wilcox
*Raymond M. Will
*Dallas K. Williams
*Arthur D. Wombold
*Jere W. Woodall
*Gene Yarber

ORDNANCE, SURFACE

*James W. Ahern
*Theodore L. Baron
*Francis X. Beaudin
*Felix Benoit
*Kenneth R. Benson
*James C. Buchans
*John F. Carr
*Alon E. Cawthon
*Lloyd C. Davis
*John F. Dodge
*Richard R. Dovalgo
*Alan R. Dvorak
*William T. Farrell
*Ernest G. Felcuth
*Leo Garcia
*Bernard S. Gath
*Clyde W. Hartsell
*Joe P. Harrison
*Robert J. Hawkey
*Donald G. Jerrell
*Stanley D. Jones
*James F. Kearns
*"J" "E" Lowry
*Glynn Martin
*William H. Maulin
*James T. McConnell
*Robert M. McFarling, Jr.
*Charles A. McLoon
*John N. Milliken, Jr.
*Michael L. Murphy
*Liborio W. Nobile
*Patrick H. Pearce
*Thomas M. Perkins
*John A. Petrilla
*Laroyce F. Rivers
*Kenneth L. Smith
*Lyal M. Stryker
*Richard D. Tuchscherer
*Alfred H. Wagner, Jr.
*Calvin R. Warner

ADMINISTRATION

*Berton E. Bresch
*Richard C. Cullen
*Leonard G. Davis
*Lawrence D. Duncan
*Allan L. Eaton
*Thomas Hamby, Jr.
*Leslie R. Kelsay
*Robert H. Morrison
*Estelito N. Potente
*William D. Riggs
*Lyle D. Rochholz
*Albert V. Schenfisch
*Charles F. Simons, Jr.

ENGINEERING

*Dewey E. Babb
*Willard D. Baker
*Robert D. Bell
*Dale St. John Betz
*Robert L. Borkert
*Francis L. Carroll
*Walter E. Copeland
*Ralph R. Devine
*Gilliam S. Dunn
*Oliver K. Evans
*William E. Evans
*Charles J. Fritz
*Richard E. Gehrlich
*Harry W. Harbin
*Cecil E. Jones, Jr.
*Robert B. Klausegger
*George S. Law
*Harry R. Long
*James G. McMichael
*Herbert D. Morisset
*Arthur P. Murray
*Joseph P. Neary
*John P. O'Malley
*John C. Recktenwald
*Robert E. Rowe
*Daniel M. Shovlin
*Wayne E. Staley
*Raphael T. Supersano
*Phillip S. Thompson
*John M. Watt, Jr.
*Charles A. Whitworth
*Richard A. Wigen
*Robert A. Wilson
*Avery G. Wood, Jr.
Raymond A. Hunter

ELECTRONICS

*Douglas W. Belsheim
*Clyde E. Brown
*Halbert G. Clark
*Richard R. Cornett
*Dick A. Danals
*Thomas A. Dzurko
*James H. Ecoff
*Raymond B. Ferris
*David L. Garner
*Donald R. Graham
*Robert B. Gross, Jr.
*Donald E. Haney
*Charles R. Hendon
*Leroy L. Hill
*Walter J. Hyde
*Allan F. Jamsgard
*Stephen Johnson
*Richard E. Lambert
*Donald W. Lampert
*Robert A. Litten
*Fred H. Lowery, Jr.
*John F. Lusby
*James B. Mason
*William A. Mitchell
*James R. Morrissey, Jr.
*William S. Neill
*James E. Olsen
*William A. Ottino
*Charles A. Pellegrini
*Harold E. Polaski, Jr.
*William M. Putnam
*Philip J. Rager, Jr.
*William C. Ryan, Jr.
*Robert M. Sajdera
*Billy K. Schisler
*Arthur J. Smith, Jr.
*"J" "B" Smith
*Robert L. Smith
*John H. Straub
*James R. Taylor
*Fred E. Thompson
*Paul E. Wall
*Patrick A. Walsh
*James K. Wolfgram

HULL

*James P. Cowell
*Charles R. Cornett
*Ronald Edwards
*William J. Flynn
*George W. Gould
*James M. Hagins
*Ronald D. Hanson
*John L. Heath
*Garth W. Johnson
*Calvin L. Jones
*Raymond A. Kraft
*Leon Mansi
*Walter E. O'Shell
*Harry Ray, Jr.
*Clarence H. Regner, Jr.
*Jack M. Ridens
*John A. Russick
*Omar M. Selland
*Ralph D. Sisk
*John N. Smith
*Alton B. Spann
*Clarence R. Taylor
*Garland W. Toomer
*James M. Vincent
*James Watkins
*Gerald F. Williams

SUPPLY CORPS

*Robert R. Austin
*Martin L. Beck
*Carleton W. Boutwell, Jr.
*Howard L. Fry
*William R. Kenly
*Albert J. Kennedy
*Raymond P. Lasher
*Fred O. McWhorter
*Matthew A. Stofanak
*Raymond J. Wynne
*Robert S. Yelle

CIVIL ENGINEER CORPS

*Arthur L. Newman

AVIATION ORDNANCE

*Charles W. Bollinger

AVIATION ELECTRONICS

*Varro D. Anderson
*David G. Carruthers
*Charles E. Cater
*Paul W. Elkins

*Donald C. Johnsen	*Albert H. Robbins
*Thomas D. Martin	*James A. Sheler
*Samuel A. Miles II	*Richard H. Short

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The following named (Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps) for permanent appointment to the rank of second lieutenant in the Marine Corps, subject to the qualifications therefor as provided by law:

*Royce L. Cutler	*Gerald E. MacDonald
*George P. Edgell	*Dan G. Miller
*Robert G. Flynn	*Michael I. Opean
*Mark T. Fulmer	*Milton C. Otto
*Donald W. Johnson	*Olen D. Presley
*Gregory W. Jordan	*James D. Scrivner
*Robert W. LaFon

The following named (Army Reserve Officers' Training Corps) for permanent appointment to the rank of second lieutenant in the Marine Corps, subject to the qualifications therefor as provided by law:

Kenneth A. Sadler

The following named for permanent appointment to the grade of second lieutenant for limited duty in the Marine Corps, subject to the qualifications therefor as provided by law:

*Edward L. Abner	*Bobby N. Jackson
*John M. Barberi	*Charles T. Knight
*Earl C. Cleim	*John Koyiades
*Frank J. Cox, Jr.	*Richard White
*Daniel C. Georgia	*Lauritz W. Young
*Robert W. Greene

The following named (platoon leaders class) for permanent appointment to the grade of second lieutenant in the Marine Corps, subject to the qualifications therefor as provided by law:

William D. Bethea	Delmar D. Long
James S. Bowers	James W. Lowe, Jr.
Donald N. Broadwell	Robert D. Marshall
Michael C. Canaday	Miles C. Mays
Thomas J. Carroll	Bruce F. McMillan
Edward L. Chambless	Harry R. Metzler
Michael T. Crawford	Robert O. Meyer
David (n) Connell	Frank H. Miner, Jr.
Lynn A. Daubenspeck	Maurice C. O'Connell
MacGregor Flanders, Jr.	Scott C. Puckett
	James T. Sehulster
Charles G. A. Harmon, Jr.	Craig E. Shuler
	Jerry I. Simpson
Thomas C. Hendrix	Alexander R. Spellman
Richard C. Hippner	David R. Stefansson
Walton F. Hudson, Jr.	Kenneth J. Steiner
Frank A. Huey	Allan (n) Thompson
Alvin W. Jennings	Michael E. Tipton
Burrell H. Landes, Jr.	Gary E. Todd
Garland M. Lasater, Jr.	James H. Tumlinson III
David A. Lefeve	Arthur L. Wallace, Jr.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

II Corinthians 5: 9: Wherefore we labor that we may be accepted of Him.

O Thou who art great in might and in mercy, in this moment of prayer, we are praising Thee for Thy goodness and seeking those needed blessings which Thou alone canst give.

We penitently confess that so frequently we betray and break faith with our better self and lapse from loyalty to Thee and allow the baser impulses to have their way with us.

Wilt Thou quicken and gird us with Thy spirit that in all the various circumstances of life we may do Thy will with humility and sincerity.

Inspire us to carry on with faith and hope when the burdens of life become heavy and fears threaten to enslave us.

Show us how we may meet the hardships and weather the storms which we encounter in our journey toward the desired haven.

Hear us as we cry out, "Jesus Saviour, pilot me." Amen.

* Indicates ad interim appointment.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 14, 1960, was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 5421) entitled "An act to provide a program of assistance to correct inequities in the construction of fishing vessels and to enable the fishing industry of the United States to regain a favorable economic status, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. SCOTT to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation from committee:

JANUARY 15, 1950.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House,
U.S. Capitol Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the House Administration Committee, effective immediately.

Sincerely,

WILLARD S. CURTIN,
Member of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation from committee:

JANUARY 18, 1960.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
U.S. Capitol, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I herewith tender my resignation as a member of the Education and Labor Committee of the House of Representatives. It has been a privilege and pleasure to work with the members of this committee, and I regret I must discontinue this association.

Respectfully,

JOHN A. LAFORE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation from committee:

JANUARY 15, 1960.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SPEAKER RAYBURN: It is with regret that I submit herewith my resignation as a member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

It has been a privilege and honor to work with the many fine members of this committee during the 85th and 86th Congresses, during which time it formulated historic statehood legislation.

My association with this committee will remain a pleasant and enlightening experience.

Respectfully,

HAROLD R. COLLIER.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 420) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the following-named Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the following standing committees of the House of Representatives:

Committee on Education and Labor: CHARLES E. GOODELL, New York.

Committee on House Administration: JOHN KYL, Iowa.

Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs: JOHN KYL, Iowa.

Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce: WILLARD S. CURTIN, Pennsylvania.

Committee on Ways and Means: JOHN A. LAFORE, JR., Pennsylvania.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DISPENSING WITH CONSENT CALENDAR, PRIVATE CALENDAR, AND CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the Consent Calendar today, the Private Calendar tomorrow, and the business in order on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

LET US GET RID OF THE PEEPHOLES IN THE POST OFFICES

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, you remember that terrifying book by George Orwell entitled "Nineteen Eighty-Four."

Last week I was shocked to discover that in the post offices of this country, 1984 is already here. When I went through our new post office building at Ravenswood, W. Va., I saw that at great expense there has been constructed a corridor along one side and through the middle of the mailing room. Along this corridor are peepholes, hidden in panels and equipped with one-way glass, through which snooping postal inspectors enter secretly to spy on postal workers to try to find them loafing or see that they do not steal anything.

Mr. Speaker, this is going on in post offices all over the country. Inspectors can sneak into town and set up their gestapo watch through private doors and special keys, unknown to the postal employees. I say this is an insult to thousands of hard-working postal clerks.

These peephole facilities actually cost millions of dollars in special construction, and they do not accomplish anything that tight supervision could not cure. But worst of all, this peephole policy is like a gestapo, and it has been misused to spy on union meetings, and embarrass postal employees in matters which should remain personal.

The peepholes cover nearly all of the post offices. They have peepholes to cover where the employees have their lunch. They have peepholes so they can look and listen in on union meetings if held in the post office. The peepholes even look into the men's room. Apparently the only place the Post Office Department has drawn the line is at the women's restroom.

The editor of the Ravenswood News, Phil Fourney, in denouncing this practice, reported that a postal inspector at Ravenswood boasted "they often spend 18 hours or more in their peephole area observing activities of postal employees."

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that Postmaster General Summerfield may want to place signs so all post office employees can see them, and the signs might read: "Big Brother Arthur is watching you."

I intend to find out how much of the taxpayers' money goes into constructing these vicious, un-American, and insulting peephole spy systems.

Mr. Speaker, in the name of freedom and Americanism, let us treat our postal employees as human beings and get rid of the peepholes in the post offices.

U.S. MARINES MARCH FROM MOUNTAINS TO SEA IN FIGHT AGAINST DISEASE

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and to include a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Marines represent the American military at its best. Every child in America has heard the expression "The Marines have landed—the situation is well in hand." The Marines ask for the hard jobs, the difficult jobs, the unusual jobs. The Marines accomplish the impossible.

Some time ago a young marine, a gunnery sergeant by the name of Willie Fleming, of Pacolet, S.C., along with Cpl. Philip Lassiter, of Corinth, Miss., and S. Sgt. Dave Corbitt, of Axson, Ga., obtained permission from their commanding officer at the Beaufort Air Station, Beaufort, S.C., to participate in the March of Dimes. As everyone knows, the March of Dimes is that magnificent program begun many years ago, whereby the whole Nation contributes to the conquest of poliomyelitis. These marines asked permission to march the length of South Carolina with full battle dress, including helmet. They also proposed, and got permission, to take the time from their annual leave to complete the 17-day ordeal. For each step during this 375-mile march, they would ask a dime be given in every city, town, and hamlet through which they passed.

On Wednesday, January 20, the march will terminate back at their home base in Beaufort, S.C. at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. Representatives of the Marine Corps and of the U.S. Marine Reserves in South Carolina will be there to greet them along with dignitaries from all walks of life. I plan to be among the group to welcome these fine young Americans.

Mr. Speaker, this march will not be an easy one; it has not been easy. Through wind, sleet, and snow they have made their journey in an effort to eradicate some of the most insidious diseases ever to attack the human body. Mr. Speaker, I know of no undertaking so unique or so worth while. I know of no undertaking that has so captivated the imagination of all people in my part of the United States. All marines, regular and reserve, have backed this project. Col. Ted Watson—a distinguished Marine Reserve colonel from Greenville, S.C.—has actively encouraged these young men. He has constantly brought their march to the attention of every area through which they have passed. All people have contributed as they have trod from the mountains to the sea.

Mr. Speaker, I want the whole Nation to know of this great and unique march by these distinguished young Americans. They have the appreciation of all of us and they have the admiration, respect, and affection of Americans strong and weak. They have performed a great service in the common fight against disease.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include therewith some newspaper clippings on the march:

[From the Charleston (S.C.) News and Courier, Jan. 5, 1960]

MARINES START LONG MARCH FOR DIMES

SPARTANBURG.—Three tough young leathernecks stepped off Monday on a heel-blistering 375-mile march to the coast for the March of Dimes.

They hope to collect donations of 10 cents for every step of the way from Pacolet to Beaufort. Based on the 792,000 steps they figure it will take, that will be $79,200 to fight polio.

Sgt. Willie Fleming, 34, of Pacolet; Sgt. Dave Corbitt, 30, of Axson, Ga.; and Cpl. Philip Lassiter, 19, of Corinth, Miss., form the trio. They are based at the Marine Beaufort Air Station.

Each carries a 28-pound pack, mostly clothing. In case of bad weather, they will use shelter halves. Otherwise they will sleep under the stars.

They collected $56 on the 10-mile trek into Spartanburg from Pacolet, where they started. An additional $144 was sent by donors into the March of Dimes headquarters here.

They were to camp out on the dual lane highway between Spartanburg and Greenville Monday night and head for Greenville Tuesday morning.

[From the Charleston (S.C.) News and Courier, Jan. 16, 1960]

MARCHING MARINES REACH SUMMERVILLE IN POLIO FUND DRIVE

Three Marines, marching from the mountains to the sea in a drive to raise funds for the National Foundation's New March of Dimes received a warm welcome yesterday at Summerville. The tired trio reached the Flower Town in the Pines about 5 p.m. after an all day trek from St. George, 27 miles further inland. They were welcomed by a group of Summerville citizens including Mayor L. Hayden Doty, Mrs. Frank Rehak, Jr., Capt. John M. Moore, South Carolina National Guard, A. M. Barshay, representing the town's merchants, DaCosta Muckenfuss, and others. The three Parris Island Marines are Gunnery Sgt. Willie Fleming, of Pacolet; Cpl. Philip Lassiter, of Corinth, Miss.; and S. Sgt. Dave Corbitt, of Axson, Ga. After witnessing fund collecting in the Summerville Town Square, the trio were fed. They bedded down for the night on the grounds of the Summerville Presbyterian Church. The Marines will break camp early today and head for Charleston. They are scheduled to enter the city sometime this afternoon and will camp at White Point Gardens on the Battery tonight. The 53d Rifle Company, U.S. Marine Reserves, of Charleston is cooperating with the local March of Dimes program and will act as hosts to the three Marines here. The trio is on special furlough. Their aim is to raise 10 cents for each step they take in their march from Pacolet to Beaufort. They will leave Charleston at 6 p.m. tomorrow and head southward toward their goal. They have visited Spartanburg, Greenville, Columbia, Orangeburg, St. George, and Summerville in addition to other towns along their route.

NONVOTING DELEGATE FROM GUAM

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when the 2d session of the 86th Congress convened on January 6, 1960, the Congress of the United States, for the first time in 163 years, was without territorial representation. The Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, of course, is not a territory.

When the 1st session of the 86th Congress convened Hawaii was a territory, and its nonvoting territorial delegate was our former beloved colleague, the Honorable John A. Burns. It was not until late in the first session, that Hawaii having attained statehood, the Honorable DANIEL KEN INOUYE, the popular, able, and dedicated Representative from the State of Hawaii, came to replace Delegate Burns, of the Territory of Hawaii.

The present 86th Congress is the first Congress since 1797 that includes in its composition no delegate from any territory. I have seen no newspaper comment on this phase, at least none stressing its historic significance. In fact in our entire history only four Congresses have had no territorial representation—the 1st Congress, the 2d Congress, the 5th Congress, and the 86th Congress.

In the First Congress—1789–91—only the Thirteen Original States were represented. In the Second Congress—1791–93—there were 15 States, Vermont and Kentucky having been added without serving territorial apprenticeship in the Congress.

After that each Congress—with the exception of the 5th—until the 86th Congress had in addition to its State delegations delegates from territories later destined for statehood. The reason there was no territorial representation in the Fifth Congress was by that time what had been in the Third and Fourth Congresses the territory south of the River Ohio had become the State of Tennessee and it was not until the Sixth Congress—1799–1801—that the territory northwest of the River Ohio entered the Halls of Congress.

The territory northwest of the River Ohio served out its apprenticeship in the Sixth and Seventh Congresses, entered the Eighth Congress as the State of Ohio. Meanwhile Mississippi Territory had come to Congress, later joined by Indiana Territory, the Territory of Orleans, and in the 12th Congress—1811–13—Illinois Territory.

So it went on and on in the long period of our cementing of a sisterhood of 50 States, with territorial apprenticeship in the Congress awaiting new territories as old territories became new States. On and on for 163 years until this January 1960.

Representation in the Congress by a nonvoting Delegate has given to our fellow Americans, residing in territorial domains, a recognition and a dignity that for 163 years has brought rich results in the development of our representative democratic government. I hope that in the 87th Congress we will return to the old pattern.

Guam is our most farflung territory. Under the organic act it has made marvelous progress. Its legislative body, presided over by the distinguished and able Speaker Won Pat, well known to us in Washington, is modeled on the Congress of the United States, as are our State legislatures, and its influence in that faraway area in the Pacific is large and important.

I am not a member of the great Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, which has jurisdiction in this field and the members of which are of course much better informed, but as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I do not hesitate to say that the seating in the Congress of a nonvoting Delegate from Guam would have most wholesome repercussions.

I shall support a bill giving nonvoting representation to Guam if one is introduced by a member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and favorably reported by that committee. Its passage would mean a return to the old and honored pattern.

EMPLOYMENT OF RETIRED COMMISSIONED OFFICERS BY CONTRACTORS OF DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, last June in the debate on the Defense Appropriation Act of 1960, the House was promised that an inquiry on the employment of retired military officers by defense contractors would be made by the Subcommittee for Special Investigations of the Committee on Armed Services of which I have the honor to be chairman.

On June 23, 1959, promptly after Mr. VINSON, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, directed the inquiry, I addressed a letter to all Members of the House and to the Senate, requesting any information they might have bearing upon this subject.

There has been put in every Member's office today, the printed text of our hearings together with the report of my subcommittee, unanimously adopted and approved by the Honorable CARL VINSON, chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

I have dropped in the hopper, today, a bill containing the subcommittee's recommendations. This, the subcommittee, by unanimous vote, directed me to do. It is their bill as well as my own even though under House Rules it bears my name alone.

To summarize:

We would extend the coverage of the criminal statutes contained in title 18, United States Code, relating to the activities of retired commissioned officers and separated civilian personnel, within 2 years next after their separation.

To accomplish this: Section 1 of our bill introduces a new section 292. We have broadened section 283 and extended the coverage of section 284 of title 18, United States Code.

The purpose of these amendments is to stop selling. We propose to bar selling information acquired while in Federal commissioned service or otherwise, for a period of 2 years. These sections contain criminal penalties.

It is our hope that they clearly express the intent of the Congress; and that they are enforceable, and will be enforced.

Next, we have struck out what we feel is an unnecessary and discriminatory penalty upon naval and marine regular officers selling of war material and supplies to that department, while Army and Air Force officers were not under the same limitations. This Navy statute is partial and punitive, beyond the point of usefulness.

We propose a law which across the boards at all times for 2 years after retirement forbids retired pay to any commissioned officer engaged in selling, directly or indirectly, to the Department of Defense.

After 2 years, we feel that the hold of old associations will have been diluted by time. This is the cooling period of 2 years as to which there has been no noticeable dissent.

Finally, we have equalized certain opportunities. We have amended the dual compensation statute to provide, that without interrupting the career of civil service system, if the Secretary of Defense shall find the indispensable man to give the unique service which none other can supply, then he may without the restrictions of that act appoint a retired military officer and certify the action he has taken to the Congress.

The requirement that the Secretary must be personally responsible for such an appointment will, we feel, keep the exception from being abused. Likewise, we amend the dual office statute to lift the ban on officers retired for age or length of service, who, alone of all commissioned officers are now restricted by this act.

There are ethical considerations, applicable as well to all persons, as to those in retired military status. These should be made clear in a code of conduct. It should be unnecessary for the Congress to set up by legislation the details of moral and personal obligations which men of honor ought to observe. There are bounds of propriety which can be spelled out in the military profession just as in other professions. The judgment of ostracism which follows upon the violation of these codes, the scorn of upright and self-respecting professional men, should be sufficient punishment throughout the years for those who abuse the confidences obtained while in the armed services.

Now, to sum up: The subcommittee proposes to stop selling of any kind under any pretext for 2 years after departure from the Pentagon, and we think selling has a well understood meaning; and we think it embraces every form of engagement which results in the extraction of money from the public purse by reason of knowledge and associations obtained through Government service.

The subcommittee did not engage in a punitive expedition. But many instances disclosed in the testimony and the cold statistical record leave some important questions unanswered.

First. Salaries when measured against the statement of duties performed left me at least not quite satisfied that all of the salaries were associated with pious hard work.

Second. The coincidence of increased company business and the employment of retired officers may have been accidential but it left me skeptical.

Therefore, we have determined to outlaw the "salesmen" for 2 years. I have no pride of language but, as clearly as it can be expressed, I hope this bill gives effect to that objective.

We want to prevent the exploitation of Government knowledge. We want to obtain for the hundreds and hundreds of officers in all grades, especially the lower grades, the opportunity to usefully employ their skills after they are no longer needed in the military service. All anyone must do now is stay away from selling.

The salaries encountered most frequently were about $700 per month. This is far below the grade of corresponding technical civilian competence.

It is a rather sad commentary upon the distinction made by many defense department contractors who have eyes only for the stars in technical liaison. A $40 billion budget bears watching.

THE SITUATION IN THE PANAMA CANAL ZONE

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Canal Zone is an area where the United States, through treaties with Panama, exercises in perpetuity all those rights which we would possess and exercise if we were the actual sovereign of the territory.

The Department of State is currently giving consideration to a request by the Republic of Panama that the Panamanian flag be flown in the Canal Zone. On the surface, this may appear to be a small request. There are implications involved, however, which might have extremely serious and far-reaching effects.

There seems to be some sharp division of opinion within the executive branch concerning the advisability of granting such permission, and many Members of Congress have also voiced their deep sense of personal concern and misgiving.

The Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs is currently holding hearings on this matter. These hearings have not yet been finished and we will continue to receive views and recommendations from official and private sources.

As our subcommittee hearings have progressed it has become increasingly apparent that flying the Panamanian flag in the Canal Zone would be a major deviation from our previously established policy. We have come to no decision concerning its advisability, but I am convinced that it would be an action which should not be undertaken by the executive branch alone.

I have, therefore, today introduced a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress "that any variation in the traditional interpretation of the treaties of 1903, 1936, and 1955 between the United States and the Republic of Panama, with special reference to matters involving the provisions of such treaties concerning territorial sovereignty, shall only be made pursuant to treaty."

This resolution simply expresses the sense of the Congress that a matter of such potential and far-reaching importance be undertaken only after full consideration by both the Executive and that body of the Congress which is charged under the Constitution with the exercise of such responsibility.

We wish to maintain the best and most friendly relations with the people of Panama and we wish also to fulfill the great responsibility which we undertook with the construction of the canal. I am firmly convinced that the procedure called for in my resolution will eventually do more to help avoid misunderstandings with Panama than unilateral acts of grace by the executive branch alone.

CLARENCE S. WIBEL

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, tonight in Boston a testimonial dinner is being given for a very able and distinguished employee of the U.S. Government. On January 31, 1960, Mr. Clarence S. Wibel will retire from the Inspection Service of the U.S. Post Office by virtue of having reached the mandatory age limit of 70.

In his long and noteworthy career of over 50 years, Mr. Wibel has made many friends. These friends are honoring him tonight on his 70th birthday with this testimonial banquet. I wish so much that I could be in Boston tonight and join in the honoring of Mr. Wibel. However, due to a previous engagement here in the Capital which I have had for some time, I shall be unable to fly to Boston for this occasion. I would want to pay tribute to Mr. Wibel's lovely wife, who has been an inspiration.

During his career as chief inspector of the U.S. postal service in the Boston regional area, Mr. Wibel always has been extremely courteous and cooperative, not only with me but with everyone requiring his services. He has made a great contribution to the efficient operation of the U.S. post office in the Boston area.

Mr. Wibel's career in the postal service extends over a period of 51 years. He entered the service at the age of 18 as a substitute clerk in the Denver, Colo., post office at 30 cents an hour. Progressing through the ranks, Mr. Wibel attained the position of foreman in this office and in July of 1923 was appointed to the Inspection Service. He served as an inspector in St. Louis, Denver, and Washington, D.C., before coming to Boston in June 1937. On October 1, 1953, he became postal inspector in charge at the Boston office, which position he is now leaving by reason of reaching the mandatory age of 70 for retirement. His service in the Inspection Service has covered all fields encompassed by that branch of the Department.

It is interesting to note that following his first 6 months' assignment at Pine Bluff, Ark., his inspector in charge elatedly reported that Inspector Wibel had expressed no discontent with his territory, which had theretofore been a problem to man because of the high incidence of malaria. Subsequently Inspector Wibel was commended for his extraordinary industry in general and specifically for his tenaciousness in obtaining a confession from a postmaster who had faked a $1,000 holdup and claimed its proceeds.

In keeping with the pattern of industry and conduct he had demonstrated in the post office, Mr. Wibel progressed through the ranks of the service willingly accepting assignments regarded as undesirable by many and tackling the most difficult problems with vigor.

During his career he served in the St. Louis, Denver, Washington, and Boston divisions. In the mid-1930's his persistence and attention to detail brought about the recovery of $10,000 taken in a mailtruck holdup in Charlotte, N.C., and permitted the successful prosecution of a New Jersey doctor who had received the stolen money.

During the war years his initiative and insight into operating problems was of particular value in the Boston area in assisting in the establishment of facilities for mail for the Armed Forces in the face of trying manpower and equipment shortages.

It was in 1953 in recognition of his experience, leadership abilities, tact, and diplomacy he was appointed inspector in charge of the Boston Division, where he has continued to display untiring and loyal devotion to the principles of the service and deicated competence in the direction of its affairs in his area.

On January 31, 1960, Mr. Wibel will have completed 51 years in the employment of the U.S. Post Office. Over a half of a century is a long time. As an anecdote of interest, when he was first sworn into the postal service in 1908 by the assistant postmaster at Denver, the then young Wibel was told, "Young man, don't think this is a permanent appointment." After a half century, Mr. Wibel states this appointment was not permanent, it lasted only 51 years.

I believe the Congress would like to send congratulations to a great public servant, a great American—Inspector Clarence S. Wibel—and to his real helpmate and splendid son.

THE LATE A. B. GRAHAM

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of sadness that I announce to the House the death the day before yesterday, in Columbus, Ohio, of A. B. Graham, the father and the founder of the 4–H Clubs of America. He was 92 years old. He founded the first 4–H Club in a country school in Champaign County, of which he was a native in my district 58 years ago.

Just a few years ago the Government of the United States honored the 4–H Clubs and Mr. Graham by the issuance of a special postage stamp. He also headed up the first agricultural extension department of any university in this country, at Ohio State University.

Mr. Graham lived a long and honorable life, and was revered by all who knew him. Of course, his living monument will be the 4–H Clubs, which have done so much for the rural youngsters of this Nation.

The following article concerning Mr. Graham appeared in the Washington Post of January 16, 1960:

ORGANIZER OF 4–H CLUBS

COLUMBUS, OHIO, January 15.—A. B. Graham, 92, died in a suburban rest home last night, 58 years after he organized what became the world's first 4–H Club.

The movement, which began in Springfield, Ohio, on January 15, 1902, has since spread over the world.

Born on a farm near St. Paris, Champaign County, in 1868, Mr. Graham rose from the post of teacher of a one-room country school to become the first director of the agriculture extension at Ohio State University in 1905. He was the first full-time extension director in the Nation.

His club, organized in Springfield as a boys' and girls' agriculture club, was grouped under the name 4–H in 1930 with similar clubs.

Mr. Graham retired in 1938 after 23 years of developing methods of extension teaching for the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

AIRCRAFT CARRIERS

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, President Eisenhower has called upon Congress to reduce expenditures and balance the budget. I call upon the administration to collect the millions of dollars which aircraft companies owe to the people of the United States which the Federal Renegotiation Board has determined they have made as excess profits. On August 26, 1959, I brought to the attention of the House that certain aircraft companies were resisting the refund to our Government of the amount of excessive profits from payments made by the Federal Government. The law requires that these excessive profits be returned to the United States after the Federal Renegotiation Board has determined that the companies have overcharged the Federal Government.

Since Congress adjourned in September, determinations have been made by the Federal Renegotiation Board, and once again, we find aircraft companies which are the recipients of defense contracts by negotiation without competitive bidding, refusing to refund to the Government the taxes on excessive profits which they have earned.

I want to bring to the attention of this House the failure to cooperate on the part of the Boeing Airplane Co., the Martin Co., and Lockheed Aircraft Co. I also wish to bring to the attention of the House the fine cooperation of the Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp., which apparently has listened to the demands of the people and the Congressmen, and since my last speech made payment to the Government on taxes of $8,500,000 excessive profits which it owed for the years 1951 and 1953.

I wish to report that the Boeing Airplane Co., which received defense contracts from our Government in fiscal year 1958 to the extent of $2,131 million and for the fiscal year 1959, received in contracts $1,166,511,000, however, once again resisted payment to the Government of the taxes on $6,784,165 which it made in excessive profits in the year 1955. As I reported to you before, the Boeing Airplane Co. in the year 1954 made in excessive profits $10 million and refuses to make payment thereon.

The Martin Co., in fiscal year 1958, received $400,200,000 of defense contracts and in fiscal year 1959 received in defense contracts by negotiation and without competitive bidding $524,063,000. It was determined by the Federal Renegotiation Board that the Martin Co. earned in excess profits the sum of $3,500,000 in 1955. The Martin Co. has refused to pay to the people of the United States the taxes on the excessive profits of $6,250,000 earned in 1954, and now once again $3,500,000 on the excessive profits for the year 1955.

This is the same company which entertained many of the Pentagon officials and retired officers in the Bahamas, and saw nothing improper or untoward in the fact that a defense contractor entertained important Pentagon officials with whom it discussed the weapons procurement and contracts relative thereto.

In 1955 it was determined by the Federal Renegotiation Board that for the year 1955 Lockheed Aircraft Corp. earned $3,500,000 as excessive profits and owed the Government the taxes thereon. Lockheed Aircraft owes taxes on its $6 million excessive profits which it made in 1953 and the taxes on its $6 million excessive profits which it made in 1954. The total amount that it refuses to pay taxes on is $15,500,000.

Lockheed Aircraft Corp. is another one of the favorite companies of the defense contractors. For fiscal year 1958 it received $755,100,000 and for fiscal year 1959 it received $886,462,000 of defense contracts not given on a competitive basis.

The President should call upon these companies which are making tremendous profits from defense contracts to make refunds so that we need not borrow funds to pay them on their defense contracts to the extent of their indebtedness. Perhaps the retired military officers employed by these companies will use their influence to have them pay.

I commend the Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp., which I criticized in my speeech of August 26, 1959, because they have withdrawn their suits against the Government and have permitted the Government to collect on the bonds which guarantees the payment of taxes on the $8,500,000 of excessive profits which it made during 1951 and 1953.

I urge that the Attorney General act diligently in the collection of these claims for refunds against companies like Boeing Airplane Co., Lockheed Aircraft, and the Martin Co., and I once again urge the Defense Department not to favor those defense contractors who refuse to refund their excessive profits and cause this Government to borrow more money than necessary.

FREE ACCESS TO FEDERAL INFORMATION

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of every Member of Congress an excellent article by Dr. Clark Mollenhoff, who has long been in the forefront of the fight for free access to Federal information.

The article was published in the January 1960 issue of Nieman Reports and is based on the eighth annual Lovejoy lecture given at Colby College by Dr. Mollenhoff when the college awarded him an honorary doctorate of laws. It is one more in the series of magazine articles, newspaper stories, speeches, and other public pronouncements by Dr. Mollenhoff which are part of his aggressive attempts as a working reporter to find out the facts of Federal Government.

Last year, in the July 1959 issue of the Atlantic Monthly, an article by Dr. Mollenhoff outlined the dangers to a democratic society posed by the growing restrictions on information from the executive branch of the Federal Government. The effect of the Atlantic Monthly article has been noticeable. It contributed, I believe, to some of the developments in Congress which helped reassert the people's right to know about their Government. I hope Dr. Mollenhoff's most recent article will have a comparable effect.

The article follows:

SHIELD OF SECRECY—THE CLAIM OF EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE TO WITHHOLD INFORMATION

(By Clark Mollenhoff)

On the surface it would appear there are few threats to the free press today. Those who are critical of governmental officials or of the great institutions of our Nation do not have their presses smashed, nor are they likely to be subjected to the continuous personal harassment that resulted in the death of Elijah Parish Lovejoy.

Today there is the tendency in America to take our freedoms for granted. We assume that freedom of the press is so well established that it will always be with us. Our daily newspapers are filled with columns of print exposing wrongdoing, and criticizing the mistakes of judgment by our public officials, our labor leaders, our television performers and television executives. Many newspapers pride themselves on finding room for all points of view, and have demonstrated it by carrying columnists who are as far apart as the conservative David Lawrence and such a liberal as Marquis Childs.

Members of the public and many newspapermen are inclined to accept the idea that the American people are so steeped in the traditions of a free press and its part in a democracy that no public official would dare to attack our idealistic concept of an uncensored and independent press. There is the view that Americans, born and reared in this tradition, would rise in fury to strike down the Government officials who would seek to control or suppress the Nation's newspapers. We often hear it said that Americans, reared in an atmosphere of freedom, would not put up with the encroachments on liberty that have been forced on people behind the Iron Curtain. We are told that they would not put up with the kind of conditions that have stifled many freedoms in our own hemisphere.

It seems to me that this philosophy of the indomitable American presupposes that Americans are somehow braver, stronger, wiser, and more valiant than people living in other parts of the world. I would think that the present stage in the space race would teach us that Americans have no monopoly on wisdom, enterprise, strength, or know-how. For years we kidded ourselves into thinking, simply because we are Americans, with many advantages over the Russians, that we were guaranteed a long lead in the fields of nuclear weapons, aircraft, and space exploration. In recent years we have seen our lead dwindle and vanish while many of our leading scientists have complained that nonsensical security on many matters interfered with our scientific progress.

Now, many realists are willing to admit that we Americans have no guaranteed superiority in scientific areas. We have been forced to learn the hard way that the rate of accomplishment in scientific areas is tied pretty closely to our willingness to work, to study and make sacrifices.

There is little in our lazy, well-fed, luxury-loving attitudes of the present to make me believe that any great number of Americans have awakened to the recognition that we are not a super race. There is little to indicate that any large segment of the American people recognize that we must work and study to recognize when there are encroachments on our freedoms, or risk seeing these freedoms go down the drain as has our lead in the scientific field.

My concern today is over the apathy that exists toward serious encroachments on the right of access to information. It is an apathy that covers not only the general public but a good many representatives of the press. This lack of concern is either the result of a lack of knowledge of what a free press means to a democracy, lack of enough interest to dig in and learn where some arbitrary governmental secrecy policies can take us, or lack of guts to speak out.

It is time that more Americans recognize that we are no brighter, stronger, or more courageous than many people who have been crushed by totalitarian governments. We are only luckier—luckier because we are fortunate enough to be living in a free nation.

We are fortunate that the slogans of a free press are deeply enough rooted in our history that few American political figures would take the risk of any direct attack on the institution of the free press. I have no doubt that a direct attack on the free press would result in a loud outcry from the press itself, and from a few citizens. There is a recognition of the possibility of political repercussions from a direct assault on the press, and public officials are almost unanimous in giving at least lipservice to the concept of an uncensored press. But, many of these same public officials find indirect ways to control the information available to the press.

They also find subtle ways to influence or coerce reporters or columnists who are too aggressive and too critical.

What are the subtle methods used to influence the press?

There are the smooth public relations operators who are helpful to the point where some newsmen lean on them too much, and forget how to do their own digging and thinking.

There is the misuse of security classifications—top secret, secret, and confidential—to withhold information that should not be classified. This is a particularly effective means for officials in the Pentagon to cover up mistakes as well as improprieties. This overclassification is expensive from a standpoint of the extra cost to the Government where there is misuse of Government property or the rigging of Government contracts.

There are efforts to give the impression that material is being withheld for security reasons, when it is actually being withheld for political purposes.

There is the practice of officials being unavailable or slow in responding to calls from reporters who are regarded as critical of the administration in power.

There is the practice of granting special interviews or other privileges (such as invitations to the White House dinners) to reporters who are regarded as basically friendly.

Most important, there are the efforts to hide arbitrarily the records of executive agencies on grounds that some vague national interest unconnected with security is involved in refusing to divulge confidential executive communications.

We of the press must accept the fact that an aggressive press will always be faced with some obstructions or harassment. Regardless of which political party is in power, there will always be some men in the administration who will adopt the attitude that public business is not the public's business.

I would like to emphasize at this point that I do not believe the press is entitled to any special access to information. We should be entitled to the same access that every citizen should have in a democracy if the citizen is to inform himself on how officials are handling his Government.

I would also like to warn that the freedom of the press and the rights of citizens in a democracy are not an issue when a woman columnist refuses to tell a court the source of her hearsay information on the temperament or excessive weight of a movie and television actress. Gossip columns, comics, and a good many other features in our newspapers are mainly froth to attract readers, and have little connection with the real purpose of a free press—the informing of the public on the conduct of Government and on other matters that are vital to the general welfare.

Labor organizations operate under the privileges of special laws. The steel industry is a basic industry, tied to our national defense and to the public welfare. Television channels operate on Government licenses, and represent a powerful force in molding public opinion. These are areas in which the press and the public have an interest second only to the conduct of public affairs by Government officials.

Government secrecy represents our major reason for concern today.

A few of these secrecy-minded officials are malicious and tyrannical despots with no real concept of the responsibility to the public that is inherent in the operation of a true democracy. Such figures can grow even in a democracy.

But, I would say that a majority of those who erect secrecy barriers are well-meaning, but misguided and shortsighted.

These secrecy fanatics include men who believe a near totalitarian type of censorship is needed to protect U.S. secrets from the Kremlin. Read the testimony before the congressional committees and you will see who they are.

There are other secrecy fiends who rationalize the hiding of matters that have no connection with military secrecy on grounds that information released by the Government will be slanted or twisted by political enemies. They rationalize their own slanting of Government press releases on grounds it is really in the national interest.

There is also the secrecy group that argues that secret discussions of governmental problems result in greater efficiency, and more frank discussions of different viewpoints.

Each of these groups overlooks the long documented record of how secrecy has been used to cover up corruption in Government. They disregard the basic right of the public to know the arguments involved in a decision to award contracts or dispense other rights, unless some real military security problem is involved.

There are some reporters and editors who will tell you that there is no real problem in obtaining information in Washington.

It may be true that some reporters and editors have run into no secrecy barriers. There is no problem of obtaining information that is favorable to an administration that is in power. There is usually no problem of obtaining access even to the busiest individuals if they are reasonably sure they are to be the subject of articles puffing their importance.

The problem of access to information arises when officials know (or suspect) that the inquiring reporter may unearth facts that are not wholly complimentary to the administration, or when the reporter is known to have been critical of the administration.

Point out the newsman who says he has no trouble obtaining information, and it is likely the subject will fit one of these patterns:

1. A reporter or editor who has been largely a patsy for the administration.

2. A reporter or editor who lacks either the imagination or the energy to go behind the self-serving declarations of agency press releases.

Reporters who are considered friends of the administration in power may have a few exclusive stories dropped in their laps in return for understanding and uncritical treatment.

By contrast, there are often efforts at retaliation against those who are critical of the administration in power. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt went so far as to summon Lyle Wilson, United Press Bureau chief, to the White House in a direct effort to kill a story. Roosevelt also threatened reprisal against the United Press if Wilson did not give in to his demands, but Wilson refused. Occasionally, Presidents since then have been equally blunt.

But, it is seldom that a President will take such direct action as to summon a reporter or editor to the White House. More common are the subtle efforts of lesser officials to interfere with the reporter, to ridicule or undermine his work, to erect barriers that interfere with him on even routine assignments.

The New York Times occupies a unique position that makes its reporters less susceptible to the pressures of Federal officials than other newspapers. It is a paper read in Washington and in the embassies all over the world. It has a voice that is loud as well as respected and feared by official Washington.

Yet, some reporters for this mighty newspaper find themselves subjected to subtle pressures when they are critical of the administration. Bureau Chief James Reston has been highly critical of the Eisenhower administration's foreign policy, and its conduct of other matters. Although Reston was highly critical of the foreign policy of the late John Foster Dulles, the New York Times Bureau chief praises Dulles for "never taking any step to cut off my sources of information."

However, there were others in the administration who were not so understanding of the role of a critical press in a democracy. Reston's critical comments were met with hostility in some quarters, and with subtle harassment by officials who were unavailable for interviews and dilatory or unavailable on telephone calls.

Columnist Walter Lippmann, speaking from the experience of his 70 years, commented before the National Press Club this fall on the tendency of Government "insiders" to ridicule criticism from outside Government as coming from ignoramuses—persons who don't have access to the conferences and secret files of the Government.

Lippmann declares that formidable as this criticism is, he has no trouble getting the better of it:

"I tell the critic, you be careful. You will be denouncing the principle of democracy itself, which asserts that the outsiders shall be sovereign over the insiders. For you will be showing that the people themselves, since they are ignoramuses because they are outsiders, are therefore incapable of governing themselves."

Furthermore, Lippmann declared that as far as the affairs of the world are concerned, those who regard themselves as insiders are actually outsiders since none of them read all of the U.S. papers and they have no access to the records of foreign governments that are equally important if one is to have the total wisdom the insiders indicate they have.

Columnists Drew Pearson and Joseph Alsop report that when they were critical of Government policies and personalities, they found themselves subjected to investigations by agents of the FBI and other Government bureaus. They contended that no breach of security was involved but that they were subjected to probes to dry up their sources of information.

On the local level, the Arkansas Gazette found itself the target of the barbs of Gov. Orval Faubus for aggressive opposition to Faubus on the explosive issue of the Little Rock schools. Despite the fact that the paper found its circulation cut and its advertising revenue off sharply, the publisher and editor stuck with their position to win an expensive victory.

Executive editor Harry Ashmore left the Gazette this fall. He had won his battle, but he was aware that the bitterness of the integration fight had left scars that would remain as long as he directed the editorial policy of the newspaper.

Wallace Turner and William Lambert, reporters for the Portland Oregonian, tackled the corruption in local politics and the mighty Teamsters Union. They found themselves and their newspaper subject to immediate attacks and a series of libel actions that might have terrorized a less courageous editorial department.

Vance Trimble, reporter for the Scripps-Howard syndicate, had no more than started his series on the nepotism on congressional payrolls when he was subjected to vicious attacks from Congress. Fortunately, many newspaper groups rallied behind Trimble's effort, and an atmosphere was created that forced many Members of Congress to drop relatives from the payroll or to cut their salaries. The impact of public opinion also forced the Senate to adopt new rules opening Senate office payrolls for public inspection.

As head of Sigma Delta Chi Freedom of Information Committee, V. M. (Red) Newton, managing editor of the Tampa Tribune, lashed out at the secrecy that covered spending of counterpart funds. He was immediately subjected to a personal attack by members of the House Administration Committee. That crusade to open these spending records has been unsuccessful so far, but Newton and others are still pushing for open records on this congressional spending.

The term "managing the news" was used by James B. Reston in explaining to the Moss subcommittee his complaint about Government information practices. Reston, whose work has been largely in the foreign affairs field, was objecting to the practice of releasing selective facts to present the favorable picture the administration wanted to get across to the public. He complained that barriers were erected to block those who sought further facts that were inconsistent with the picture presented in the "managed news."

In the foreign affairs field and in some other areas, the "managing of the news" can be accomplished by misusing security classifications to cover part of the facts.

In fields where national security cannot be used to hide the facts, a new device has come into wide use for managing the news. It is the claim by the executive branch of Government that it has some inherent right to refuse arbitrarily to produce any records or give any testimony that includes advice or recommendations in the executive agencies.

The Eisenhower administration has pressed this broad secrecy doctrine with the argument that all communications containing advice or recommendations are confidential executive business. The administration claims some inherent extensive privilege to hide such communications from the press, the public, committees of Congress and even from auditors of the General Accounting Office.

Leonard J. Saccio, acting International Cooperation Administration Director, testified before the Hennings Subcommittee that he believed this so-called executive privilege gave the ICA the authority to withhold practically every document in the agency from the Government Accounting Office auditors.

"If ICA wanted to apply the executive privilege, GAO would not see one thing because practically every document in our agency has an opinion or a piece of advice," Saccio testified.

No agency in the executive branch has carried this arbitrary executive secrecy to the extreme point Saccio says it could be carried. However, the testimony by Saccio was an admission from within the executive department of the danger inherent in a doctrine that any executive department official can withhold any document that includes advice or recommendations.

It may be that some have such faith in the present administration that they feel quite content to have that administration exercise an arbitrary power to refuse to produce records for the Congress, the GAO, the press and the public. However, it would be well to question whether they want such unchecked power to conceal records lodged in the hands of some other administration.

If you are a Republican, ask yourself if you would feel comfortable in letting the administration of a Franklin Roosevelt, Harry Truman, Jack Kennedy, or Hubert Humphrey put up such a barrier to congressional investigators or the GAO.

If you are a Democrat, ask yourself if you want the administration of a RICHARD NIXON to have such a total arbitrary power to withhold records of Government actions.

It is only by viewing the power of arbitrary executive secrecy in the hands of the other political party that many can test their true reaction to such a broad claim of a right to refuse to produce records.

Apply the doctrine of arbitrary executive secrecy to the Teapot Dome scandals of the Harding administration. Then you will see how the claim of arbitrary executive secrecy could have been used to conceal these notorious scandals.

The oil scandals of the Harding administration involved communications between Secretary of Navy Denby and Secretary of Interior Fall. Had a claim of arbitrary secrecy been invoked, it would have been impossible for Senator Thomas Walsh, the Montana Democrat, to establish the fact that eventually sent Secretary of Interior Fall to prison.

Assume that the Truman administration officials had claimed a precedent of executive privilege and refused to give testimony or produce records on the tax scandals. The communications between top officials in the White House, Justice Department and Treasury would have remained buried, along with the crimes involving some of the highest officials of the huge tax-collecting agency.

In 1948 there were some restricted efforts by the Truman administration to bar congressional investigations from some executive department records. The personnel records of William Remington were withheld under a general executive order placing loyalty files outside of the reach of congressional committees. William P. Rogers, now the Attorney General, was then the chief counsel for the Senate committee investigating Remington. Rogers presided over the preparation of a report that was highly critical of this executive secrecy.

Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, then a young Congresman from California, had some sharp comments to make about this limited withholding of records by the Truman administration. NIXON said:

"The point has been made that the President of the United States has issued an order that none of this information (on Remington) can be released and therefore the Congress has no right to question the judgment of the President.

I say that that proposition cannot stand from a constitutional standpoint or on the basis of the merit for this very good reason. That would mean that the President could have arbitrarily issued an executive order in the Meyers case, the Teapot Dome case, or in any other case denying the Congress information it needed to conduct an investigation of the executive department and the Congress would have no right to question his decision.

NIXON was only one of many prominent Republicans who attacked this executive secrecy at the time. By contrast, a good many high ranking Democrats—including House Speaker SAM RAYBURN, of Texas—were defending the secrecy of the Truman administration. Many Democrats who were inclined to defend the secrecy in the Truman administration are now highly critical of the Eisenhower administration for merely extending the same basic principle. It demonstrates that political expediency has a tendency to encroach on the views of our elected representatives and to color their thinking. The press and the public cannot depend on either political party to be the beacon of right where their freedoms are involved.

After the Truman administration was so severely criticized by Republicans for imposing unjustified secrecy, it was amazing to see a Republican administration lay down a claim to a right of arbitrary executive secrecy that is broader than any similar claim in our history.

The new secrecy doctrine was made public in connection with the Army-McCarthy hearings on May 17, 1954—the same day the U.S. Supreme Court pronounced its historic ruling against racial segregation in public schools. The fact that the Supreme Court ruled on segregation on that day did not bury the colorful Army-McCarthy hearings or the fact that officials of the executive branch were refusing to give testimony before a committee of Congress.

President Eisenhower, in a letter to Defense Secretary Charles E. Wilson, authorized Army Counsel John Adams to refuse to relate conversations with Presidential Assistant Sherman Adams and William P. Rogers, then the Deputy Attorney General. The President wrote that in his view members of the executive branch should not be required to testify on conversations and communications with other members of the executive branch where recommendations and advice were involved.

Many large newspapers—still hysterical with the fear of the McCarthy era—saw this letter only as a blow at Senator Joseph McCarthy. If McCarthy wanted the testimony, then these newspapers were opposed to it. Unthinking editorial writers praised the Eisenhower letter as some new and brilliant statement of the separation of powers doctrine. Only a few looked behind the minor inconvenience it presented to McCarthy in his television battle with the Army and saw the full claim of arbitrary executive secrecy it embodied. Since then, many have changed their views.

The full threat inherent in Eisenhower's May 17, 1954, letter did not become apparent immediately. It took months and even years before it became clear that the administration would use that letter as a precedent for refusing a wide variety of information to the press, to a dozen congressional committees, and to the General Accounting Office.

Sherman Adams refused to testify in a congressional hearing on the Dixon-Yates case on grounds that his activities were all confidential executive business. His action was to set the pattern for officials of more than a dozen agencies of Government to inform Congress and the GAO that important records and testimony would not be produced. A half dozen committees of Congress prepared reports castigating this arbitrary withholding of testimony and documents.

The refusal of the executive branch to make certain evaluation reports and inspectors general reports available to the GAO and committees of Congress has become a major barrier to investigations of the Defense Department and foreign aid spending.

Comptroller General Joseph Campbell, an appointee of the Eisenhower administration, has declared that the withholding of documents was hindering the GAO in the performance of its statutory duties and could be almost fatal to the GAO's effectiveness.

The Moss Government Operations Subcommittee on Government Information has lashed out at the withholding from GAO as being a violation of the law since the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 provides that all agencies must turn over all records requested by the GAO auditors.

In recent months, liberals as well as conservatives in Congress have become concerned over evidence indicating that the executive secrecy has covered up fraud and mismanagement in the foreign aid program. Even a rider tied to the foreign aid appropriations bill has not changed the administration's position.

The President has continued to provide a blanket secrecy shield to evaluation reports and inspectors general reports with a vague comment that the withholding is "in the national interest."

Some Members of Congress are so concerned that they are proposing to tighten the law and withhold all funds from those agencies that do not make full reports to the GAO on their spending and activities. This is a serious step, but many Members of Congress feel that this matter has reached a serious stage.

The concern of Congress is not so much over what has been withheld as it is worry over where this broad claim of a right to withhold records may lead at some future time. Members of Congress recognize that in the wrong hands the precedent could become a major tool in forming an executive dictatorship.

They know that it has been necessary to keep a constant surveillance over military spending—now 60 percent of our budget—to expose corruption and force action against officials involved in the corruption.

As we have greater expenditures and more complex operations of our Government, we need more congressional investigations to burrow constantly into the activities of our public officials. The press needs the skill and the power of congressional committees to spotlight the big problem areas in our society.

Congress and the GAO need the power to obtain records and testimony from those public officials in the executive departments who are responsible for administration and enforcement of laws.

This is a great issue of freedom in our time. It goes to the question of the right of Congress to serve as a check on the executive department's activities. It goes to the question of whether a free people are entitled to information on the activities of Government when no question of national security is involved.

This year, in this administration, it may represent only an inconvenience to the press, an irritant to congressional investigators and an impediment to efficient work by the GAO auditors.

But, what could such a precedent of arbitrary executive secrecy do under some later administration that may be less kindly in its basic outlook?

FLOOD CONTROL PROBLEMS AT CANTON, OHIO, AND NEIGHBORING AREAS

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include related matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, I have today submitted to the Committee on Public Works a suggested resolution to authorize a study by the Corps of Engineers of the very serious flood problems at Canton, Ohio, and neighboring areas.

It was just a year ago that a rainfall of 3.23 inches during a 24-hour period, at a time when the ground was frozen and unable to absorb additional moisture, caused the most damaging flood in over 40 years. More than 800 people were evacuated from their homes in Canton, Louisville, Waynesburg, Minerva, and Malvern, and property damage was estimated in the millions of dollars.

I immediately requested the advice of the Corps of Engineers, the Ohio Department of Natural Resources, and the Muskingum Conservancy District to investigate possibilities of flood control in Stark County, and have been in correspondence with these officials from time to time since.

Some months ago I called upon local officials to take action in the matter, and I am glad to report that a general meeting was called by Mayor Charles Babcock at which representatives of all interested groups, State and Federal agencies, and the mayor's flood committee discussed the problem. Considerable credit is due Carl F. Schoenbaum, chairman of the committee, and his associates for their carefully prepared report.

We hope that the Public Works Committee will act quickly to authorize the review report, and that the Corps of Engineers will be able to rcommend a sound and feasible project to control flooding in Stark County.

Meanwhile, I have urged the mayor and other officials to continue to explore all other possibilities, including a watershed project in cooperation with the Soil Conservation Service. Mr. Marion DeHoff, chairman of the Stark County Soil Conservation District, has stated his willingness to cooperate with officials of the urban areas in this work.

Many other areas of Ohio have demonstrated that floods can be controlled and that many benefits accrue from proper soil and water management. I am confident we can be equally successful in meeting and solving this serious problem in Canton.

JANUARY 16, 1960.

Hon. CHARLES A. BUCKLEY,
Chairman, Committee on Public Works,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am submitting herewith a suggested resolution to authorize a study by the Corps of Engineers of the very serious flood problems in the city of Canton, Ohio, and nearby areas including the towns of Louisville, Minerva, Waynesburg, and Malvern.

Just a year ago, January 17, 1959, after a rainfall of 3.23 inches in a 24-hour period, severe flooding in this area forced the evacuation of about 800 people in the communities concerned and property damage of several million dollars. The situation was repeated in February, and certain areas are flooded whenever there is a heavy rainfall.

Following my suggestion, the mayor of Canton called a meeting of all local officials concerned, representatives of industry, and of the State of Ohio, the Soil Conservation Service and the U.S. Corps of Engineers. There was full discussion of all possible methods of providing flood control and it was determined that we should seek the assistance of the Corps of Engineers. Mayor Charles Babcock of Canton called on me last week and assured me the city stands ready to provide rights of way and any other local contributions that might be required should a regular flood control project be developed.

Accordingly, I am most hopeful that your committee can approve a resolution authorizing a review report at an early date. I will be glad to furnish any factual information the committee may desire.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK T. BOW,
Member of Congress.

SUGGESTED RESOLUTION, COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS, U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Resolved by the Committee on Public Works of the House of Representatives, United States, That the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors be, and is hereby, requested to review the reports on the Ohio River, submitted in House Document No. 306, 74th Congress, 1st session, with a view to determining the advisability at this time of improvements for flood control and allied purposes on Nimishillen Creek and its tributaries at and in the vicinity of Canton, Ohio.

SPECIAL ORDER FOR OBSERVANCE OF RESTORATION OF INDEPENDENCE OF LITHUANIA

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on February 16, on the occasion of the 42d observance of the independence of Lithuania, that after the reading and approval of the Journal, and prior to any legislative business for that day, I may have permission to address the House for 1 hour and to yield time to other Members.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

QUALITY STABILIZATION BILL

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have this day introduced a bill called the quality stabilization bill. The quality stabilization bill should not be confused with fair trade legislation in any of its forms.

Surely it can be seen clearly by all that everybody, including business, labor, and the public, is certain to benefit by the proposed establishment of a simple, direct, and inexpensive method of protecting against the destructive results of predatory discounter pricing.

It is vastly different from fair trade legislation previously considered by Congress. The quality stabilization bill is not price fixing in any sense of the word. Under the proposed legislation the consumer will have complete freedom of choice. This bill will enable the consumer to choose between products varying widely as to price and as to quality, while giving the manufacturer the means, if he so chooses, to stabilize the quality of his product by stabilizing its price.

Discounter raids upon public respect for manufacturers' trademarks harm not only big manufacturers. They destroy, sometimes almost overnight, the business of smaller manufacturers who are unable to adopt the costly substitutes for price stabilizing available always to wealthy manufacturers. Discounters also are destroying the business and livelihood of those hundreds of thousands of smaller wholesalers and retailers who constitute the very backbone of the American system of distribution.

The quality stabilization bill, provides only for an honest, specific retail price, to be established by the manufacturer and to be available uniformly to all citizens, whether rich or poor.

The quality stabilization bill provides that a manufacturer may protect his property rights in his trademark simply by revoking—by mail, if desired—the right of an offending reseller to make any further use of, or reference to, the trademark. However, the manufacturer may take such action only if the reseller sells either up or down from the specific price made known by the manufacturer as representing an honest value he desires to maintain competitively through the stabilization of the quality of his product, or if the reseller resorts to certain misrepresentations expressly condemned in the bill.

Extensive surveys have proved that when discounters select a widely known and respected product for price bait they force the manufacturer to strive constantly to reduce the cost and quality of that product, as a means of reducing its price to meet competitive prices forced constantly lower by the discounter.

This quality squeeze forced by discounter pricing inevitably injures factory labor employed in the industry affected. Surveys show frightened manufacturers laying off employees to make 15 men do the work of 20. Naturally, a manufacturer under the vicious squeeze of discounter prices has constantly less and less opportunity to improve wages or working conditions. Labor finds the dollar harder to get, and finds it gets less in real value per dollar in the products labor must buy.

To avoid further misleading confusion of quality stabilization with so-called fair trade a separate hearing will be requested for the quality stabilization bill. I am advised by the best of counsel that, with the quality stabilization bill enacted, neither manufacturer, reseller, nor the public would have any reason to rely upon any State fair trade act or upon any proposed Federal fair trade law.

And let me repeat that the bill permits the manufacturer to revoke the right of any reseller to make any further reference to, or use of, the manufacturer's distinguishing brand, name, or trademark, if the reseller sells either above or below the manufacturer's specified price, or commits other abuses, of public confidence or of the manufacturer's trademark rights, condemned in the bill.

Growing appreciation of the true meaning of the above facts is bringing increased support for quality stabilization, by manufacturers, and by reseller organizations, as well as by Members of Congress being urged to act for the protection of the public.

For the protection of all those rightfully concerned, and of the integrity of the traditional American business system, the bill should be enacted with a minimum of delay.

STABILIZING SUPPORT LEVELS FOR TOBACCO

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill which, in my opinion, will be of great help and advantage to the entire tobacco industry. The purpose of the bill is to stabilize the support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and the upward spiral in recent years due to the operation of modernized parity formula. The bill provides for adjustments for changes in farm costs so that the level of support will rise or fall in direct proportion to changes in prices paid by farmers for commodities purchased, using the previous 3-year moving average as a base.

Briefly, the bill provides that the tobacco support level in 1960 be the same as in 1959 and that in subsequent years the support price be adjusted from the 1959 level. This bill if enacted into law should be a great factor in the retention of the foreign markets for our tobacco. It will let the exporters, the dealers, and the foreign manufacturers know that for the foreseeable future they will be able to obtain ample quantities of choice Virginia-type tobacco at a fair price and a price that will compete with foreign-grown tobacco.

Mr. Speaker, the bill that I have introduced carries out fully the recommendations of the Tobacco Industry Committee which appeared before the Tobacco Subcommittee of the House Agriculture Committee last Thursday, January 14. It is my understanding that the entire tobacco industry favors this legislation. I hope very much that we can get an early report from the Department of Agriculture as to its position on this legislation so that the Tobacco Subcommittee will be in a position to act on this legislation in the next week or two.

PROVIDING FOR EXCLUSION OR DEPORTATION OF ALIENS FOR VIOLATION OF LAWS RELATING TO ILLICIT POSSESSION OF MARIHUANA AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 9385) to provide for the exclusion or deportation of any alien convicted of any law relating to illicit possession of marihuana, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 212(a)(23) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, as amended (66 Stat. 184; 70 Stat. 575; 8 U.S.C. 1182(a)(23)), is further amended by changing the language "narcotic drugs," to read "narcotic drugs or marihuana,".

SEC. 2. Section 241(a)(11) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, as amended (66 Stat. 206, 70 Stat. 575; 8 U.S.C. 1251(a)(11)), is further amended by changing the language "narcotic drugs," to read "narcotic drugs or marihuana,".

SEC. 3. Section 245(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, as amended (66 Stat.

217, 72 Stat. 699, 8 U.S.C. 1255(a)), is further amended to read as follows:

"(a) The status of an alien, other than an alien crewman, who was inspected and admitted or paroled into the United States may be adjusted by the Attorney General, in his discretion and under such regulations as he may prescribe, to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence if (1) the alien makes an application for such adjustment, (2) the alien is eligible to receive an immigrant visa and is admissible to the United States for permanent residence, and (3) an immigrant visa is immediately available to him at the time his application is approved."

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 16, insert:

SEC. 4. Section 203(a)(1) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, as amended, is further amended to read as follows:

"(1) The first 50 per centum of the quota of each quota area for such year, plus any portion of such quota not required for the issuance of immigrant visas to the classes specified in paragraphs (2) and (3), shall be made available for the issuance of immigrant visas to qualified quota immigrants whose services are determined by the Attorney General to be needed urgently in the United States because of the high education, technical training, specialized experience, or exceptional ability of such immigrants and to be substantially beneficial prospectively to the national economy, cultural interests, or welfare of the United States. Immigrants who are the spouse or children of any immigrant described in this paragraph shall be held to be nonquota immigrants if accompanying or following to join him."

SEC. 5. The Immigration and Nationality Act is amended by adding thereto sections 208, 209, and 210, to read as follows:

"SEC. 208. The alien fiance or fiancee of a citizen of the United States may be issued a visa and admitted into the United States as a temporary visitor under section 101(a)(15)(B) for a period of three months (unless in exceptional circumstances this period is extended by the Attorney General): Provided, That (a) the alien is not otherwise ineligible to receive a visa or excludable from admission into the United States;

"(b) the Attorney General finds that the alien is coming to the United States with a bona fide intention of being married to a citizen of the United States; and

"(c) the Attorney General finds that the parties to the proposed marriage are able and intend to contract a valid marriage within the period for which the alien is admitted.

"SEC. 209. In the event the marriage does not occur within the period for which the alien is admitted, the alien shall be required to depart from the United States, and upon failure to do so shall be deported at any time after entry in accordance with the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 210. (a) In prescribing regulations for the administration of the provisions of section 208 of this act the Secretary of State shall include a requirement that the parties to a proposed marriage shall furnish satisfactory evidence to the American consular officer concerned, including sworn statements corroborated by other appropriate evidence showing that the parties have entered into a valid agreement to marry and are legally able and actually willing to conclude a valid marriage in the United States within a period of three months after the alien's arrival, or within such period as may be extended by the Attorney General.

"(b) In prescribing regulations for the administration of sections 208 and 209 of this act in connection with the arrival of the aliens concerned, at ports of entry in the United States the Attorney General shall include a requirement that the prospective American citizen spouse of an alien covered by the provisions of section 208 shall furnish to the Attorney General a suitable bond, which shall be in an amount sufficient to cover the cost of the deportation of the alien concerned, and which shall be forfeited to the United States if and when the alien becomes deportable, or shall be canceled by the Attorney General upon receipt of satisfactory evidence that a valid marriage has been concluded, or that the alien has left the United States without expense to the said United States."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NINTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 300)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Science and Astronautics and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 507, 81st Congress, I transmit herewith the Ninth Annual Report of the National Science Foundation for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 18, 1960.

BUDGET FOR THE FISCAL YEAR 1961—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 255)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, together with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

With this message, transmitting the Budget of the United States for the fiscal year 1961, I invite the Congress to join with me in a determined effort to achieve a substantial surplus. This will make possible a reduction in the national debt. The proposals in this budget demonstrate that this objective can be attained while at the same time maintaining required military strength and enhancing the national welfare.

This budget attests to the strength of America's economy. At the same time, the budget is a test of our resolve, as a nation, to allocate our resources prudently, to maintain the Nation's security, and to extend economic growth into the future without inflation.

In highlight, this budget proposes:

1. Revenues of $84 billion and expenditures of $79.8 billion, leaving a surplus of $4.2 billion. This surplus should be applied to debt reduction, which I believe to be a prime element in sound fiscal policy for the Nation at this time.

2. New appropriations for the military functions of the Department of Defense amounting to $40.6 billion, and expenditures of $41 billion. These expenditures, which will be slightly higher than the 1960 level, will provide the strong and versatile defense which we require under prevailing world conditions.

3. Increased appropriations (including substantial restoration of congressional reductions in the 1960 budget), and a virtual doubling of expenditures, for nonmilitary space projects under the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. This furthers our plans to keep moving ahead vigorously and systematically with our intensive program of scientific exploration and with the development of the large boosters essential to the conquest of outer space.

4. Nearly $4.2 billion in new appropriations for mutual security programs, an increase of about $950 million above appropriations for the current year, with an increase of $100 million in expenditures. This increase in program is needed to accelerate economic and technical assistance, chiefly through the Development Loan Fund, and to strengthen free world forces, in particular the forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, with advanced weapons and equipment.

5. A record total of expenditures $1.2 billion, for water resources projects under the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation. In addition to funds for going work, this amount provides for the initiation of 42 new high-priority projects, which will require $38 million in new appropriations for 1961, and will cost a total of $496 million over a period of years.

6. Substantially higher expenditures in a number of categories which under present laws are relatively uncontrollable, particularly $9.6 billion for interest; $3.9 billion to help support farm prices and income; $3.8 billion for veterans compensation and pensions; and $2.4 billion in aid to State and local governments for public assistance and employment security activities. The aggregate increase in these relatively uncontrollable expenditures is more than $1 billion over 1960.

7. Research and development expenditures of $8.4 billion—well over one-half of the entire Nation's expenditures, public and private, for these purposes—in order to assure a continuing strong and modern defense and to stimulate basic research and technological progress.

8. Recommendations for prompt legislative action to increase taxes on highway and aviation fuels, and to raise postal rates. These measures are needed to place on the users a proper share of the rising costs of the Federal airways and postal service, and to support the highway program at an increased level.

9. Recommendations to extend for another year present corporation income and excise tax rates.

10. A constructive legislative program to achieve improvements in existing laws relating to governmental activities and to initiate needed actions to improve and safeguard the interests of our people.

In short, this budget and the proposals it makes for legislative action provide for significant advances in many aspects of national security and welfare. The budget presents a balanced program which recognizes the priorities appropriate within an aggregate of Federal expenditures that we can soundly support.

I believe that the American people have made their wishes clear: The Federal Government should conduct its financial affairs with a high sense of responsibility, vigorously meeting the Nation's needs and opportunities within its proper sphere while at the same time exercising a prudent discipline in matters of borrowing and spending, and in incurring liabilities for the future.

BUDGET TOTALS

During the present fiscal year we have made encouraging progress in achieving sound fiscal policy objectives. The deficit of $12.4 billion in fiscal 1959, which was largely caused by the recession, is expected to be followed by a surplus of $217 million in the current year. To safeguard this small surplus, I am directing all Government departments and agencies to exercise strict controls over the expenditure of Federal funds. Even so, the slender margin of surplus can be attained only if economic growth is not interrupted.

For the fiscal year 1961, I am proposing a budget surplus of $4.2 billion to be applied to debt retirement. In my judgment this is the only sound course. Unless some amounts are applied to the reduction of debt in prosperous periods, we can expect an ever larger public debt if future emergencies or recessions again produce deficits.

In times of prosperity, such as we anticipate in the coming year, sound fiscal and economic policy requires a budget surplus to help counteract inflationary pressures, to ease conditions in capital and credit markets, and to increase the supply of savings available for the productive investment so essential to continued economic growth.

The budget recommendations for 1961 lay the groundwork for a sound and flexible fiscal policy in the years ahead. A continuance of economic prosperity in 1962 and later years can be expected to bring with it further increases in Federal revenues. If expenditures are held to the levels I am proposing for 1961 and reasonable restraint is exercised in the future, higher revenues in later years will give the next administration and the next Congress the choice they should rightly have in deciding between reductions in the public debt and lightening of the tax burden, or both. Soundly conceived tax revision can then be approached on a comprehensive and orderly basis, rather than by haphazard piecemeal changes, and can be accomplished within a setting of economic and fiscal stability.

Budget expenditures in 1961 are estimated at $79.8 billion, which is $1.4 billion more than the 1960 level. The total increase is attributable to (1) an increase of more than $1 billion in relatively uncontrollable expenditures for farm price supports fixed by law, interest on the public debt, veterans compensation and pensions, and public assistance grants, and (2) an increase of about $500 million in expenditures because of commitments made in prior years for Federal housing programs, for civil public works projects and other construction, for loans under the mutual security program, and for other programs.

New activities and expansion of certain other programs have been included on a selective basis of need. These increases are offset by reductions in other existing programs, including the proposed elimination of the postal deficit.

New obligational authority recommended for the fiscal year 1961 totals $79.4 billion. This is $306 million less than the amounts already enacted and recommended for 1960, and $401 million less than estimated expenditures in 1961.

Budget receipts under existing and proposed legislation are expected to rise substantially to $84 billion in 1961. This compares with the revised estimate of $78.6 billion for 1960 and actual receipts of $68.3 billion in 1959.

MANAGEMENT OF THE PUBLIC DEBT

Achievement of the proposed budget surplus will provide an opportunity to offset part of the deficits incurred in the fiscal years 1958 and 1959 largely because of the recession. The corresponding reduction of the public debt will reduce Government competition with private industry, individuals, and State and local governments for investment funds and will help ease the pressure on interest rates. Along with the recommended removal of the interest rate ceiling on long-term Federal debt, this will help hold down budget expenditures for interest, which now amount to almost one-eighth of the whole budget.

Statutory debt limit: It is estimated that the public debt, which stood at $284.7 billion on June 30, 1959, will be $284.5 billion on June 30, 1960, and will decline to $280 billion at the end of fiscal 1961. Thus, the budget surplus estimated for fiscal 1961 will permit the Government to end the year with desirable operating leeway within the permanent debt limit of $285 billion. However, the fluctuating seasonal pattern in receipts will again require a temporary increase in the debt limit during the fiscal year 1961, since the present temporary limit of $295 billion expires on June 30, 1960. It is expected that the request for a new temporary limit will be for less than the present $295 billion if the Congress accepts my budgetary proposals.

Interest ceiling: Effective management of a debt of this size requires a reasonable distribution among securities maturing at different times. Three-fourths of all marketable Treasury securities outstanding today come due in less than five years, of which $80 billion will mature in less than a year. As long as the rate that would have to be paid on newly issued bonds exceeds the present statutory ceiling of 4¼%, it is impossible to issue and sell any marketable securities of over five years' maturity.

Exclusive reliance on borrowing in a limited sector of the market is an expensive and inefficient way to manage the debt. Inflationary pressures increase as the volume of short-term and, hence, highly liquid securities mounts, especially if these securities are acquired by commercial banks. Further, effective monetary policy becomes more difficult when the Treasury has to refinance often. To make possible prudent and flexible management of the public debt, to permit sale of a modest amount of intermediate and longer term bonds when market conditions warrant such action, and to keep the average maturity of the debt from constantly shortening, it is imperative that the Congress immediately act to remove the 42-year-old 4¼-percent limitation on interest rates on Government securities maturing after 5 years.

BUDGET RECEIPTS

Estimated budget receipts of $84 billion in the fiscal year 1961 assume a high and rising level of economic activity in calendar year 1960. Specifically, this revenue estimate is consistent with an increase in the gross national product from about $480 billion for calendar 1959 to about $510 billion for calendar 1960. Personal incomes and corporate profits are expected to rise considerably beyond last year's levels, which were depressed somewhat by the long duration of the steel strike. The accompanying table shows the sources of Government receipts for the fiscal years 1959, 1960, and 1961.

Budget receipts

(See special analysis B in pt. IV of this document)

[Fiscal years. In billions]

Source	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Individual income taxes	$36.7	$40.3	$43.7
Corporation income taxes	17.3	22.2	23.5
Excise taxes	8.5	9.1	9.5
All other receipts	5.8	7.0	7.3
Total	68.3	78.6	84.0

The estimates for 1961 assume (1) extension of present tax rates and (2) the adoption of modifications recommended last year for certain tax laws. These are summarized in the following paragraphs.

Extension of present tax rates: In order to maintain Federal revenues, it is necessary that the present tax rates on corporation profits and certain excises be extended for another year beyond their scheduled expiration date of June 30, 1960. The scheduled reductions in the excise tax rates on transportation of persons and the scheduled repeal of the tax on local telephone service, which were enacted in the last session of the Congress, should be similarly postponed.

Improvement of the tax system: The recent tax revision hearings of the Ways and Means Committee have provided valuable information bearing on changes in the tax laws. The Treasury will continue to work in cooperation with the committees of the Congress in developing sound and attainable proposals for long-range improvement of the tax laws.

As the development of a comprehensive tax revision program will take time, the Congress should consider this year certain changes in the tax laws to correct inequities. These include amendments of the laws on taxation of cooperatives, now before the Congress, and a number of technical changes on which the Treasury Department has been working with committees of Congress. There is also before the Congress an amendment to prevent unintended and excessive depletion deductions resulting from the computation of percentage depletion allowances on the selling price of finished clay, cement products, and mineral products generally; unless the problem is satisfactorily resolved in a case now pending before the Supreme Court, the need for corrective legislation in this area will continue.

Under existing law, administration of the depreciation provisions is being hampered by the attempts of some taxpayers to claim excessive depreciation before disposing of their property. If gain from the sale of depreciable personal property were treated as ordinary income, the advantage gained in claiming excessive depreciation deductions would be materially reduced and the taxpayer's judgment as to the useful life of his property could more readily be accepted. Accordingly, I recommend that consideration be given to a change in the law which would treat such gain as ordinary income to the extent of the depreciation deduction previously taken on the property.

Aviation fuel taxes: To help defray the cost of the Federal airways system, the effective excise tax rate on aviation gasoline should be promptly increased from 2 to 4½ cents per gallon and an equivalent excise tax should be imposed on jet fuels, which now are untaxed. The conversion from piston engines to jets is resulting in serious revenue losses to the Government. These losses will increase unless the tax on jet fuels is promptly enacted. The revenues from all taxes on aviation fuels should be credited to general budget receipts, as a partial offset to the budgetary costs of the airways system, and clearly should not be deposited in the highway trust fund.

Changes in fees and charges: The cost of other Federal programs which provide measurable special benefits to identifiable groups or individuals should be recovered through charges paid by beneficiaries rather than by taxes on the general public. Whenever feasible, fees or charges should be established so that the beneficiaries will pay the full cost of the special services they receive. To help accomplish this purpose, I have directed that further work be done by the departments and agencies on a carefully defined inventory of Federal services which convey such special benefits. In the meantime, the Congress is requested to act favorably on the postal rate proposals described in this message and on a number of other specific proposals now pending before it or planned to be submitted this year for increased fees or charges for special services.

Estimated savings to the general taxpayers from more adequate fees and charges

[In millions]

Proposal	Fiscal year 1961	Full annual effect
Increase postal rates	$554.0	$554.0
Support highway expenditures by highway-user taxes:
Replace future diversion of general excise taxes to trust fund with increased motor fuel tax or other user charges	----------	850.0
Transfer financing of forest and public land highways to trust fund	39.0	36.0
Charge users for share of cost of Federal airways:
Increase taxes on aviation fuels	72.0	88.0
Transfer aviation fuel taxes from highway trust fund to general fund	17.0	20.0
Revise fees for noncompetitive oil and gas leases	----------	14.0
Recover administrative costs of Federal crop insurance	----------	6.4
Increase patent fees	3.7	3.7
Increase miscellaneous fees now below costs	8.0	8.9
Total savings	693.7	1,581.0

RECEIPTS FROM AND PAYMENTS TO THE PUBLIC

The program of responsible fiscal policy represented by a balanced budget with a substantial surplus is reinforced by an even greater surplus of total cash receipts from the public over cash payments to the public. In this more comprehensive measure of Federal financial activity, obtained by consolidating budget, trust fund, and certain other Federal transactions, receipts from the public are estimated at $102.2 billion in 1961 and payments to the public at $96.3 billion, resulting in an excess of $5.9 billion of receipts.

This excess of receipts will be used to repay cash the Government has previously borrowed from the public. Repayment of such debt owed to the public will be greater than the amount of public debt retired, because the Government trust funds are expected to add to their holdings of public debt securities to the extent that trust fund receipts exceed trust fund expenditures. This will reduce the debt held by the public in like amount by shifting ownership to the trust funds.

For the fiscal year 1960, on the other hand, an excess of payments to the public of $542 million is estimated, despite the anticipated budget surplus of $217 million. This situation reflects the fact that total disbursements of trust funds will exceed their receipts in 1960, notably in the old-age and survivors insurance, unemployment, and highway trust funds.

Federal Government receipts from and payments to the public

(See special analysis A in pt. IV of this document)

[Fiscal years. In billions]

	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Receipts from the public	$81.7	$94.8	$102.2
Payments to the public	94.8	95.3	96.3
Excess of payments over receipts	−13.1	−.5	----------
Excess of receipts over payments	----------	----------	+5.9

REVIEW OF MAJOR FUNCTIONS

The following sections of this message discuss the legislative and budget recommendations for 1961 in terms of the major purposes which they fulfill. The following table compares the estimated expenditures for each of the nine major functional categories with the actual figures for 1959 and the latest estimate for 1960.

The expenditure totals for 1960 and 1961 include expenditures under both existing and proposed legislation. The allowance for contingencies is intended to provide for unforeseen increases in existing programs, and for proposed new programs not separately itemized.

Budget expenditures

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Function	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961
			Estimate	Percent of total
Major national security	$46,426	$45,650	$45,568	57.1
International affairs and finance	3,780	2,066	2,242	2.8
Commerce and housing	3,421	3,002	2,709	3.4
Agriculture and agricultural resources	6,529	5,113	5,623	7.0
Natural resources	1,669	1,785	1,938	2.4
Labor and welfare	4,421	4,441	4,569	5.7
Veterans services and benefits	5,174	5,157	5,471	6.9
Interest	7,671	9,335	9,585	12.0
General government	1,606	1,711	1,911	2.4
Allowance for contingencies	----------	75	200	.3
Total	80,697	78,383	79,816	100.0

The figures for 1961 allocate to the separate programs for the first time the dollar equivalent of expenditures for U.S. Government programs of foreign currencies received from the sale abroad of surplus U.S. agricultural commodities under Public Law 480.

MAJOR NATIONAL SECURITY

Our national objective remains as before—peace with justice for all peoples. Our hope is that the heavy burden of armaments on the world may be lightened.

But we should not delude ourselves. In this era of nuclear weapons and intercontinental missiles, disarmament must be safeguarded and verifiable. The problems involved in achieving reductions of armaments with safety and justice to all nations are tremendous. Yet we must face up to these problems, for the only alternative is a world living on the edge of disaster.

While seeking the true road to peace and disarmament we must remain strong Our aim at this time is a level of military strength which, together with that of our allies, is sufficient to deter wars, large or small, while we strive to find a way to reduce the threat of war. This budget, in my judgment, does that.

Expenditures of the Department of Defense in 1961 will continue to emphasize the modernization of our Armed Forces. Military assistance for our allies under the mutual security program will also reflect the growing importance of modern weapons and missiles in the continued strengthening of the free world defense forces. The Atomic Energy Commission is continuing its weapons programs on a high level and will move forward with research and development on the peaceful applications of atomic energy. Expenditures for stockpiling and for expansion of defense production will decline further, since most of the stockpile objectives have been met.

Major national security

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Program or agency	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Department of Defense—Military:
Military functions:
Military personnel:
Present programs	$11,801	$11,959	$12,124	[1] $11,813
Proposed legislation, retirement pay	-------	-------	22	24
Operation and maintenance	10,384	10,137	10,321	10,527
Procurement	14,410	13,943	13,602	13,085
Research, development, test, and evaluation	2,859	3,680	3,917	3,910
Construction	1,948	1,670	1,359	1,188
Revolving funds	−169	−444	−350	30
Subtotal	41,233	40,945	40,995	40,577
Military assistance	2,340	1,800	1,750	2,000
Atomic energy	2,541	2,675	2,689	2,666
Stockpiling and expansion of defense production	312	230	134	39
Total	46,426	45,650	45,568	[2] 45,282

[1] Additional obligational authority available by transfer: $350 million.

[2] Compares with new obligational authority of $45,517 million enacted for 1959 and $44,749 million (including $25 million in anticipated supplemental appropriations) estimated for 1960.

Department of Defense—Military: New appropriations of $40,577 million are recommended for the military functions of the Department of Defense for 1961. Expenditures in 1961 are estimated at $40,995 million. These amounts exclude funds for the development of the Saturn space project which I have proposed be transferred to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

Strategy and tactics of the U.S. military forces are now undergoing one of the greatest transitions in history. The change of emphasis from conventional-type to missile-type warfare must be made with care, mindful that the one type of warfare cannot be safely neglected in favor of the other. Our military forces must be capable of contending successfully with any contingency which may be forced upon us, from limited emergencies to all-out nuclear general war.

Forces and military personnel strength: This budget will provide in the fiscal year 1961 for the continued support of our forces at approximately the present level—a year-end strength of 2,489,000 men and women in the active forces. The forces to be supported include an Army of 14 divisions and 870,000 men; a Navy of 817 active ships and 619,000 men; a Marine Corps of 3 divisions and 3 air wings with 175,000 men; and an Air Force of 91 combat wings and 825,000 men.

If the reserve components are to serve effectively in time of war, their basic organization and objectives must conform to the changing character and missions of the active forces. Quality and combat readiness must take precedence over mere numbers. Under modern conditions, this is especially true of the ready reserve. I have requested the Secretary of Defense to reexamine the roles and missions of the reserve components in relation to those of the active forces and in the light of the changing requirements of modern warfare.

Last year the Congress discontinued its previously imposed minimum personnel strength limitations on the Army Reserve. Similar restrictions on the strength of the Army National Guard contained in the 1960 Department of Defense Appropriation Act should likewise be dropped. I strongly recommend to the Congress the avoidance of mandatory floors on the size of the reserve components so that we may have the flexibility to make adjustments in keeping with military necessity.

I again propose a reduction in the Army National Guard and Army Reserve—from their present strengths of 400,000 and 300,000, respectively, to 360,000 and 270,000 by the end of the fiscal year 1961. These strengths are considered adequate to meet the essential roles and missions of the reserves in support of our national security objectives.

Military personnel costs.—About 30 percent of the expenditures for the Department of Defense in 1961 are for military personnel costs, including pay for active, reserve, and retired military personnel. These expenditures are estimated to be $12.1 billion, an increase of $187 million over 1960, reflecting additional longevity pay of career personnel, more dependents, an increased number of men drawing proficiency pay, and social security tax increases (effective for the full year in 1961 compared with only 6 months in 1960). Retired pay costs are increased by $94 million in 1961 over 1960, partly because of a substantial increase in the number of retired personnel. These increased costs are partially offset by a decrease of $56 million in expenditures for the reserve forces, largely because of the planned reduction in strength of the Army Reserve components during 1961.

Traditionally, rates of pay for retired military personnel have been proportionate to current rates of pay for active personnel. The 1958 military pay act departed from this established formula by providing for a 6 percent increase rather than a proportionate increase for everyone retired prior to its effective date of June 1, 1958. I endorse pending legislation that will restore the traditional relationship between retired and active duty pay rates.

Operation and maintenance: Expenditures for operating and maintaining the stations and equipment of the Armed Forces are estimated to be $10.3 billion in 1961, which is $184 million more than in 1960. The increase stems largely from the growing complexity of and higher degree of maintenance required for newer weapons and equipment.

A substantial increase is estimated in the cost of operating additional communications systems in the air defense program, as well as in all programs where speed and security of communications are essential. Also, the program for fleet modernization will be stepped up in 1961 causing an increase in expenditures. Further increases arise from the civilian employee health program enacted by the Congress last year.

Other factors increasing operating costs include the higher unit cost of each flying hour, up 11 percent in 2 years, and of each steaming hour, up 15 percent. In total, these increases in operating costs outweigh the savings that result from declining programs and from economy measures, such as reduced numbers of units and installations, smaller inventories of major equipment, and improvements in the supply and distribution systems of the Armed Forces.

In the budget message for 1959, and again for 1960, I recommended immediate repeal of section 601 of the act of September 28, 1951 (65 Stat. 365). This section prevents the military departments and the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization from carrying out certain transactions involving real property unless they come into agreement with the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives. As I have stated previously, the Attorney General has advised me that this section violates fundamental constitutional principles. Accordingly, if it is not repealed by the Congress at its present session, I shall have no alternative thereafter but to direct the Secretary of Defense to disregard the section unless a court of competent jurisdiction determines otherwise.

Basic long-line communications in Alaska are now provided through Federal facilities operated by the Army, Air Force, and Federal Aviation Agency. The growing communications needs of this new State can best be met, as they have in other States, through the operation and development of such facilities by private enterprise. Legislation has already been proposed to authorize the sale of these Government-owned systems in Alaska, and its early enactment is desirable.

Procurement, research, and construction: Approximately 45 percent of the expenditures for the Department of Defense are for procurement, research, development and construction programs. In 1961, these expenditures are estimated at $18.9 billion, compared to $19.3 billion in 1960. The decreases, which are largely in construction and in aircraft procurement, are offset in part by increases for research and development and for procurement of other military equipment such as tanks, vehicles, guns, and electronic devices. Expenditures for shipbuilding are estimated at about the same level as in 1960.

New obligational authority for 1961 recommended in this budget for aircraft procurement (excluding amounts for related research and construction) totals $4,753 million, which is $1,390 million below that enacted for 1960. On the other hand, the new authority of $3,825 million proposed for missile procurement (excluding research and construction) in 1961 is $581 million higher than for 1960. These contrasting trends in procurement reflect the anticipated changes in the composition and missions of our Armed Forces in the years ahead.

The Department of Defense appropriation acts for the past several years have contained a rider which limits competitive bidding by firms in other countries on certain military supply items. As I have repeatedly stated, this provision is much more restrictive than the general law, popularly known as the Buy American Act. I urge once again that the Congress not reenact this rider.

The task of providing a reasonable level of military strength, without endangering other vital aspects of our security, is greatly complicated by the swift pace of scientific progress. The last few years have witnessed what have been perhaps the most rapid advances in military technology in history. Some weapons systems have become obsolescent while still in production, and some while still under development.

Furthermore, unexpectedly rapid progress or a technological breakthrough on any one weapon system, in itself, often diminishes the relative importance of other competitive systems. This has necessitated a continuous review and reevaluation of the defense program in order to redirect resources to the newer and more important weapons systems and to eliminate or reduce effort on weapons systems which have been overtaken by events. Thus, in the last few years, a number of programs which looked very promising at the time their development was commenced have since been completely eliminated. For example, the importance of the Regulus II, a very promising aerodynamic ship-to-surface missile designed to be launched by surfaced submarines, was greatly diminished by the successful acceleration of the much more advanced Polaris ballistic missile launched by submerged submarines.

Another example is the recent cancellation of the F–108, a long-range interceptor with a speed three times as great as the speed of sound, which was designed for use against manned bombers in the period of the mid-1960's. The substantial progress being made in ballistic missile technology is rapidly shifting the main threat from manned bombers to missiles. Considering the high cost of the F–108 system—over $4 billion for the force that had been planned—and the time period in which it would become operational, it was decided to stop further work on the project. Meanwhile, other air defense forces are being made effective, as described later in this message.

The size and scope of other important programs have been reduced from earlier plans. Notable in this category are the Jupiter and Thor intermediate range ballistic missiles, which have been successfully developed, produced, and deployed, but the relative importance of which has diminished with the increasing availability of the Atlas intercontinental ballistic missile.

The impact of technological factors is also illustrated by the history of the high-energy fuel program. This project was started at a time when there was a critical need for a high-energy fuel to provide an extra margin of range for high performance aircraft, particularly our heavy bombers. Continuing technical problems involved in the use of this fuel, coupled with significant improvements in aircraft range through other means, have now raised serious questions about the value of the high-energy fuel program. As a result, the scope of this project has been sharply curtailed.

These examples underscore the importance of even more searching evaluations of new major development programs and even more penetrating and far-ranging analyses of the potentialities of future technology. The cost of developing a major weapon system is now so enormous that the greatest care must be exercised in selecting new systems for development, in determining the most satisfactory rate of development, and in deciding the proper time at which either to place a system into production or to abandon it.

Strategic forces: The deterrent power of our Armed Forces comes from both their nuclear retaliatory capability and their capability to conduct other essential operations in any form of war. The first capability is represented by a combination of manned bombers, carrier-based aircraft, and intercontinental and intermediate range missiles. The second capability is represented by our deployed ground, naval, and air forces in essential forward areas, together with ready reserves capable of effecting early emergency reinforcement.

The Strategic Air Command is the principal element of our long-range nuclear capability. One of the important and difficult decisions which had to be made in this budget concerned the role of the B–70, a long-range supersonic bomber. This aircraft, which was planned for initial operational use about 1965, would be complementary to but likewise competitive with the four strategic ballistic missile systems, all of which are scheduled to become available earlier. The first Atlas ICBM's are now operational, the first two Polaris submarines are expected to be operational this calendar year, and the first Titan ICBM's next year. The Minuteman solid-fueled ICBM is planned to be operational about mid-1963. By 1965, several or all of these systems will have been fully tested and their reliability established.

Thus, the need for the B–70 as a strategic weapon system is doubtful. However, I am recommending that development work on the B–70 airframe and engines be continued. It is expected that in 1963 two prototype aircraft will be available for flight testing. By that time we should be in a much better position to determine the value of that aircraft as a weapon system.

I am recommending additional acquisitions of the improved version of the B–52 (the B–52H with the new turbofan engine) and procurement of the B–58 supersonic medium bomber, together with the supporting refueling tankers in each case. These additional modern bombers will replace some of the older B–47 medium bombers; one B–52 can do the work of several B–47's which it will replace. Funds are also included in this budget to continue the equipping of the B–52 wings with the Hound Dog air-to-surface missile.

In the coming fiscal year additional quantities of Atlas, Titan, and Polaris missiles also will be procured. I am recommending funds for 3 additional Polaris submarines to be started in the coming fiscal year and for the advance procurement of long leadtime components on 3 more—making a total of 15 Polaris submarines and the appropriate number of missiles. Funds to continue the development and to initiate production of the first operational quantities of the Minuteman are also included in this budget.

Thus, four strategic ballistic missile systems will be in development and production during the coming fiscal year. These, together with the manned bomber force, the carrier-based aircraft, the intermediate range ballistic missiles, and the tactical aircraft deployed abroad, ensure our continued capability to retaliate effectively in the event of an attack upon ourselves or our allies.

In order to ensure, insofar as practicable, the safety and readiness of these forces, we have substantially completed the dispersal of Strategic Air Command aircraft and the construction of alert facilities. These measures will permit a large portion of all our manned bombers and supporting tankers to get off the ground within 15 minutes after receiving warning of an attack.

I have also authorized the Department of Defense to begin to acquire a stand-by airborne alert capability for the heavy bombers. This will entail the procurement of extra engines and spare parts, and the training of the heavy bomber wings with the ability to conduct an airborne alert. It is neither necessary nor practical to fly a continuous airborne alert at this time. Such a procedure would, over a relatively short period of time, seriously degrade our overall capability to respond to attack. What I am recommending is a capability to fly such an alert if the need should arise and to maintain that alert for a reasonable period of time until the situation which necessitated it becomes clarified.

Attention is also being given to the safety and readiness of our land-based strategic missile forces. Except for the first several squadrons, strategic missiles will be dispersed in hardened underground sites. Measures are also being taken to shorten the reaction time of liquid-fueled missiles. The Minuteman, because it will be solid fueled, will have a quick reaction time and will lend itself to mobile use. The solid-fueled Polaris to be carried in submarines at sea is by its very nature highly invulnerable.

Air defense forces: Much progress has been made in increasing the effectiveness of the North American Air Defense Command organized in 1957 as an integrated command of the U.S. and Canadian forces. The U.S. military elements—consisting of parts of all of our armed services—are integrated with Canada's Air Defence Command for maintaining an air defense capability for the entire North American Continent.

While we pay increasing attention to the growing threat of a potential enemy's ballistic missiles we should not lose sight of the fact that for the time being the manned bomber is the major threat. Although some $17 billion has already been invested in defense systems against manned bombers, excluding the cost of personnel and operation and maintenance, certain segments have yet to be completed. These were described in the Department of Defense air defense plan presented to the Congress last year. The funds recommended in this budget will substantially complete the programs outlined in that plan. Specifically, the last major elements of the Nike-Hercules surface-to-air missile program will be financed in 1961 and the Bomarc interceptor missile program will approach completion. The related radar warning, electronic control, and communication systems will also be further equipped and modernized.

In response to the increasing missile threat, we are pressing to completion a new system for the detection of ballistic missile attack—the ballistic missile early warning system. Construction has been under way for the last 2 years and the first segment is expected to be in operation in about a year.

To provide for an active defense against ballistic missile attack, I am recommending the continued development of the Nike-Zeus system, but it will not be placed in production during the coming fiscal year during which further testing will be carried out.

The Nike-Zeus system is one of the most difficult undertakings ever attempted by this country. The technical problems involved in detecting, tracking, and computing the course of the incoming ballistic missile and in guiding the intercepting Zeus missile to its target—all within a few minutes—are indeed enormous.

Much thought and study have been given to all of these factors and it is the consensus of my technical and military advisers that the system should be carefully tested before production is begun and facilities are constructed for its deployment. Accordingly, I am recommending sufficient funds in this budget to provide for the essential phases of such testing. Pending the results of such testing, the $137 million appropriated last year by the Congress for initial production steps for the Nike-Zeus system will not be used.

Sea control forces: Control of sea and ocean areas and sea lanes of communication is an integral element in the maintenance of our national security. The naval forces which carry the primary responsibility for this mission will consist of 817 combatant and support ships, 16 attack carrier air groups, 11 antisubmarine air groups, and 41 patrol and warning air squadrons.

From new construction and conversion programs started in prior years, the Navy will receive during fiscal year 1961 an unusually large number of modern ships. These will include the fifth and sixth Forrestal-class attack carriers, the first nuclear-powered cruiser, nine guided missile destroyers, seven guided missile frigates, and six nuclear-powered submarines. Three more Polaris ballistic missile submarines and a converted guided missile cruiser will also be commissioned.

For the coming fiscal year I am recommending the construction of 20 new ships and conversions or modernizations of 15 others. Included among the new ships is an attack carrier. It is planned to construct this carrier with a conventional rather than a nuclear powerplant.

While it is generally agreed that a nuclear-powered attack carrier has certain military advantages, such as extended range and endurance at high sustained speeds, these advantages are not overriding as in the case of a submarine. In a submarine, nuclear power provides the critical advantage of almost unlimited operation, submerged at high speeds. This enables nuclear-powered submarines to carry out missions which no conventionally powered submarine, no matter how modern, could accomplish.

The advantages of nuclear power with respect to the carrier, however, are not comparable. The primary requirement in a carrier is up-to-date facilities to operate, safely and effectively, the most modern naval aircraft. Use of a conventional powerplant will in no way prevent a carrier from functioning as a completely modern and mobile base for fleet aircraft for its foreseeable life. The additional $130 million which a nuclear-powered carrier would cost can be used to much greater advantage for other purposes. I, therefore, strongly urge the Congress to support this request for a conventionally powered aircraft carrier.

Tactical forces: Elements of the ground, naval, and air forces comprise the tactical forces which are available to deal with cold-war emergencies and limited-war situations, in addition to performing essential tasks in the event of general war. Recommendations made in this budget provide funds for modernization and improvement in the effectiveness of our tactical forces.

Increased emphasis has been given in this budget to improving the mobility and firepower of the 14 Army divisions and other active combat elements of the Army and the 3 Marine Corps divisions. Additional quantities of new rifles and machineguns employing the standard NATO ammunition will be procured, as will combat and tactical vehicles of all kinds, including the new M60 tank, the M113 armored personnel carrier, self-propelled howitzers, trucks and jeeps. In recognition of the value of artillery in both nuclear and nonnuclear warfare, an entire new family of self-propelled artillery is introduced with this budget. This new artillery is lighter, more mobile, and, utilizing new ammunition, will have greater range than that of types currently available.

The Army and Marine Corps will also buy a wide variety of guided missiles and rockets, such as Sergeant, Honest John, Little John, and Lacrosse for medium- and close-range ground-fire support; Davy Crockett for an integral infantry-unit close-range atomic support weapon; and Hawk and Redeye for defense of field forces against air attack. Army aircraft procurement proposed for 1961 is more than 35 percent higher than for the current year and includes funds for surveillance aircraft and for utility and medium cargo helicopters.

The tactical forces of the Army are supported by the tactical air wings of the Air Force which will also be provided with an increased capability under these budget recommendations. Funds are provided for increased procurement of F–105 supersonic all-weather fighter bombers. These aircraft, with their low-altitude handling characteristics and large carrying capacities for both nuclear and nonnuclear weapons, will strengthen significantly the air support available to the Army ground units.

The three Marine divisions are tactically supported by three Marine aircraft wings, which will also receive quantities of new aircraft.

Military assistance: The ability of the free world to deter aggression depends on the combined strength and determination of many countries. The total forces of the countries receiving aid under the military assistance program include about 5 million Army troops, 2,200 combatant ships, and over 25,000 aircraft, about half of which are jet. These forces make a vital contribution to the security of the free world, including the United States.

A committee of distinguished private citizens, the President's Committee To Study the United States Military Assistance Program, conducted an extensive and comprehensive analysis of the mutual security program during the last year. I have previously transmitted the reports of the Committee to the Congress. Many of the significant findings and recommendations of this group have been put into effect by the executive agencies; others are in the process of implementation. The military assistance program has been budgeted in 1961 with other activities and programs of the Department of Defense, and major changes are being made in the management, organization, and programing of military assistance.

Last spring I mentioned the possibility of requesting a supplemental appropriation as suggested by the Committee largely to expedite modernization of NATO forces. However, in view of the time factor involved in securing a separate authorization and appropriation for 1960, a supplemental request this year is not practical.

The new obligational authority of $2 billion recommended for fiscal year 1961 for the military assistance program will provide the training and quantities of materiel required to support the forces in the countries receiving aid. Because of the long leadtime required for many items, procurement must be started in 1961 in order to provide the necessary deliveries in future years. During recent years, deliveries have been maintained only by drawing down the backlog of undelivered items by an amount ranging from $500 to $800 million per year. The backlog has now been reduced to the point where adequate deliveries in the future must depend on new appropriations.

The defense of Western Europe in this era of modern weapons is costly and must be accomplished through the combined efforts of all NATO countries. Many of these countries have now assumed the financial responsibility for producing or purchasing conventional arms and equipment which the United States previously supplied. At the same time, the 1961 military assistance program squarely faces the pressing need for new and costly weapons for which the free world still looks for help from the United States. In addition, it provides for an intensified training effort to assure effective use and maintenance of the new equipment by allied forces.

This budget also provides for military assistance to countries which are building defenses against aggression and subversion in other parts of the world. These countries border on aggressive regimes, or are confronted with strong internal subversive elements. Many of them have joined in mutual defense organizations such as the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO) and the Central Treaty Organization (CENTO), or with the United States in bilateral defense agreements. Assistance to these countries, most of which are in the Near East and the Far East, emphasizes primarily the strengthening of conventional forces in keeping with the nature of the threat in each area.

Atomic energy activities: In 1961 the expenditures for the Atomic Energy Commission are expected to remain at the 1960 level of about $2.7 billion. Substantial increases for research and development activities will be offset by reductions in procurement of uranium ore concentrates from United States and Canadian producers. These reductions will bring ore supplies into better balance with production requirements.

Development and production of nuclear weapons in 1961 will remain at the high levels of previous years. The vigorous development of military reactors for a variety of propulsion and power uses will continue. When the land-based prototype reactor for a destroyer is placed into operation in 1961 along with four other naval prototype reactors now operating, nuclear powerplants will be available for major types of naval combatant ships. Emphasis in naval reactor development in 1961 will be placed primarily on development of improved and longer lived reactor fuel. The development of nuclear ramjet engines for missiles, of nuclear aircraft engines, and of nuclear electric powerplants for use at remote military bases will be carried forward.

Peaceful uses of atomic energy: Expenditures in 1961 for development of civilian electric power from atomic energy are estimated at $250 million. Of this amount, $185 million is for research and development and $65 million is for construction of civilian power reactors and related development facilities. The estimated expenditures include amounts from proposed new appropriations of $40 million for assistance to private and public power groups in developing and building demonstration nuclear powerplants, and alternatively for such direct Government construction as may be considered necessary. The number, type, and size of reactors built and the nature of the assistance provided will be determined by the Commission after considering the state of technology and the cooperation proposed by industry.

Expenditures by the Commission for research in the physical and life sciences in 1961 will again increase substantially to over $210 million. This level of research will help the United States to continue its leadership in the study of the behavior of the basic matter of the universe and the effects of radiation on man and his environment. The largest part of the increase will be used to place in operation in the next 18 months three new particle accelerators in the multi-billion electron-volt energy range, including the alternating gradient synchrotron at Brookhaven National Laboratory.

In support of the civilian space program, the Atomic Energy Commission will continue development of nuclear-powered rockets and small, long-lived nuclear power sources for space vehicles. Development work on thermonuclear power and on applications of nuclear explosives to a variety of civilian uses will continue in 1961.

Stockpiling and defense production expansion: Most of the objectives for the stockpile of strategic and critical materials have been met. Receipts of materials under contracts to promote expansion of defense production are continuing at a reduced rate, as the number of such contracts still in effect declines. Hence, expenditures for stockpiling and expansion of defense production are estimated to decline from $230 million in 1960 to $134 million in 1961.

Amendments to outstanding contracts are now being negotiated where practicable, so as to minimize the delivery of materials no longer required for stockpiling. Arrangements are also under way to dispose of materials excess to stockpile objectives whenever disposal will not seriously disrupt markets or adversely affect our international relations.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS AND FINANCE

The United States is continuing to support programs to maintain world peace and to improve economic conditions throughout the free world. In helping to improve economic conditions, we are being joined in larger measure by our friends in the free world who have now reached a high level of prosperity after recovering from the ravages of war. Accordingly, multilateral programs are being expanded. At the same time, the pressing need for economic development requires the continuation of substantial economic assistance under the mutual security program.

Expenditures for international affairs and finance are estimated to be $2.2 billion in the fiscal year 1961. This amount is $177 million higher than estimated expenditures for 1960, mainly because of larger disbursements by the Development Loan Fund under prior commitments.

Mutual security program: Through the mutual security program as a whole the United States helps promote stability and economic growth in less-developed countries and helps strengthen the defenses of the free world. For these purposes new obligational authority of $4,175 million is recommended in fiscal year 1961, an increase of $949 million over the amount enacted for 1960 (of which $700 million is for military assistance). Expenditures are estimated to be $3,450 million, an increase of $100 million over 1960.

The military assistance portion of this program is carried in the Department of Defense chapter and has been discussed in the major national security section of this message. Economic assistance is discussed in the following paragraphs in this section.

Development Loan Fund: The Development Loan Fund was established in 1957 in order to provide capital to less-developed countries, when capital is not available from other sources. The capital is provided on favorable terms, often including the option to repay in the borrower's own currency. By the end of the fiscal year 1960, the Fund will have made commitments for an estimated 148 loans totaling some $1,400 million. More than three-fourths of the projects it is financing are for roads, railroads, electric power generation, and industry, including industrial development banks. Because many of these projects require several years for construction, expenditures have thus far been relatively small. However, in the fiscal year 1961 they are estimated to be $300 million, an increase of $125 million over 1960. New obligational authority of $700 million is requested for 1961, an increase of $150 million over the amount enacted for 1960. This will provide the loan funds essential to our foreign policy objective of assisting in the economic growth of the less-developed countries of the free world.

Technical cooperation: Technical and administrative skills are no less important for the newly developing countries than capital. Through the technical cooperation program, American experts are sent abroad to transmit the skills required in a modern economy and foreign technicians are brought to the United States for training.

International affairs and finance

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Program or agency	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Economic and technical development:
Mutual security—economic:
Development Loan Fund	$66	$175	$300	$700
Technical cooperation	169	170	175	206
Defense support	881	740	730	724
Special assistance	257	250	255	268
Other	120	105	110	101
Contingencies	30	110	130	175
Subtotal, mutual security—economic	1,524	1,550	1,700	2,175
International Monetary Fund subscription	1,375	------	------	--------
Inter-American Development Bank	------	80	------	--------
Export-Import Bank	390	−56	−7	--------
Emergency relief abroad and other	113	140	131	116

International affairs and finance—Continued

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Program or agency	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Conduct of foreign affairs:
Administration of foreign affairs	$211	$205	$197	$205
Philippine claims:
Present program	24
Proposed legislation			49	49
Other	2	5	3	2
Foreign information and exchange activities:
United States Information Agency	109	110	124	124
Department of State, exchange of persons	22	24	36	36
President's special international program	8	7	8	9
Total	3,780	2,066	2,242	[1] 2,715

[1] Compares with new obligational authority of $6,982 million enacted for 1959 and $2,697 million (including $49 million of anticipated supplemental appropriations) estimated for 1960. The 1959 authorization included $3,175 million for the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and $1,375 million for the International Monetary Fund.

For the fiscal year 1961, new obligational authority of $206 million is requested, which is $25 million over the amount enacted for 1960, in order to permit an increase in the bilateral programs. It will also permit a higher contribution to the United Nations technical assistance program and the related special fund; as other governments increase their contributions for the United Nations programs, the U.S. contribution, which is two-fifths of the total, also increases.

Defense support: Many of the less-developed countries participating in the common defense maintain large military forces whose cost imposes a severe strain upon their limited economic resources. In order to help maintain political and economic stability and to prevent the cost of necessary defensive forces from unduly hindering economic development, the United States provides economic aid principally by supplying commodities for consumption and raw materials and machinery for industrial production. For the fiscal year 1961, new obligational authority of $724 million is requested, an increase of $29 million over the amount enacted for 1960.

Special assistance: New obligational authority of $268 million is requested for economic assistance to promote economic and political stability in various countries of the free world where the United States is not supporting military forces, and for certain other special programs. In several instances, this assistance indirectly relates to military bases maintained by the United States.

The appropriation recommended for special assistance in 1961 is $23 million above the amount enacted for 1960. Additional programs are proposed to help improve conditions in Africa, largely for education, public health, and administration.

Increased funds will also be devoted to certain worldwide health programs in conjunction with the World Health Organization of the United Nations. The largest of these is the malaria eradication program, now in its fourth year. In addition numerous public health projects are supported through technical cooperation.

Mutual security program

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Program	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Military assistance	$2,340	$1,800	$1,750	$2,000
Economic (including technical) assistance	1,524	1,550	1,700	2,175
Total, mutual security	3,864	3,350	3,450	[1] 4,175

[1] Compares with new obligational authority of $3,448 million enacted for 1959 ($1,515 million military, $1,933 million economic) and $3,226 million enacted for 1960 ($1,300 million military, $1,926 million economic).

Other mutual security programs: Other programs include assistance to refugees and escapees; grants of atomic research equipment, including reactors, to the less-developed countries for training and research in nuclear physics; support of the NATO science program; and the United States contribution to the United Nations Children's Fund. For the fiscal year 1961, new obligational authority of $101 million is requested, an increase of $1 million above the amounts enacted for 1960.

Contingencies: Experience has shown that economic and military assistance is also required in some international situations which cannot be foreseen or for which it is not possible to estimate in advance the specific amount needed. To cover situations of this type, new obligational authority of $175 million is requested.

Other economic and technical development: More resources from countries of the free world are being channeled into economic development by increasing the capital funds of international organizations. In the past year the capital of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development was doubled and that of the International Monetary Fund increased by half.

The Inter-American Development Bank, with planned total resources of $1 billion, including $450 million from the United States, is expected to begin operations before the close of this fiscal year. Expenditures of $80 million are estimated in the fiscal year 1960 as the first installment of the U.S. cash investment in the Bank. In addition, guarantee authority of $200 million will be made available, on the basis of which the Bank can sell its bonds to private investors.

Last October the Governors of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development unanimously approved in principle a U.S. proposal for an International Development Association, which will be closely affiliated with the Bank. Under this proposal, the Association will make loans on more flexible terms than the Bank is able to offer under its charter, such as loans repayable in the currency of the borrowing country. In addition, it is expected that the charter of the Association will contain provisions under which a member could provide to the Association, for use in lending operations, other member country currencies which it holds. The draft charter of the Association is being prepared and will probably be submitted to the member governments early this year. Legislation authorizing U.S. participation and making financial provision for membership will be transmitted to the Congress at the appropriate time.

Private investment: The United States is trying to encourage more reliance on private enterprise in foreign economic development. During the past year, the Department of State and the Business Advisory Council of the Department of Commerce have both completed special studies on ways to increase the role of private investment and management abroad. Tax treaties, with investment incentive clauses, are now being negotiated with many countries. More trade missions are being sent abroad. Several of the less-developed countries are opening business information offices in this country. As a result of these various activities, more private investment in the less-developed areas should be forthcoming. To provide an additional incentive, U.S. taxation of income earned in the less-developed areas only should be deferred until repatriated.

Export-Import Bank: The oldest Federal agency specializing in foreign lending and the largest in terms of foreign loan volume is the Export-Import Bank. In the fiscal year 1961 the Bank plans to devote an increasing share of its program to transactions which support economic development abroad. At the same time the Bank plans to finance its operations without requiring net budgetary expenditures by encouraging more participation by private lenders in its loan program and by using funds obtained from repayments on its large outstanding portfolio.

Eligibility for assistance: Amendments to the Battle Act to revise the eligibility requirements for assistance to certain countries are pending before the Congress. It is highly desirable that they be enacted.

Conduct of foreign affairs: The Department of State is making plans to strengthen further the administration of foreign affairs in the fiscal year 1961. The disarmament staff is being expanded in preparation for discussions on disarmament soon to begin in Geneva and for the continuation of the negotiations on the suspension of nuclear tests. Language training programs will also be expanded. New diplomatic and consular posts will be opened in Africa, Latin America, south Asia, and Eastern Europe. For these and other activities, new obligational authority of $205 million is requested for the fiscal year 1961.

Legislation is recommended to remove certain reservations on acceptance by the United States of jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice (the World Court).

Legislation will be requested for payment in the fiscal year 1961 of certain war damage claims of the Philippine Government against the United States in the amount of $73 million. These claims will be partially offset by an amount, now estimated at approximately $24 million, owed to the United States by the Philippine Government. Pending legislation should be enacted in fiscal year 1960 to authorize compensation of $6 million to displaced residents of the Bonin Islands.

Foreign information and exchange activities: New obligational authority totaling $168 million is requested for foreign information and exchange activities in the fiscal year 1961. The United States Information Agency plans to expand its programs in Africa and Latin America, including construction of a new Voice of America transmitter in Africa. The Agency will make greater use of the growing number of television facilities overseas. The expansion of domestic radio transmitting facilities, begun last year in order to improve oversea reception, will continue. Exchanges of key persons with about 80 other countries will be increased, with special emphasis on leaders and teachers.

COMMERCE AND HOUSING

The improvements made in recent years in Federal programs for outer space exploration, aviation, highways, in postal service, housing, urban renewal, and small business will be further extended by this budget.

Expenditures for all commerce and housing programs in the fiscal year 1961 are estimated at $2.7 billion, which is $293 million less than the estimated expenditures for 1960. Proposed legislation to provide adequate postal rates will reduce sharply the net budget expenditures of the Post Office Department. Expenditures for other programs, however, especially space exploration and the promotion of aviation, will increase substantially.

Space exploration and flight technology: The National Aeronautics and Space Administration is carrying forward the nonmilitary space projects started by the Department of Defense and has initiated additional programs that will lay the foundations for future exploration and use of outer space. Estimated expenditures of $600 million during the fiscal year 1961, nearly double the expenditures in 1960, will carry forward the programs now under way and those becoming the agency's responsibility in 1961 Appropriations of $802 million for 1961, together with anticipated supplemental appropriations for 1960 of $23 million to restore substantially the congressional reduction in the space program last year, are recommended to finance these programs. Legislation is being submitted to authorize the appropriations required for 1961 and to provide permanent authorization for later years.

I am assigning to this new agency sole responsibility for the development of space booster vehicles of very high thrust, including Project Saturn. This assignment includes the transfer of certain facilities and personnel of the Army Ballistic Missiles Agency. With the imminent completion of the Jupiter missile project this outstanding group can concentrate on developing the large space vehicle systems essential to the exploration of space. Certain amendments to the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 will be proposed to clarify the organization and streamline the management of the space programs.

At the present time Soviet scientists have the advantage in the weight of the payloads that they can hurl into space. This weight advantage stems from the earlier start of the Soviet development of very large rocket boosters that they considered necessary for their intercontinental ballistic missile program. Because of the relatively advanced state of our nuclear warheads, however, we were able, after a much later start, to develop an effective ICBM using a smaller rocket booster.

Commerce and housing

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Program or agency	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Space exploration and flight technology	$145	$325	$600	$802
Promotion of aviation:
Federal Aviation Agency	441	567	681	717
Civil Aeronautics Board	53	60	69	72
Promotion of water transportation:
Department of Commerce	200	257	263	299
Coast Guard	229	276	281	285
Panama Canal Company	7	4	14	------
Provision of highways	30	45	[1] 3	(1)
Postal service:
Public service costs	------	37	49	49
Postal deficit	774	567	554	554
Proposed rate revisions	------	------	−554	−554
Community development and facilities:
Urban Renewal Administration	77	197	172	305
Other	31	39	31	27
Public housing programs	97	130	148	159
Other aids to housing:
Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation:
Under present legislation	−41	−50	−57	------
Proposed premium increase	------	------	−28	------
Federal Housing Administration	−51	−76	−120	------
Federal National Mortgage Association	842	56	111	150
College housing loans	180	186	148	------
Veterans housing loans	113	230	−12	------
Farm housing loans and other	43	−122	36	11
Other aids to business:
Small Business Administration	107	102	120	66
Proposed area assistance legislation	------	------	10	57
Other	32	48	48	64
Regulation of commerce and finance	58	58	64	66
Civil and defense mobilization	46	56	68	76
Disaster loans and relief	8	8	8	------
Total	3,421	3,002	2,709	[2] 3,204

[1] Reflects proposed financing of Federal-aid highways in national forests and public lands from highway trust fund.

[2] Compares with new obligational authority of $2,929 million enacted for 1959 and $3,789 million (including $71 million of anticipated supplemental appropriations) estimated for 1960.

Our space programs are based on a systematic and technically sound approach to the complicated scientific and engineering problems involved. This approach will assure continued demonstrable achievements. Project Mercury has a high priority and we should be ready to attempt actual manned space flights within the next 2 years. Progress on the development of very high thrust engines and the vehicles to use them will make it possible, in the not too distant future, to launch much larger space vehicles and thus extend the conquest of space.

For the near future satellites and space probes will continue to depend primarily on Thor and Atlas missiles as boosters, with the Delta and Agena upper stages providing improved performance and reliability. These vehicles will make possible a wide variety of highly useful scientific experiments which will provide essential information for future exploration of outer space by manned and unmanned vehicles. Somewhat later the Centaur project will provide an Atlas-boosted space vehicle with further improved capabilities and establish the technology of very high energy propulsion for space vehicles. In all of these projects, the success of the space vehicle launchings depends on a strong continuing program of supporting research and ground testing.

Transportation and communication: The detailed review of transportation problems and policies which I requested last year is now nearing completion in the Department of Commerce. This study should provide a sound basis for administrative actions and for legislation that may be needed to assure adequate and balanced growth of all branches of the Nation's transportation system.

Aviation: Primarily because of the airways modernization program now under way, expenditures of the Federal Aviation Agency will increase by $114 million to an estimated $681 million in fiscal year 1961. New obligational authority of $717 million is requested mainly for procurement and operation of radar equipment, airport landing aids, communications, and other facilities needed to handle the rapidly growing volume of air traffic safely and efficiently and for establishment and enforcement of air safety standards. Research and development activities are being accelerated to insure the future improvements in equipment and techniques required to meet future aviation needs.

The Federal Aviation Agency is already making increasing use of military facilities, and steps are under way to achieve a closer integration of air defense and civil air traffic control networks. Over the next few years the Agency will also assume traffic control functions now performed by military personnel at airbases throughout the world, with significant savings in cost.

Expenditures for subsidy payments to the airlines by the Civil Aeronautics Board are estimated at $69 million in 1961, an increase of $31 million, or 80 percent, over the $38 million actually spent in 1958. Almost all of the subsidy will go to local service airlines, including helicopter operations in three major metropolitan areas and intra-Alaska service. This rise and the prospect of even higher subsidies in the future make necessary the consideration of proposals to reduce the dependence of these airlines on the Government.

Airway user charges: Consistent with the principle that special beneficiaries of Government programs should pay the cost of those benefits, the users of the Federal airways should ultimately be expected to pay their full share of rising capital and operating costs. Accordingly, the effective tax on aviation gasoline should be raised from 2 to 4½ cents per gallon and the same tax should also be levied on jet fuels, which are now tax-free. Receipts from all aviation fuel taxes should be retained in the general fund rather than transferred to the highway trust fund as at present. These actions will increase revenues to the general fund by an estimated $89 million in fiscal year 1961.

Promotion of water transportation: Expenditures of the Department of Commerce to aid water transportation will be sharply higher in both 1960 and 1961 than in 1959, primarily because of higher levels of payments required under past commitments for ship operating and construction subsidies. A supplemental appropriation of $32 million will be requested for the current year to meet increased operating subsidy obligations caused by lower earnings of the shipping industry and to permit prompt payment of subsidies accrued.

Efforts to maintain a U.S. merchant fleet adequate, along with the ships of our allies, to meet national defense requirements are seriously hampered by high operating costs. To preserve the capability of our merchant fleet without placing an undue burden on the taxpayer will require willingness by ship operators, maritime labor, and the Government to explore and adopt new solutions.

This budget provides for expanded work on advanced ship designs that could bring sharply reduced operating costs. By extending the operation of war-built vessels, which comprise more than 70 percent of the subsidized fleet, over a somewhat longer period, the results of this research can be more fully exploited in replacement plans. The Secretary of Commerce is also undertaking a special study of sailing requirements and competitive conditions of maritime trade routes and services, in the hope of discovering opportunities to increase the benefits flowing from the public investment in this area.

I repeat the request made last year that the 3½-percent interest rate ceiling on ship mortgage loans made by the Maritime Administration be replaced by authority to charge the Government's full cost for such loans.

Work will continue on widening sections of the Panama Canal from 300 to 500 feet to facilitate the movement of increased ship traffic. Largely as a result of this program and the increased disbursements for the $20 million Balboa Bridge, which is being built to fulfill a treaty commitment with the Republic of Panama, expenditures of the Panama Canal Company in 1961 will be $10 million higher than in 1960.

Highways: Federal payments of $2,728 million from the highway trust fund in 1961 will enable the States to proceed with construction of the Interstate System at a level consistent with the pay-as-you-build principle established by the Highway Revenue Act of 1956 and reaffirmed by the Congress in 1959. Last year I recommended that highway fuel taxes be increased by 1½ cents per gallon for a period of 5 years to meet estimated expenditure requirements. The Congress after months of delay enacted an increase of only 1 cent for less than 2 years.

As a result of both the delay and the failure to provide the full amount of revenue requested, the roadbuilding program has been slowed below a desirable rate of progress. The apportionments to the States for future construction had to be reduced and a plan had to be established to time reimbursements to the States so that the trust fund could be kept in balance. By timely action and planning, however, potential failures to reimburse States promptly for want of funds in the trust fund have been avoided, and equitable and proportionate programs in every State have been established.

I urge the Congress again to increase the highway fuel tax by another one-half cent per gallon and to continue the tax at 4½ cents until June 30, 1964. This will permit the construction program for the Interstate System to proceed at a higher and more desirable level. I request repeal of the diversion of excise taxes enacted last year for the period July 1, 1961, to June 30, 1964. New reports giving estimates of the cost of completing the Interstate System and recommendations on the allocation of costs among future highway beneficiaries will become available in 1961. At the appropriate time, further recommendations will be made to the Congress for the ensuing conduct and financing of the program.

A temporary advance of $359 million from the Treasury to the trust fund was necessary in fiscal 1960 to balance out the monthly flow of revenues and expenditures within the fiscal year, but this will be repaid by June 30, 1960. A similar temporary advance of $200 million will be required in the fiscal year 1961, repayable before the end of that year.

During this session of the Congress, funds should be authorized for 1962 and 1963 for regular Federal-aid highway programs and for forest and public lands highways. In view of the limited resources available to the trust fund and the priority requirements of the Interstate System, it is recommended that authorizations for the regular programs for each of these years be reduced to $900 million from $925 million provided for 1961. Annual authorizations of $33 million for forest highways and $3 million for public lands highways are also recommended.

Finally, I again request that the financing of forest and public lands highways be transferred from the general fund to the highway trust fund. Most of these highways are integral parts of the Federal-aid systems, and they should be financed in the same way.

Postal service: The Post Office Department is intensifying its efforts to improve service and to hold down the persistent postal deficit while handling a growing volume of mail. Initial steps have been taken to mechanize mail processing and to reduce serious congestion at major distribution centers. Ultimately, modern mail processing plants will be established in all principal urban areas to assure prompt and efficient deliveries.

The Postal Policy Act of 1958 established the policy that postal rates should be adjusted whenever necessary to recover postal expenses, excluding the costs of certain public services as fixed by appropriation acts. Over the past 13 fiscal years, 1947–59, the Federal budget has had to finance postal deficits totaling $6.8 billion, which is almost half of the increase in the national debt during that time. At the average rate of interest on the outstanding debt the taxpayers are paying well over $200 million annually in interest for the unwillingness of the Congress to take timely action to increase postal rates.

For fiscal 1961, a postal service deficit of $554 million is estimated with postage rates now in effect or scheduled, after designating $49 million as attributable to public services. Rate increases enacted in 1958 were substantially less than needed to meet the deficit at that time and made no allowance for the pay increase for postal employees then enacted. Since then, increased railroad rates (up $55 million), costs of modernization (up $80 million), and the new employee health insurance program ($39 million) have widened the gap between revenues and expenditures.

Accordingly, legislation is again proposed to increase first-class and airmail rates by 1 cent and to raise other rates and fees by enough to cover the postal deficit. I urge the Congress to act promptly on these proposals, which will be submitted in the near future.

Housing and community development: I have presented to each of the past two sessions of the Congress a comprehensive program of legislation for the Government's housing and community development programs. Some of these recommendations were enacted in the Housing Act of 1959. This year, legislation will be requested only for the authority necessary to continue important existing programs and provide necessary flexibility in interest rates. The authorization of additional funds for these programs should be subject to appropriation action.

Urban renewal: In the decade since Federal grants were first authorized, urban redevelopment has become recognized as essential to the future vitality of our cities, and planning has been initiated on 647 projects in 385 communities. However, only 26 projects have been completed. An additional 355 projects for which Federal funds have been obligated are now under way, but progress on many of these has been slow.

The budget, accordingly, places major emphasis on accelerating program progress. Sixty-five projects are scheduled for completion in 1960 and 1961. At the same time, the number of projects under way is expected to increase from 355 at the end of 1959 to 510 at the end of 1961. The acquisition of land for these projects in 1961 is estimated at more than double, and the sale of land to redevelopers at nearly triple, the 1959 amounts. As a result of the increased rate of activity, a supplemental appropriation of $50 million will be necessary in the current year to pay capital grants for projects nearing completion under prior contracts. Since the Housing Act of 1959 provided new contract authority for capital grants of $350 million for 1960 and $300 million for 1961, no additional obligational authority will be necessary for this program for 1961.

Public facility loans: The authority of the Housing and Home Finance Agency to borrow $100 million from the Treasury for loans to small communities for needed public facilities will be exhausted early in 1961. An additional $20 million will be required to meet loan applications through the end of the fiscal year 1961. Legislation is recommended to authorize the provision in annual appropriation acts of this amount and such future increases as may be necessary.

Public housing programs: By the end of fiscal year 1961, about 500,000 federally aided public housing units will be occupied and an additional 125,000 units will be under contract for Federal contributions. In the allocation of new contracts authorized in the Housing Act of 1959 emphasis is being given to projects which will be constructed in the near future. The 1959 act authorized 37,000 added units of public housing, to be available until allocated. Accordingly, no additional authorization is requested. Increases of $18 million in 1961 expenditures result primarily from rising Federal contributions to local authorities under past contracts.

Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation: The share accounts of savings and loan associations insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation have increased fivefold over the past 10 years. With a continuation of this rate of growth, the insurance reserve of the Corporation cannot reach levels commensurate with the mounting insurance liability without an increase in the present premium rate. I am, accordingly, recommending legislation to restore the higher premium rate in effect prior to 1949, to remain in force until the reserve exceeds 1 percent of the share accounts and borrowings of insured institutions. At the same time, the statutory goal of a reserve equal to 5 percent of such accounts and borrowings exceeds potential needs and should be reduced to 2 percent. In addition, the Corporation should be given authority to borrow from private sources, both to increase the available sources of funds to levels adequate to meet any temporary borrowing needs and to reduce its potential dependence upon the Federal Government.

Insurance of private mortgages: The mortgage insurance programs of the Federal Housing Administration will continue in 1961 to underwrite a substantial share of the mortgages on residential housing. While it is difficult to forecast mortgage insurance requirements, the general mortgage insurance authorization of the Federal Housing Administration now appears to be adequate to meet demands for mortgage insurance until the next Congress is in session.

Sharp fluctuations in the demand for mortgage insurance during recent years have caused the funds available for personnel under appropriation act limitations to be inadequate in periods of heavy demand to provide the staff required by the Federal Housing Administration for prompt service on applications. Supplemental funds are usually not made available in time to meet this problem. To correct this situation, appropriation language is being requested to permit use of additional income for such expenses when actual demand exceeds the budget estimate.

Legislation should also be enacted to extend the authority for insurance of loans on home improvements. This program, which makes a major contribution to modernization of existing homes, would otherwise expire on October 1, 1960.

Last year legislation was recommended to provide some flexibility in maximum interest rates on mortgages originated under the housing loan and guarantee programs of the Veterans' Administration and under certain mortgage insurance programs of the Federal Housing Administration. The action taken by the Congress was inadequate and some of these programs are now seriously hampered by their inability at present maximum interest rates to attract adequate private capital. The Veterans' Administration should be given the same flexibility to adjust its interest rates to market conditions which is now possessed by the Federal Housing Administration in its basic mortgage insurance programs. In addition, the maximum interest rate of 4½ percent on insured mortgages on armed services family housing should be removed.

Veterans housing loans: The direct housing loan program of the Veterans' Administration, which has been extended several times, terminates July 25, 1960, and I am asking for no further authorization. At that time, over $1 billion of loans will be outstanding, and the program will have provided over 150,000 loans to veterans. There is no longer justification for continuing this readjustment program.

Mortgage purchases: The authority of the Federal National Mortgage Association to borrow from the Treasury to purchase mortgages under its special assistance program will be exhausted during 1961. I am recommending legislation which would permit future increases in authorization to be subject to appropriation review. An additional $150 million is requested for 1961 for this program. The additional funds will be used chiefly to buy mortgages on housing in urban renewal areas, on housing for the relocation of displaced families, and on housing for the elderly.

Special assistance for these mortgages is intended to be transitional, and an increasing proportion of total financing should in the future be obtained from private sources. With annual financing requirements in excess of $1 billion already in sight for these programs, the need can be met only with the full and active support of local communities and private financial institutions.

At the same time, mortgage purchases by the Association's secondary market operations trust fund will continue at high levels. Expenditures for such purchases are estimated at $1,047 million in 1960 and $975 million in 1961. These purchases will be almost wholly financed through the sale of debentures to the public and the purchase of common stock by mortgage sellers. Budget expenditures of $50 million, however, will be necessary for the additional Treasury purchases of the preferred stock of the Association required to support the mortgage purchase program.

College housing: No additional authorizations are proposed for the existing college housing direct loan program. The housing needs of our colleges and universities represent only a part of the need for new university facilities of all types. These needs should be considered as a whole and within the framework of the general problems of education. I have, accordingly, recommended the termination of the college housing program and the enactment of legislation authorizing a new program of grants and loan guarantees for college facilities, to be administered by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (discussed under labor and welfare programs).

Small business: The increase in financial assistance to small businesses under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 will continue in 1961. I recommend the enactment of legislation previously proposed to the Congress to encourage the formation of additional investment companies by liberalizing the authority of these companies, thus expanding the supply of private capital available to small businesses. Other loans by the Small Business Administration will continue at a high level, but less new obligational authority is recommended because repayments on outstanding loans will increase. Efforts to assist small businesses in obtaining a fair share of Federal Government procurement and surplus property will also continue. In order to facilitate small business financing, the Securities Act of 1933 should be amended to extend the privilege of simplified filings to a wider range of security issues.

Area assistance: Despite the rapid economic recovery in the Nation as a whole, unemployment remains high in a relatively small number of local areas. The chronic problems in these communities reflect primarily basic changes in consumer buying habits, production methods, and industry location patterns. Some localities and States have properly taken the initiative in measures designed to meet these problems. In addition, the Department of Commerce, with the cooperation of 13 other Federal agencies, is intensifying existing Federal programs to encourage and support this local initiative. More help is required. Therefore, for the past 4 years I have requested expanded legislative authority, primarily for loans and grants, to supplement existing Federal, State, and local programs. Prompt enactment of this legislation is important. The budget includes an estimated $57 million in appropriations as the initial amount necessary to provide the proposed additional Federal aid.

Regulation of commerce and finance: The general growth of the economy, newly legislated responsibilities, and the increased complexity of the problems which confront the regulatory agencies require increases in funds for most of them. The largest single increase in this category will permit the Federal Communications Commission to make a thorough study of ultra-high-frequency television to determine whether channels in this range can be used to meet the needs of the expanding television industry.

I again recommend legislation to strengthen the antitrust laws, including extending Federal regulation to bank mergers accomplished through the acquisition of assets, requiring businesses of significant size to notify the antitrust agencies of proposed mergers, empowering the Attorney General to issue civil investigative demands in antitrust cases when civil procedures are contemplated, and authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to seek preliminary injunctions in merger cases where a violation of law is likely.

Civil and defense mobilization: Preparations for nonmilitary defense have been seriously hindered by the unwillingness of Congress to provide appropriations to carry out programs authorized by the 1958 amendments to the Federal Civil Defense Act. Funds are again being requested for 1961, as well as in a supplemental appropriation for 1960, to help States and localities strengthen their full-time civil defense organizations. Increased funds are also required to finance greater purchases of radiological instruments for donation to the States; for expansion of the emergency preparedness activities of other Federal agencies; and to carry on the national fallout shelter policy.

In accordance with the national fallout shelter policy, the Federal departments and agencies have been directed to include fallout shelters when appropriate in the design of new buildings for civilian use, and funds for such shelters are included in the budget requests of the various agencies. In addition, the budget of the General Services Administration includes $6 million for a new fallout shelter program at certain Federal relocation sites and in some existing Federal buildings.

AGRICULTURE AND AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES

In the fiscal year 1961, Federal programs for agriculture will again have a heavy impact on the budget, primarily because of continued high agricultural production and the past unwillingness of the Congress to make appropriate modifications in the long-established price support laws. The longer unrealistic price supports are retained, the more difficult it will be to make the adjustments in production needed to permit relaxation of Government controls over farm operations.

Last year I proposed to the Congress urgently needed legislation relating to price supports. Very little of that program was enacted. I recommend that the Congress give this important matter early consideration.

Particularly urgent now is legislation to put wheat price supports on a more realistic basis. Stocks of wheat are continuing to rise in spite of our efforts to move wheat abroad through the International Wheat Agreement, sales for foreign currencies, and grants to disaster victims and needy people. The carryover of wheat stocks is expected to rise to almost 1.4 billion bushels by July 1, 1960, an amount that would provide for more than 2 years of domestic consumption without any additional production.

Agriculture and agricultural resources

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Program or agency	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Stabilization of farm prices and farm income:
Commodity Credit Corporation—price support, supply, and purchase programs	$2,775	$1,828	$2,279	$1,250
Commodity Credit Corporation—special activities (other than acreage reserve of the soil bank):
Public Law 480	1,022	1,055	1,172	881
International Wheat Agreement	48	49	68	49
National Wool Act	20	94	70	51
Other	347	243	124	423
Soil bank—acreage reserve:
Program total	673	6	------	--------
Under CCC special activities	(64)	(5)	------	--------
Removal of surplus agricultural commodities	141	110	110	271
Sugar Act	67	74	78	74
Other	34	41	48	47
Subtotal	5,126	3,499	3,950	3,046
Financing rural electrification and rural telephones	315	334	355	200
Financing farm ownership and operation:
Farm Credit Administration	5	6	8	2
Farmers Home Administration	246	236	221	216
Conservation of agricultural land and water resources:
Conservation reserve:
Existing program total	175	365	362	362
Under CCC special activities	(4)	(30)	------	--------
Proposed legislation	------	------	32	32
Agricultural Conservation Program Service:
Program total	246	244	233	243
Under CCC special activities	(7)	(1)	(−12)	--------
Soil Conservation Service (including watershed protection and Great Plains program)	125	130	137	136
Research and other agricultural services	291	298	325	333
Total, agriculture and agricultural resources	6,529	5,113	5,623	[1] 4,570

[1] Compares with new obligational authority of $5,421 million enacted for 1959 and $5,099 million (including $704 million in anticipated supplemental appropriations) estimated for 1960.

The wheat surplus problem has been a long time in the making and cannot be solved overnight. In fact, wheat legislation enacted in this session cannot be made applicable before the 1961 crop. The fact that any significant effect on the budget would be delayed until the fiscal year 1962 underlines the need for prompt action at this session of the Congress.

Authority to bring additional land into the conservation reserve expires after the 1960 crop year. Legislation is proposed to extend this authority through the 1963 crop year and to expand the program by increasing the basic limitation on the amount of payments that may be made in any calendar year from $450 million to $600 million. Specific authority will be requested for the Secretary of Agriculture to give special consideration, in allocating conservation reserve funds, to those States and regions where curtailment of production of wheat or other surplus commodities is consistent with long-range conservation and production-adjustment goals. The rental rates needed to induce farmers to withdraw cropland from production under the conservation reserve depend on the income prospects from farming, which in turn are a reflection of the levels of price supports. Therefore, the future authorization for the conservation reserve program should not be increased above the 1960 level unless needed price support legislation is enacted for wheat.

Estimated expenditures for agricultural programs in fiscal 1961 are $5.6 billion, which is $510 million more than the estimate for the current year but $907 million less than was spent in 1959. Total new authority to incur obligations requested for agriculture and agricultural resources in 1961 is $4.6 billion. This amount includes $1.3 billion to restore, to the extent necessary, the capital impairment of the Commodity Credit Corporation resulting from previous price support losses and $1.4 billion to reimburse the Corporation for estimated costs and losses through the fiscal year 1960 of other programs financed through that agency.

Stabilization of farm prices and farm income: Most of the recent year-to-year variations in expenditures for agriculture and agricultural resources reflect changes in expenditures for price supports and other programs to stabilize farm prices and farm income. During the five fiscal years, 1955–59, Federal spending for these programs has accouted for 70 percent to 80 percent of the total for all agricultural programs. In the fiscal year 1961, these programs are estimated to cost $3.9 billion, an increase of $450 million over 1960, but a decrease of $1.2 billion from 1959.

Under present laws, price support expenditures for agricultural commodities cannot be controlled through regular budgetary processes. They are the result, mainly, of the loans and commodity purchases that the Commodity Credit Corporation is required to make, and the other price- and income-supporting programs that the Corporation is required to finance, under existing laws. These expenditures reflect the volume of production, consumption, and exports of price-supported commodities, which, in turn, are influenced by such uncertain factors as the weather and domestic and foreign economic conditions.

The budget estimate for 1961 reflects the residual effect of the large 1958 and 1959 crops and assumes that yields on price-supported crops for the 1960 crop year will be in line with recent averages; also exports of farm commodities in the fiscal year 1961 may be down somewhat from the high level expected in 1960.

The Sugar Act expires on December 31, 1960. To give sugar producers maximum time for production planning, action should be taken early in the present session of the Congress to continue this program.

We are continuing to use our surplus agricultural production in many ways for constructive purposes overseas through the "food for peace" program. Under the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 (Public Law 480), surplus wheat, cotton, corn, rice, and other commodities are being sold abroad for foreign currencies. These currencies are used principally as loans or grants for the economic development and common defense in foreign countries, and to a lesser extent to finance various U.S. programs abroad. Surplus commodities are also being given to foreign governments for emergency relief needs and to private relief organizations in support of their programs abroad; over 60 million needy people benefited this past year from these donation programs. Last year the executive branch proposed certain amendments which, if enacted, would have made this surplus disposal program more effective. It is recommended that the Congress again consider these amendments.

Rural electrification and telephones: About 96 percent of our farms now have central station electric service, as compared with 11 percent in 1935. The expanding use of power in the areas served by electric cooperatives financed by the Rural Electrification Administration continues to require substantial amounts of new capital every year to provide additional generating capacity and heavier transmission and distribution facilities. More than one-half of the total power sales by the REA system are made to rural industrial, recreational, and other nonfarm customers. The nonfarm users now comprise over 80 percent of the new customers being added.

The Rural Electrification Administration currently finances the capital needs of the cooperatives by borrowing from the Treasury at the statutory interest rate of 2 percent and relending at the same rate. Legislation is proposed under which REA would (a) borrow from the Treasury at not to exceed the average rate of interest payable by the Treasury on recently issued long-term marketable obligations, and (b) make future electric and telephone loans at the same rate plus one-fifth of 1 percent to cover administrative expenses and estimated losses. Legislation now before the Congress to place the operations of this agency on a revolving fund basis should also be enacted.

It is vital, looking ahead, that legislation be developed to enable telephone as well as electric borrowers to obtain funds from a mutually owned financing institution to meet the needs for the future growth of these borrowers. Under this longer range plan, loans would also be available from the Rural Electrification Administration to meet special circumstances. The Secretary of Agriculture will work with REA cooperatives and other interested parties in developing such a proposal.

Farm ownership and operation: In 1961, new direct loans and administrative expenses of the Farmers Home Administration are proposed in an amount equal to estimated collections on outstanding loans. Loans are made to borrowers who are unable to obtain credit from other sources at interest rates currently prevailing in their communities in order to finance farm ownership and enlargement, farm operations, and soil and water conservation. Direct loans for farm ownership and soil and water conservation are supplemented with private loans insured by the Federal Government.

The present authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans to farmers and ranchers is the cumulative result of the enactment of many separate laws over a long period of years. The legislation now before the Congress to simplify, consolidate, and improve the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to make these types of loans should be enacted. Also, the pending legislation to require the States to share a greater part of the costs of farm disaster relief assistance should be enacted.

Conservation of agricultural resources: Expenditures under the conservation reserve program are expected to be $394 million in the fiscal year 1961. Of this amount $362 million will be needed to fulfill commitments incurred in the crop years 1956 through 1960 under existing authority, and $32 million will be used for conservation practice payments and additional operating expenses under proposed legislation to extend this program for 3 years. Under the proposed legislation it is planned to add about 9 million additional acres to the program during the 1961 crop year, bringing the total at the end of that crop year to about 37 million acres. Increases in expenditures required for the 1961 crop year program will occur mainly in 1962 and later fiscal years.

In both the 1959 and 1960 appropriation acts, the Congress maintained the agricultural conservation program at levels which far exceeded my recommendations. As a result, expenditures of the Agricultural Conservation Program Service are estimated to be $244 million in 1960 and $233 million in 1961. The advance authorization for the 1961 agricultural conservation program, which will affect primarily fiscal year 1962 expenditures, should be limited to $100 million. The lower program recommended, together with other public aids for soil and water conservation, will meet the Nation's high-priority conservation needs.

Federal policy on cost-sharing assistance in the future should be concentrated on conservation measures which will foster needed shifts to less intensive uses of cropland, and assistance should be eliminated for practices which increase capacity to produce agricultural commodities already in surplus supply. Continuation of cost sharing for output-increasing practices would directly conflict with the recommended expansion of the conservation reserve program under which cropland is removed from production.

New obligational authority of $43 million is recommended for the upstream watershed programs, including $28 million for projects under the Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act. Of this amount, $5 million is provided to initiate construction on projects involving an estimated total Federal cost of $29 million.

New obligational authority of $10 million is requested for the Great Plains conservation program, the same as for 1960. Under this program conducted in designated counties of the 10 Great Plains States, the Federal Government provides cost-sharing and technical assistance to farmers who enter into long-term contracts to make needed adjustments of land use on their farms.

Research and other agricultural services: Expenditures for research, education, and other agricultural services, exclusive of programs financed with foreign currencies, will be about $8 million higher in the fiscal year 1961 than in 1960. This amount will provide increased support for the research programs on pesticide residues and on industrial uses of farm commodities. It will also provide increased support for the rural development program which is making an important contribution to the solution of the economic problems of rural areas arising out of technological changes in agriculture and inadequate employment opportunities.

In addition, it is estimated that $19 million will be spent in 1961 for the purchase of foreign currencies, obtained from the sale of surplus farm commodities, to be used for research and market development work abroad. This compares with approximately $12 million in foreign currencies to be used for this purpose in 1960.

NATURAL RESOURCES

The recommendations in this budget for Federal natural resource programs take into account their great importance to the Nation's economic growth and security.

The estimated total of $1.9 billion to be spent in the fiscal year 1961 for natural resources is more than has been spent for this purpose in any previous year. The increase of $152 million over 1960 is predominantly for water resources programs.

Water resources: The Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation will spend an estimated $1.2 billion in the fiscal year 1961 to construct, maintain, and operate flood control, navigation, irrigation, power, and related projects. This record total includes, in addition to operating costs, $965 million to continue construction on projects started in 1960 or prior years, $12 million for advance planning, and $18 million for the first-year expenditures on 42 proposed new starts. These new projects, as well as three new construction starts by the Tennessee Valley Authority and one by the International Boundary and Water Commission, are recommended in this budget in the interest of balanced development of water resources.

For the Corps of Engineers, appropriations (as distinct from the expenditures previously discussed) of $21 million are required for starting 31 new projects and for an additional number of smaller projects costing less than $400,000 each. The estimated commitments for these new projects total $301 million. Appropriations of $6 million for 1961 are recommended for the Bureau of Reclamation to begin construction on six projects with total estimated commitments of $184 million, and $11 million for loans which will be used by local groups to start work on five small reclamation projects.

I again recommend that the Congress authorize the Fryingpan-Arkansas project in Colorado.

Natural resources

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Program or agency	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Land and water resources:
Corps of Engineers	$779	$860	$910	$936
Department of the Interior:
Bureau of Reclamation	246	234	300	314
Power marketing agencies	33	40	40	40
Indian lands resources	57	62	57	41
Public domain and other	33	36	40	38
Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation	15	7	4	--------
Tennessee Valley Authority	7	35	73	21
Federal Power Commission	7	7	8	8
Department of State and other	5	6	9	9
Mineral resources	71	66	64	63
Forest resources	201	223	222	191
Recreational resources	86	87	87	54
Fish and wildlife resources	68	70	71	68
General resource surveys and other	60	53	53	53
Total	1,669	1,785	1,938	[1] 1,836

[1] Compares with new obligational authority of $1,742 million enacted for 1959 and $2,538 million (including $32 million of anticipated supplemental appropriations) estimated for 1960.

To carry forward the joint development of the waters of the Rio Grande, construction should be started on the Amistad (Diablo) Dam, in accordance with the treaty of February 3, 1944, between the United States and Mexico. I urge the Congress to enact promptly the legislation now needed to authorize negotiation of an agreement for this construction. Funds will be requested for the U.S. share of the first-year cost of this project following enactment of the legislation. Provision is made in this budget to begin modification of the lower Rio Grande levee system.

Under legislation enacted during the past session, the Tennessee Valley Authority plans to issue an estimated $115 million of revenue bonds in 1961. These funds will be used to help finance construction of a second unit in the Paradise steam powerplant and of other units under way, including new generating capacity in the eastern part of the TVA area. The Authority will start construction of the Melton Hill project for navigation and power. In accordance with this administration's policy, and as authorized under the Tennessee Valley Authority Act as amended by the recently enacted revenue bond legislation, the power facilities portion of this project will be financed from net power proceeds and revenue bonds, and the remaining portion will be financed from appropriations. With the completion of the Wilson lock, the present lock at Wheeler Dam will be a bottleneck for shipping on the Tennessee River. Appropriations are therefore recommended for 1961 to begin construction of a new lock at Wheeler Dam.

Research for converting sea water and brackish water into fresh water, carried on cooperatively by the Department of the Interior and non-Federal groups has progressed to the point where some processes are in the development stage. Construction will begin in 1960 at Freeport, Tex., on a demonstration plant for conversion of sea water, and $1.5 million is recommended in the 1961 budget for the Federal cost of building the first brackish water plant as well as a second sea water plant. Advance planning will be completed in 1961 on two additional demonstration plants.

Cost sharing on flood protection projects: It is essential that legislation be promptly enacted to establish a consistent basis for cost sharing on projects which provide flood protection benefits. At the present time, the various Federal agencies responsible for flood protection operate under different and confusing cost-sharing standards. The non-Federal contributions vary from zero to over 60 percent. This intolerable situation should be corrected. Legislation now before the Congress would require generally that identifiable non-Federal interests receiving flood protection benefits bear at least 30 percent of the costs of flood protection. The value of lands, easements, and rights-of-way contributed locally would be included as part of this non-Federal share. The cost of operation and maintenance would also be a State or local responsibility.

Mineral resources: Amendments to the Helium Act were recommended last year to carry out a long-range plan for conserving helium. This lightweight nonflammable gas is important to the Nation's atomic energy and missile programs, and known deposits of it are extremely limited. Under the legislation proposed, private industry would be encouraged to finance, build, and operate plants which would make helium available for conservation by the Department of the Interior. Prompt enactment is needed to check the waste of this essential gas.

The Bureau of Mines will continue its research on improved methods of production and utilization of coal and other minerals. Legislation is again recommended to grant authority to the Secretary of the Interior to contract for coal research, thus allowing the Secretary to use outside scientific resources to assist the coal industry.

Other resource programs: In the fiscal year 1961, programs for conserving and developing the resources of the public domain and Indian lands will be carried on at about the 1960 levels. Although total expenditures for forest resources are estimated at about the same level in 1961 as in 1960, some increases are provided in 1961 to carry forward the long-range program of the Forest Service for conservation and development, including added facilities and services to accommodate campers and picnickers. It is expected that these increased expenditures will be offset by a decrease in the unusually large 1960 outlays for fighting forest fires.

Receipts from the timber, grazing, and mineral resources on these public lands are estimated to increase to a total of over $400 million in 1961, including revenues from mineral leases on the Outer Continental Shelf. To obtain a more adequate return for use of federally owned resources, legislation is again recommended to revise the fee schedule for noncompetitive oil and gas leases on public domain lands.

In the interest of improving efficiency and providing convenience for the non-Federal parties concerned, certain functions with respect to land and timber exchanges should be transfered from the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of Agriculture by legislation embodying the basic provisions of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1959, which was disapproved by the Congress. In these exchanges, the Government obtains non-Federal lands in exchange for national forest lands administered by the Secretary of Agriculture or for timber on such lands. This legislation is need to simplify the work relating to these land exchanges.

Each year more of our citizens use and enjoy the national parks. Expenditures of $86 million estimated for the National Park Service in 1961 for recreational resources will provide for additional urgently needed facilities and services for visitors, for maintenance and operation of the present facilities, and for selective acquisition of lands to add to existing park areas.

Before it is too late we should take steps to preserve, for public benefit, part of the remaining undeveloped shore areas. I hope, therefore, that the Congress will enact during this session the legislation proposed in the last session to permit the Secretary of the Interior to select and acquire for the national park system three areas which would be of national significance because of their outstanding natural and scenic features, recreational advantages, and other public values.

Contract authority is available to finance planned construction of parkways, roads, and trails in the national parks and forests and on Indian lands during 1961. Beginning in 1962, this construction should be financed by direct appropriations, and the budget so contemplates.

Recent legislation increased the fee charged to hunters of migratory birds and earmarked these revenues for acquisition of lands for refuges and nesting areas. In 1961 land acquisitions from these revenues will be four times those of the current year. Other proposed increases in expenditures for fish and wildlife resources are mainly for fishery research.

LABOR AND WELFARE

Budget expenditures for labor and welfare programs in the fiscal year 1961 are estimated to reach an all-time high of $4.6 billion, of which three-fourths will take the form of grants to States and localities. The total expenditures are estimated to be $128 million more than for the current year. The largest increase is for promotion of public health, mainly for research and hospital construction, as a result of much larger appropriations by the Congress in previous years. Significant increases are also estimated for the support of basic research provided by the National Science Foundation and for the defense education and public assistance programs of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Budget expenditures for labor and welfare programs will be more than double the amount a decade ago. During the same period, trust funds expenditures for these programs, including social security and unemployment compensation, will have quintupled to an estimated $16.2 billion in 1961.

Labor and welfare

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Program or agency	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Promotion of education:
National Science Foundation, science education	$51	$54	$59	$70
Department of Health, Education, and Welfare:
Defense education program	78	134	170	171
Assistance to schools in federally affected areas	216	234	207	171
Vocational education and other	63	67	67	69
Other, primarily Bureau of Indian Affairs	60	60	62	65
Promotion of science, research, libraries and museums:
National Science Foundation, basic research	55	71	101	122
Department of Commerce:
Bureau of the Census	23	91	36	29
National Bureau of Standards and other	12	22	33	50
Other	27	37	50	45
Labor and manpower:
Temporary extended unemployment compensation	447	−7	------	--------
Grants for administration of employment service and unemployment compensation	306	323	311	326
Other	91	99	124	126
Promotion of public health:
National Institutes of Health, research grants and activities	265	364	390	400
Grants for construction of health research facilities	23	26	29	25
Hospital construction grants	136	144	161	126
Grants for construction of waste treatment facilities	36	45	45	20
Other	243	271	279	276
Public assistance	1,969	2,056	2,087	2,087
Correctional and penal institutions	39	46	48	57
Other welfare services:
School lunch and special milk programs	218	234	234	225
Other	61	71	76	79
Total	4,421	4,441	4,569	[1] 4,538

[1] Compares with new obligational authority of $4,182 million enacted for 1959 and $4,543 million (including $22 million in anticipated supplemental appropriations) estimated for 1960.

New obligational authority recommended for 1961 totals $4.5 billion, about the same as for 1960 but $356 million more than for 1959. Reductions from 1960 are recommended in the grant-in-aid programs for assistance to schools in federally affected areas for hospital construction, and for waste treatment works construction. Larger appropriations are proposed for other presently authorized activities in the fields of science, vocational rehabilitation, education, welfare, and health. In addition, a number of new programs are recommended to meet important national needs, particularly in the education and labor fields.

In the last several years great strides forward have been made in the social security, welfare, and health fields. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is continually reviewing the various programs in these fields for the purpose of determining where improvement should be made. As needs for improvement are found, appropriate recommendations will be made.

Education and research: Our Nation seeks to foster a climate of freedom and creativity in which education, the arts, and fundamental science can flourish. The Federal Government helps in the attainment of these objectives through programs for support of basic research, aid to educational institutions, and training assistance to individuals in various fields important to the national interest. In this budget, I recommend increased appropriations for high-priority education and research programs and enactment of new legislation to authorize additional aids to education.

I am recommending repeal of the provision of the National Defense Education Act that prohibits payments or loans from being made to any individual unless he executes an affidavit that he does not believe in or belong to any organization that teaches the illegal overthrow of the Government. This affidavit requirement is unwarranted and justifiably resented by a large part of our educational community which feels that it is being singled out for this requirement.

Education: Expenditures for the education-aid programs authorized by the National Defense Education Act of 1958 will increase sharply in 1961. During the current school year more than 100,000 students from 1,368 colleges, about four times the number of students last year, are expected to borrow from college loan funds to which the Government makes repayable advances. A supplemental appropriation of nearly $10 million is proposed to enlarge this loan program for 1960. A small increase in appropriations is recommended for 1961 pending further experience on the rate at which loans will be made to students. Increases are also proposed for fellowships for prospective college teachers; for grants to States for science, mathematics, and foreign language teaching equipment; for research in the educational use of television and other media; for contracts with universities for training of counselors and for foreign language training; and for grants to States for vocational training in occupations requiring scientific skills.

Appropriations of $70 million are requested for aids to science education programs administered by the National Science Foundation, an increase of $3 million over the amount provided in 1960.

The budget includes the same aggregate amount for vocational education programs as was appropriated this year, but with shift in emphasis. The need for Federal assistance in the vocational education programs begun in 1917 for the purpose of stimulating training in agriculture, home economics, industrial trades, and distributive occupations is not as great as for promotion of training in new science-age skills. Thus as increased funds for training needs in new skills are provided under the National Defense Education Act, Federal assistance for the older programs is being reduced by a corresponding amount.

Appropriations recommended for 1961 to assist school districts whose enrollment comes partially from children whose parents work or reside on Federal property are $54 million below those enacted for 1960 and are in line with requirements under legislation proposed by the administration last year. The appropriation recommended for these programs is the maximum which I believe should be provided. The substantial increase in Federal employment during World War II, which led to the enactment of this legislation in 1950, has been superseded by a relatively stable Federal Establishment. In many cases, the presence of Federal installations in the communities adds to rather than detracts from the revenue base for the support of schools. This is particularly true where parents employed by the Government live on private property which is subject to State and local taxation even though they earn their income on nontaxable Federal property. The proposed legislation would discharge more equitably the Federal responsibility in these districts, and its prompt enactment by the Congress is recommended.

The pressing need now is not for aid to federally affected districts on the basis initiated in 1950 but for general aid to help localities with limited resources to build public schools. Despite encouraging progress in the rate of school construction, many school districts are still finding it difficult to avoid overcrowding and double sessions as enrollments continue to mount. Moreover, increasing secondary school enrollments require facilities which are much more costly than elementary school classrooms. Last year the administration recommended legislation authorizing annual Federal advances to local school districts to pay up to half the debt service (principal and interest) on $3 billion of bonds to be issued in the next 5 years for school construction. This legislation is designed to stimulate, not supplant, additional State and local effort. Affirmative action should be taken this year on that proposal.

Congressional approval of the administration's proposals for aid to higher educational institutions is also essential. The enrollment growth facing colleges and universities from 1960 to 1975 brings a need for additional academic, housing, and related educational facilities. To help colleges finance the construction required, the administration's proposal would authorize Federal guarantees of $1 billion in bonds with interest subject to Federal taxation, and would provide Federal grants, payable over 20 years, equal to 25 percent of the principal of $2 billion of bonds. This program would provide aid on a much broader basis, and result in the construction of much larger total amounts of college facilities per dollar of Federal expenditures, than the present more limited college housing loan program which should be allowed to expire.

Basic research: To provide a strong foundation of fundamental scientific knowledge for the Nation's future advancement, this budget provides, in various functional categories including major national security, expenditures totaling more than $600 million for support of basic research in 1961.

Appropriations of $122 million are recommended for support of basic research by the National Science Foundation, an increase of $34 million over 1960. The total includes $79 million for basic research projects and $15 million for grants to universities for modernization of graduate level laboratories under a program initiated in 1960. Increased support is also provided for scientific work of the Bureau of Standards, including funds for two new laboratories, as a first step in the construction of completely new facilities for the agency.

Oceanography: Federal support of oceanography and related marine sciences is being substantially augmented by several agencies under a long-range program developed by the Federal Council on Science and Technology to strengthen the Nation's effort in this field. This program stems from a study undertaken by the National Academy of Sciences at the request of several agencies. The expansion of oceanographic research will be undertaken by the Navy, the Departments of Commerce and the Interior, and the National Science Foundation. Funds are provided for the construction of new vessels and the replacement of obsolete vessels, and for increased support for research by private institutions.

Government statistical services: Adequate and timely national statistical information is essential for recording and appraising the performance of the Nation's economy, and for formulating public and private policies. Activities planned in various agencies for the fiscal year 1961 will help close significant gaps in our statistical information and make improvements in current data. Obligations for these purposes in the various functional categories of the budget are estimated at $62 million, including $20 million for the decennial census and other periodic statistical programs.

This budget includes funds for tabulating and processing basic economic and demographic data collected through the Eighteenth Decennial Census, and for the final publication of the results of the 1958 censuses of business, manufactures, and mineral industries. Other recommendations include the initiation of a new series on the service trades and the improvement of data on retail trade, on consumer prices, on health, on crop and livestock production, and on State and local government finances.

Labor and manpower: Last year the administration recommended and the Congress enacted much-needed legislation designed to protect workers and the public from racketeering, corruption, and abuse of democratic processes which had been disclosed in the affairs of a few labor unions. To assure effective and efficient administration of this new law, the budget recommends supplemental appropriations in 1960 for the National Labor Relations Board and the newly established Bureau of Labor-Management Reports in the Department of Labor. Increased appropriations are proposed for both agencies for 1961. Additional funds needed by the Department of Justice will be requested later when requirements can be better determined.

Appropriations of $326 million are requested in the fiscal year 1961 for grants to the States to administer the Federal-State employment security system with its network of 1,800 offices throughout the country. These grants are now financed from an earmarked Federal tax and the transactions involved increase both budget receipts and expenditures, even though these funds cannot be used for general Government purposes. Legislation proposed by the administration last year for financing this program through the unemployment trust fund should be enacted. Amounts equal to the proceeds from this tax could then be placed directly in the trust fund from which the necessary grants could be appropriated and an adequate balance could be maintained as a reserve for employment security purposes. The administration of the program would then be financed in essentially the same way as other major social insurance programs.

The job placement services and unemployment compensation payments provided through the State employment security offices are important for a smoothly operating free labor market in a growing economy. These services and payments provide also for security against economic hardship for the work force covered by the system. I again urge the enactment of legislation to extend unemployment compensation to some 3 million workers, primarily those employed in small enterprises. Some States have recently made encouraging progress in increasing the duration and level of benefits, but more needs to be done and additional States should take these steps.

Action is needed to strengthen the financial position of the unemployment compensation system. Although the reserves of most States proved adequate in the past recession, a few were and still are in a precarious condition. Moreover, reserve funds in most States have fallen behind the growth in payrolls during the last decade, and in certain States could be inadequate in the event of future economic distress. I have asked the Secretary of Labor to make a study of this problem and to report to me his conclusions.

Previously proposed amendments to strengthen the basic authority in the Welfare and Pension Plan Disclosure Act should be enacted, and the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act should be extended to several million additional workers in accordance with previous recommendations. Legislation is likewise again proposed to assure equal pay for equal work, and to strengthen and improve laws governing hours of work and overtime pay on direct Federal and certain federally aided construction projects.

Public health: Advances in medical technology and the spread of private health insurance have played important roles in raising the level of health services for our rapidly growing population. At the same time, the growing demand for better health care has contributed to shortages of facilities, medical and scientific manpower, and supporting health workers, as well as to the rising cost of medical and hospital services.

In order to deal effectively with these developments, the Federal Government has expanded its public health programs and is actively seeking solutions to the Nation's health problems. Expenditures in the fiscal year 1961 are estimated to total $904 million, which is $53 million more than in 1960 and nearly three times the level 5 years earlier. The largest part of the increase is for medical research and training of research workers through programs of the National Institutes of Health, for which the estimated expenditures of $390 million in 1961 will be four times as great as 5 years ago. Expenditures for hospital construction grants are estimated at $161 million in 1961, a threefold increase during the same period.

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare will insist on maintaining high standards in determining the acceptability of medical research projects for Federal support. As I indicated last August in approving the 1960 appropriations for the Department, it is essential that Federal grants for these projects be so administered that medical manpower is not unduly diverted from other pressing needs and that Federal funds are not substituted for funds from private sources. The 1960 appropriation of $400 million for the National Institutes of Health will not be entirely committed this year even with advanced funding of certain training programs. I am recommending that 1961 appropriations to the National Institutes of Health continue at the high level of 1960.

The recommended appropriation for the Hill-Burton hospital construction program for 1961 is consistent with the levels achieved by this program before the 1958 recession. It will assure that sufficient new general hospitals can be financed to keep pace with population growth, cover current obsolescence rates, and provide for 6,000 new beds to reduce the backlog of needs. The remainder of this program, covering diagnostic and other special facilities, would approximate the 1959 and 1960 levels.

The 1961 appropriation proposed for construction of waste treatment facilities is the same as that requested for 1960. It represents the maximum amount which I believe is warranted for a construction program which is and should remain primarily a State and local responsibility.

Larger appropriations are proposed for other health programs where present or impending needs create urgent priorities. Emerging health problems of increasing seriousness to our population arise from the complexities of the environment in which we live. To cope with the far-reaching problems of environmental health on a more systematic and intensive basis, this budget provides substantial increases to the Public Health Service for air pollution, water pollution, and radiological health control activities. These increases for radiological health, together with the stepped-up activity by the Atomic Energy Commission and other agencies, will permit a greatly intensified effort by the Federal Government in this field. In order to provide for more effective Federal air and water pollution control activities, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare will make legislative recommendations to strengthen the enforcement provisions of the Water Pollution Control Act and to authorize greater Federal leadership in combating air pollution.

Rapid technological developments in the production, processing, and marketing of foods, drugs, and other products likewise underline the necessity for more research and action for the protection of the consumer. To meet this need, the budget continues to emphasize an orderly expansion of the Food and Drug Administration, expenditures for which will be more than double those 5 years ago.

Social insurance and other welfare: The social security insurance system now provides basic protection against loss of income from death, disability, and retirement to about 85 percent of our labor force. Another 8 percent are covered under the railroad retirement system and other public retirement systems.

Social security and public assistance: At the present time 10 million of the 16 million people aged 65 and over are receiving monthly old-age or survivors insurance benefits. This vast insurance system, which will pay $11.7 billion in old-age, survivors, and disability benefits to 14.6 million people of all ages in 1961, is administered at a cost of about 2 percent of the social security taxes.

Our social insurance and public retirement systems provide basic protection to the worker and his family. For those who have no such protection and whose incomes are insufficient to meet basic needs, the Federal Government shares, through grants to the States, in providing four categories of public assistance payments. These are (1) old-age assistance, (2) aid to the blind, (3) aid to dependent children, and (4) aid to the permanently and totally disabled. In 1961, the Federal share for payments, made to an estimated monthly average of 5.9 million beneficiaries, will total an estimated $2.1 billion, or about 58 percent of the total Federal-State-local public assistance expenditures. This contrasts with Federal expenditures of $1.1 billion, representing a Federal share of 52 percent, for payments to 4.9 million individuals in 1950.

Public assistance has long been recognized as primarily a responsibility of the State and local governments, because need for these payments in individual cases can best be determined at the local level. I am particularly concerned about the growing Federal share, especially because it tends to weaken this sense of State and local responsibility.

While we are spending hundreds of millions for aid to the needy, there are large gaps in our knowledge of the causes of dependency and of the best ways to alleviate or prevent it. I believe that appropriations to initiate a program of research and demonstration projects designed to identify and alleviate these causes are highly necessary and I have so recommended in this budget.

Military service credits: It has long been recognized that military service should be counted toward the rights of employees under the various public retirement programs. Likewise, where employees are not required to make payroll contributions during military service, the trust funds from which benefits based on such service are paid should be reimbursed by the Government. However, the Federal Government should not, as required under the Railroad Retirement Act, pay more than the true cost of such benefits or pay to both the railroad retirement account and to the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance trust funds for the same military service benefits.

Accordingly, I repeat my earlier recommendation that the Federal Government should reimburse the railroad retirement account only for the actual added cost of benefits resulting from military service. Pending action on legislation dealing with substantial overpayments found by the Comptroller General, no provision is made in this budget for further Federal military service payments to either the railroad retirement account or the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance trust funds.

Other welfare services: This budget includes recommended appropriations for vocational rehabilitation totaling $72 million for the fiscal year 1961, primarily for grants to help the State agencies rehabilitate an estimated 93,000 individuals, about 6 percent more than in 1960.

Grants to all school systems in the States through the school lunch and special milk programs of the Department of Agriculture are estimated at $234 million in 1961, approximately the same as in 1960. These programs will provide improved diets for 11.8 million children, on the average, in 1961. The 1961 amount is in addition to the commodities which are distributed to the schools through the disposal programs classified in this budget under agriculture and agricultural resources.

The health, employment, income, and other needs of the increasing number of elderly people in our population can be met only through the combined efforts and cooperation of private, local, State, and Federal organizations and agencies. The White House Conference on Aging, to be held in January 1961, and the State conferences which precede it should help point the way toward more productive and satisfying living for our aged citizens.

The realization of our aspirations for a better society in the years to come will in large measure depend upon the way in which our children and youth are prepared to realize their maximum potential. This will be the vital concern of the White House Conference on Children and Youth, which will be held in March 1960 and through which private and public organizations will endeavor to bring their wisest and most expert counsel together on this vitally important matter.

VETERANS SERVICES AND BENEFITS

Expenditures for veterans programs are estimated to rise by $314 million to $5.5 billion in 1961, chiefly because of additional pension cases and higher pension rates, both authorized by the Veterans' Pension Act of 1959. The increase for pensions, amounting to $438 million, will be partly offset by a decrease of $128 million in readjustment benefit expenditures.

Programs of the Veterans' Administration, providing compensation and pension, medical, and readjustment benefits for the Nation's veterans, rank fourth in size among all Government functions in this budget. Total expenditures for these programs, as presently authorized, will continue to increase in future years as our veterans advance in age. The 23 million living veterans, together with the dependents and survivors of veterans, comprise a total of 81 million people, a considerable proportion of whom are potential recipients of one or more types of benefits.

This country has provided a wide range of benefits and services for war veterans and their families to meet needs resulting from military service. Disability and death compensation benefits have been provided for veterans who were injured in the service or for their survivors. The Servicemen's and Veterans' Survivor Benefits Act of 1956 improved the death benefit structure both for wartime and peacetime servicemen. In 1957, general disability compensation rates were increased by 10 percent, and a still larger increase was enacted in the basic rate for the totally disabled.

A first-rate hospital and medical care program is also being provided. During the past year a long-range policy for stabilizing the Veterans' Administration's hospital program at 125,000 beds has been established, and beginning with the 1961 budget a 12-year hospital modernization program is being initiated that will ultimately cost $900 million.

The 21 million veterans who served during World War II or the Korean conflict were eligible for benefits from the highly successful readjustment programs. For the 16 million World War II veterans the GI bill provided unemployment and self-employment compensation payments to 9.7 million veterans; education and training benefits to 8.4 million veterans; and loan assistance to 5 million veterans for the acquisition or improvement of homes, farms, and businesses. Except for the loan guarantee and direct loan programs, which will terminate on July 25, 1960, the World War II readjustment benefits have essentially expired. Similar readjustment programs, which will continue into 1965 for veterans of the Korean conflict, have already provided 2.3 million veterans with education and training benefits and 700,000 with loans. The special unemployment compensation program for Korean conflict veterans which ends in 1961 has aided 1.3 million veterans. No further extension or liberalization of these benefits is needed.

The longstanding veterans pension program also provides special assistance to war veterans for needs not arising from military service. The Veterans' Pension Act of 1959 was an important step in the modernization of the program. It eliminated the disparity in eligibility for pensions between the widows of World War I veterans and those of later wars, and provided higher benefits for all persons who could demonstrate need under a new sliding scale income test. No further liberalization of the laws concerning pensions for nonservice-connected disability is proposed.

In addition to the special veterans programs, a great majority of veterans participate in the general social security, health, and welfare programs which are financed wholly or in part by the Federal Government. In the future these general programs will provide with increasing adequacy for the economic security needs of our elderly population, of which veterans and their widows will constitute a large and increasing proportion for several decades.

Veterans services and benefits

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Program or agency	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Readjustment benefits:
Education and training	$574	$445	$316	$286
Loan guarantee and other benefits	133	115	124	124
Unemployment compensation	44	8	------	------
Compensation and pensions:
Service-connected compensation	2,070	2,071	2,066	2,066
Non-service-connected pensions	1,153	1,278	1,716	1,716
Burial and other allowances	52	58	58	58
Hospitals and medical care	875	906	928	933
Hospital construction	45	60	63	75
Insurance and servicemen's indemnities	35	36	31	49
Other services and administration	193	180	169	168
Total	5,174	5,157	5,471	[1] 5,476

[1] Compares with new obligational authority of $5,125 million enacted for 1959 and $5,176 million (including $114 million in anticipated supplemental appropriations) estimated for 1960.

Readjustment benefits: Readjustment assistance is expected to decline significantly from 1960 to 1961, primarily because of the reduction in the number of veterans of the Korean conflict participating in educational or vocational training programs. An average of 225,000 veterans will receive training in 1961, compared to 325,000 in 1960 and 425,000 in 1959. Educational benefits for war orphans, which were enacted in 1956, are expected to total over $17 million in 1961.

Peacetime ex-servicemen are recognized as being in a different category from wartime veterans because of the different conditions under which they serve. Those who serve in peacetime undergo fewer rigors and hazards than their combat comrades. The disruption of their educational plans and careers is minimized under peacetime selective service procedures. While on active service they now receive substantial pay and benefits, and they return to civilian life under more favorable conditions after receiving valuable training while in service.

To discharge its responsibility to peacetime ex-servicemen, the Federal Government has provided unemployment compensation, employment service and reemployment rights, and service-connected disability or death compensation. One additional benefit should be added to these in accord with my earlier recommendations: a program of vocational rehabilitation for those with substantial service-connected disabilities. On the other hand, I oppose the establishment of special educational and loan guarantee programs for peacetime ex-servicemen. Such benefits are not justified because they are not supported by the conditions of military service. Moreover, they would be directly contrary to the incentives which have been provided to encourage capable individuals to make military service a career.

Compensation and pensions: Expenditures for compensation for service-connected disabilities and deaths will show only a minor change in 1961. A reduction in the number of World War I and II veterans on the rolls will be offset somewhat by the addition of veterans of the Korean conflict and peacetime ex-servicemen. Compensation will be paid for an estimated 2.4 million cases during 1961.

The net impact of the 1959 law governing non-service-connected pensions is to add several hundred thousand new cases to the rolls at an estimated additional cost of $284 million in 1961 and an estimated cumulative cost of $9 billion during the next 40 years. Expenditures are also increasing because of the growing number of World War I veterans reaching age 65. Approximately 40 percent of all World War I veterans over 65 are now receiving pensions. An average of 1.9 million veterans and families of deceased veterans are expected to receive pensions in 1961; this is 26 percent more than in 1960 and 38 percent more than in 1959.

Hospital and medical services: The budget includes $928 million of expenditures in 1961 for hospital and medical care for veterans. The increase of $22 million from 1960 is to continue improvements in the staffing and quality of service in the hospitals and to meet the higher costs of hospital and medical care generally. Hospital and domiciliary care will be provided during the year for an average of 141,250 beneficiaries per day, and a total of 2,300,000 veterans will receive medical or dental care for service-connected disabilities in outpatient clinics.

Hospital construction: As a first step toward an orderly 12-year program for modernization of existing veterans' hospital facilities, an appropriation of $75 million is proposed for 1961. Of this total, $53 million is for construction of replacement hospitals at Cleveland, Ohio (800 beds); Washington, D.C. (700 beds); and Martinez, Calif. (500 beds). The remainder is for a large number of modernization projects.

Administration: The general operating expenses of the Veterans' Administration are expected to decline approximately 7 percent in 1961, reflecting decreased workloads in loan and educational programs, improved administrative procedures particularly in insurance operations, and the application of modern electronic equipment to recording and paying veterans' benefits.

INTEREST

Interest payments are estimated to rise $200 million to $9.6 billion in the fiscal year 1961. These payments, almost entirely for interest on the public debt, represent 12 percent of budget expenditures.

Interest

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Item	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Interest on public debt	$7,593	$9,300	$9,500	$9,500
Interest on refunds of receipts	70	75	75	75
Interest on uninvested funds	9	9	10	10
Total	7,671	9,385	9,585	9,585

For a year and a half now, market rates of interest have been increasing, reflecting inflationary pressures, the high level of investment demands in our economy and heavy Federal borrowing required by the 1958 and 1959 budget deficits. The rise in market rates requires the Treasury to pay higher interest on securities issued to refinance the heavy volume of maturing obligations, which were issued when interest rates were lower.

It is imperative that the Congress lift the present legal ceiling of 4¼ percent on interest rates on all Government obligations having maturities of more than 5 years. Otherwise, interest payments could rise even more sharply. The current interest rate on shorter term securities is now higher than on long-term bonds, and the continued need to limit financing to the short-term market tends to raise interest rates more than if the financing could be spread over both the short- and long-term markets.

GENERAL GOVERNMENT

Expenditures for General Government activities are estimated to rise by $200 million to $1.9 billion in the fiscal year 1961, primarily because of increased construction of Government buildings and a new appropriation to the civil service retirement fund required by law.

Federal financial management: There is growing evidence that a considerable amount of revenue is lost annually to the Government because of the failure of some individuals and businesses to report fully the income which they have received. The existence of such a condition seriously weakens the integrity of our tax system, and places an unfair share of the total tax burden upon the vast majority of citizens who conscientiously report all of their taxable income. This budget includes an increase of $29 million for the Internal Revenue Service, primarily to strengthen its enforcement programs, including initiation of an electronic computer system. I urge its approval as the first step in a long-range plan to prevent this revenue loss. The additional costs should be recovered many times through increased tax collections in later years.

General Government

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Program or agency	Budget expenditures			Recommended new obligational authority for 1961
	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Legislative functions	$102	$121	$146	$95
Judicial functions	47	50	53	53
Executive direction and management	12	13	14	14
Federal financial management	566	560	591	595
General property and records management	291	384	432	469
Central personnel management and employment costs	205	198	251	251
Civilian weather services	46	52	58	63
Protective services and alien control	216	218	229	230
Territories and possessions, and the District of Columbia	89	96	126	124
Other general government	30	20	12	15
Total	1,606	1,711	1,911	[1] 1,910

[1] Compares with new obligational authority of $1,795 million enacted for 1959 and $1,645 million (including $7 million in anticipated supplemental appropriations) estimated for 1960.

General property and records management: The efficient and economical operation of many Federal agencies is hindered by inadequate office space, much of which is rented. Accordingly, new obligational authority of $185 million is recommended for fiscal year 1961 for the planning and construction of additional general office space. Although no funds for such construction were appropriated for 1960, expenditures will rise in 1961 as outlays for new construction are added to those for construction initiated in prior years. In addition, the estimate for the legislative functions includes increased expenditures for a new office building for the House of Representatives.

The General Services Administration, in collaboration with other agencies, has developed a new program for improved use of excess personal property by Federal agencies, and faster, more efficient disposal of surplus property. This involves more effective screening of such property and simplifying the procedures under which agencies are advised of its availability for other uses.

Central personnel management: The Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of the Budget have recently recommended a long-range policy on financing the civil service retirement system. I hope the Congress will speedily enact these recommendations, which would assure continued availability in the fund of the full amount of the net accumulations from employee contributions and establish a definite basis for meeeting the Government's share of the costs consistent with the principle that its full faith and credit support the authorized benefits.

A new appropriation of $46 million for payments to the civil service retirement fund is requested for 1961 to finance the costs of new or increased benefits enacted in 1958 for certain widows or widowers of former Federal employees and for certain retired employees. The law provides that these particular benefits cannot be continued after July 1, 1960, unless such an appropriation is made. Recipients of these benefits should enjoy the same assurance of uninterrupted payment as do other annuitants of the civil service retirement system, and the Federal liability in their case is not different from that for other benefits under this program. Accordingly, I recommend that the Congress consider, in connection with the legislation referred to in the preceding paragraph, authorizing the civil service retirement and disability fund to bear the future cost of these particular benefits without a specific appropriation.

The budget provides approximately $120 million to pay the Government's share of the Federal Employees Health Benefits Act of 1959, which becomes effective in the fiscal year 1961, and which will provide opportunity for approximately 2 million employees and 2.4 million dependents to have reasonable protection against the cost of both basic and major health care. This program will add substantially to employee fringe benefits, which in the aggregate now compare very favorably with those provided to employees in private industry.

In 1958 immediately following enactment of a 10 percent general salary increase for Federal civilian employees, I propose to the Congress a review of all compensation systems in the three branches of the Federal Government, directed toward adoption of an equitable employee compensation policy. This recommendation was renewed in my budget message for the 1960 fiscal year.

It has been more than 30 years since a thoroughgoing review has been made of the manner in which the Federal Government compensates its employees. There are now dozens of pay plans in the executive branch alone. Review and coordination of the excessive number of pay plans now in existence are the most effective means of removing inequities which adversely affect the Government's ability to recruit and retain qualified personnel in some fields. Continued patching of individual Federal salary systems is not satisfactory as a substitute for a comprehensive Federal pay policy, which should be developed either by authorizing a Joint Commission such as I proposed or by some other equally effective means. Pending development and adoption of such a comprehensive policy, a general pay raise would be unwarranted, unfair to the taxpayers of the United States, and inequitable as among employees compensated under different and unrelated pay systems.

The budget estimates for the Post Office Department assume legislative action to continue that part of the 1958 salary increase for postal field service employees which expires on January 20, 1961.

Civilian weather services: Appropriations totaling $63 million are recommended for the fiscal year 1961 for the Weather Bureau. The $12 million increase over the amounts enacted for 1960 will permit expanded research, weather observation, and forecasting services. These improvements are necessary primarily to keep pace with advances in air traffic controls. Research projects include intensive investigation of hurricanes and tornadoes, and the development of a semiautomatic system for the collection and analysis of weather data.

Hawaii: Our Union was greatly strengthened in 1959 by the admission of the States of Alaska and Hawaii. As in the case of Alaska, comprehensive legislation will be necessary to enable Hawaii to take its place as the equal of the other 49 States. Recommendations will be transmitted to the Congress concerning those changes needed in Federal laws in order to bring Hawaii under the same general laws, rules, and policies as are applicable to the other States.

Territories, possessions, and District of Columbia: Completion of action on statehood for Alaska and Hawaii makes it all the more urgent that legislation to provide home rule for the District of Columbia be enacted without delay. Both equity and efficiency require that the people of the Nation's Capital be given a voice in their own local government and that the role of the Federal Government be limited to matters of Federal concern.

Legislation will shortly be proposed to the Congress to establish a Government corporation to develop an improved mass transportation system in the National Capital metropolitan area, pending creation of an interstate agency to assume this responsibility.

To foster further development of democratic institutions and in keeping with the growth of local self-government, action should be taken to authorize the Virgin Islands and Guam to be represented in the Congress through nonvoting resident commissioners.

Intergovernmental relations: There are many problems requiring attention of the recently established Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. Foremost among these are the problems of allocation of tax sources among various levels of government and rapid growth of metropolitan areas.

An aspect of intergovernmental relations requiring attention in both the legislative and executive branches involves a series of court decisions permitting local taxation of federally owned property in the hands of contractors and leaseholders. This matter should be resolved in the context of the broader subject of Federal payments in lieu of taxes.

Other recommendations: Legislation enacted in the last session of Congress to amend the immigration and nationality laws failed to cover several significant proposals, including modification of the quota system. Prompt action is needed on these remaining items.

To strengthen the Government's hand in restraining inflationary forces, I urge that the Employment Act of 1946 be amended to make reasonable price stability an explicit goal of Federal economic policy, coordinate with the goals of maximum production, employment, and purchasing power now specified in that act.

I urge the Congress to enact the remaining six points of the civil rights program that I recommended last year. The Civil Rights Commission, extended for an additional 2 years by the last session of Congress, continues its important work and has developed additional constructive recommendations, particularly for protecting the right of every citizen to vote. I hope these recommendations will also be earnestly considered by the Congress.

I also recommend that the Congress create additional Federal judgeships, as proposed by the Judicial Conference, and strengthen Federal laws against organized crime.

Legislation will be submitted to increase the authorization for appropriations for the Commission on International Rules of Judicial Procedure in order that it may complete its work successfully.

It is important that legislation now before the Congress be enacted to provide reimbursement to Americans for certain property damage in Europe and the Far East during World War II for which compensation has not previously been authorized.

I again recommend that a system be devised for suitable recognition in the United States for distinguished achievement in various fields of endeavor.

IMPROVEMENTS IN BUDGETING, ORGANIZATION, AND MANAGEMENT

The decisions made by government are vital to so many aspects of our national life that improvements of the procedures through which these decisions are made should be a continuing major goal. A substantial number of important specific steps can and should be taken to improve these practices.

Revisions in authorization and appropriation procedure: Contract authority and authorizations to spend from debt receipts in basic legislation outside the appropriation process are generally inconsistent with sound standards of budget practice. The recommendations being placed before the Congress in this budget are based upon the principle that authority to make budget obligations and expenditures, whether financed from receipts or borrowing, should be granted by the Congress only in appropriation acts.

The Congress has shown a growing tendency to require the annual enactment of authorizing legislation before appropriations may be made. Space programs, some mutual security programs, military and atomic energy construction in this budget, and much of defense procurement beginning in fiscal 1962, will require separate authorizations before appropriations can be considered. Under this procedure these programs receive a duplicating review each year. At the same time the value of legislative consideration and expression of long-range program objectives and amounts is largely lost, and agency personnel devote an inordinate amount of time to the congressional process at the expense of effective administration of the continuing program. I hope the Congress will find it possible generally to make authorizing legislation cover program requirements for longer periods of time.

In the interest of good government, methods to expedite the authorization and appropriation processes should be found. In order to facilitate early consideration, and also to show the Government program more fully, this budget includes specific proposed appropriations for a number of programs for which authorizing legislation must also be renewed. In most of thse cases, proposals for such legislation will be submitted in a very short time. This procedure should be an improvement over the past practice of delaying submission of detailed estimates until the renewing legislation has been enacted.

Before the executive budget is presented to Congress annually, the most careful consideration is given to the relationships of spending to receipts and borrowing, and to relative priorities of various programs. When the budget reaches the Congress, however, its consideration is usually fragmented because of the distribution of responsibilities among the various committees and subcommittees. I believe that the Congress should find means by which it can more effectively examine the budget as a whole and base its actions on the overall fiscal situation.

Provision for item veto: In passing the Alaska and Hawaii statehood acts, the Congress again recognized the value of an item veto by a chief executive by approving provision for its use in their State constitutions. Forty-one State Governors now have item veto authority. Many Presidents have recommended it, but the Congress has not yet granted the President of the United States that power. I again recommend it.

Control of foreign currencies: The Government receives from its operations considerable quantities of foreign currencies each year. Much of this currency is earmarked for grants to and loans in the country concerned, and some is available for programs of the U.S. Government. In many countries the currencies available to us are needed for conducting normal U.S. operations, yet such use is prevented in some cases by statutes or by the international agreements under which the currencies are received.

As a result of a detailed study, this budget includes provisions to bring under budget and appropriation controls all foreign currencies available for U.S. agency operations which are received from the sale of surplus agricultural commodities. This change will not alter total appropriations or expenditures, but will increase those of the agencies using the currencies and decrease those of the Commodity Credit Corporation. Accordingly, I intend that no more allocations be made for uncontrolled use after the current fiscal year except for country grants and loans committed in international agreements, and I recommend that at an appropriate time the Congress remove from the laws the provisions which permit uncontrolled use for other purposes. I am also instructing that in future negotiations of international agreements we endeavor to avoid restrictions which would limit our ability to apply normal budget and appropriation controls to the use of those currencies which are earmarked for U.S. agency operations.

Improved funding for public enterprises: Major business-type activities of the Government should, with few exceptions, operate on a self-sustaining basis. Their budgets and accounts should permit ready comparison of their expenses and revenues. They should have simplicity in their financing structure and the flexibility in expenditures necessary to meet unforeseen business conditions, but should be expected to keep their obligations and expenditures within the resources provided by Congress for that purpose, and should be subject to annual review and control by the Congress. Accordingly, I recommend that the Rural Electrification Administration, the Farmers Home Administration, the Bureau of Reclamation, the power-marketing agencies of the Department of the Interior, and the loan guarantee programs of the Veterans' Administration be financed through revolving funds. Similar recommendations may be made in due time for other business-type activities.

Legislation is again being recommended to bring under budget review the activities of those few Government corporations which are now exempt from such review, but possess authority to draw money from the Treasury or to commit the Treasury for future expenditures. This can best be done by including them under the budget provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act.

Revision of budget presentation: In this budget more than half of the 626 appropriation accounts of the executive branch have been presented on a cost basis. The remaining appropriations, including those for the Department of Defense, will be converted to this basis as soon as possible. This budget also provides for accrued expenditure limitations for 12 appropriations, in accordance with legislation enacted in 1958. Such limitations are recommended to permit closer congressional control over annual expenditures.

The customary totals of budget receipts and budget expenditures are distorted by the inclusion in both of interest and other payments by public enterprise funds to the general fund of the Treasury. Such interfund payments amounted to $355 million in the fiscal year 1959, and are estimated at $737 million for 1960, and $779 million for 1961. While this duplication does not affect the amount of the budget surplus or deficit, it does overstate the size of the budget receipts and expenditures. To correct this it is planned that such amounts, while still shown within the figures for the affected agencies, will be eliminated from budget totals in financial statements on Government operations beginning with the fiscal year 1961. I also plan to present the 1962 budget so as to remove this duplication. However, in order to preserve full comparability with previous budgets, no such adjustments are shown in the amounts in this document. If adjustments had been made, the net totals would appear as follows:

Adjusted budget totals, excluding interfund payments

[Fiscal years. In billions]

	1959 actual	1960 estimate	1961 estimate
Budget receipts	$67.9	$77.9	$83.2
Budget expenditures	80.3	77.7	79.0
Budget deficit	12.4
Budget surplus		.2	4.2

Strengthening of organization and management: From the beginning of this administration I have placed emphasis on obtaining the best possible executive ability in the administration of the widespread and diverse activities of the Federal Government and on providing the best organizational structure in which officials can carry out their responsibilities. This continued emphasis is essential not only to operate the complex machinery of government effectively, but also to meet the constant flow of new problems of organization and management.

In recent years several major organizational improvements have been made, including the establishment of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Federal Aviation Agency, and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, as well as new organizational structures for defense programs and for civilian and defense mobilization activities. The many actions taken on recommendations of the two Hoover Commissions have also resulted in more efficient administration.

The Reorganization Act of 1949, as amended, under which numerous executive agencies and functions have been reorganized, contains a limitation of June 1, 1959, for the transmittal of reorganization plans by the President to the Congress. Accordingly, this authority is not now available. I urgently recommend that this cutoff date be removed in order to permit continued use of that act by me and by my successor in improving the management and organization of the executive branch.

The search for better management and operations is a never-ending process. Like all large organizations, the Federal Government continues to have management problems. For example, property management offers an enormous challenge, and in the past year greater attention has been focused on it. Application of new data-processing techniques to Government operations is under constant study. The Post Office Department is improving its operations by installing modern methods of mail handling and transportation. The Treasury Department is using up-to-date data-processing equipment to achieve more effective administration of disbursements and revenue collection. These are but a few of many examples, and this budget provides for further improvements.

At my request, the heads of all Government agencies will give renewed emphasis to the review of management procedures and operating activities to make sure that the most modern methods, techniques, and equipment are in use. All agency heads have been encouraged to continue to search for the best practices in other Government agencies, in business, or in industry, to apply them in their own agencies to the extent possible during the term of this administration, and to leave to their successors a legacy of plans for further improvement.

The plans presented in this budget meet the Nation's immediate needs and will support continuing sound economic growth in the future. The achievement of these plans, however, will in the last analysis depend on the people themselves.

I believe our people have the determination to hold expenditures in check, to pay their own way without borrowing from their children, to choose wisely among priorities, and to match sound public policy with private initiative. It is that determination which is the key to continued progress and sound growth with security. It is that determination which reinforces the recommendations I have made.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

JANUARY 18, 1960.

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET MESSAGE

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, never before has the United States faced such odds as it faces today—both at home and abroad. Abroad we are menaced by an implacable totalitarian power with superior armament, and the imperative necessity of demonstrating conclusively in the near future its control of international affairs. At home we are carrying the greatest debt ever contracted by any nation in the world's history, with rapidly deteriorating credit and the imminent necessity of reversing that trend not later than this Congress.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to one of the most optimistic budget recommendations ever transmitted to the House within my recollection.

The outstanding feature of this budget is the most satisfying assurance that could be given—the promise not only of a balanced budget but the prospect of a surplus of $4.2 billion at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, to be applied to a reduction of the public debt.

The most disappointing feature of the budget is that it promises to accumulate this surplus through tentative increases in the national revenues and not through reduction of national expenditures. Throughout the lengthy document there is no mention of the word "retrenchment." In fact, the Bureau of the Budget recommends the largest recurring expenditures since the administration of George Washington. It is proposed to exceed current year expenditures by $1.4 billion. It also includes the largest amount ever spent for interest on our staggering national debt. But it offers not one scintilla of hope of reduced taxation. As a matter of fact, it proposes another extension of wartime taxes in time of peace and in addition the imposition of new taxes not heretofore levied.

At the close of every other war the Government has promptly repealed war taxes. The Korean war ended 7 years ago but this budget still asks the continuation of wartime taxes and new taxes not heretofore imposed, including the irksome nuisance taxes which have so clogged the channels of trade for the past 10 years.

In short, this budget proposes to take from the people $84 billion, the highest take in any year, peace or war, since the foundation of the Republic.

CONTINGENCIES SURROUNDING $4.2 BILLION SURPLUS

Even with this unprecedented tax draft upon the taxpayers of the country, there is serious reason to doubt the fulfillment of the promise of any surplus whatsoever, much less a surplus of $4,200 million. We have learned by sad experience that no prediction of a budget surplus can be taken at face value, and certainly that is true of this budget.

You will recall that in the annual budget submitted to Congress for 1959 we were promised a balanced budget and a small surplus, and we wound up at the close of that year, ending last June 30, with a backbreaking deficit of more than $12 billion.

The estimates both of revenues of $84 billion and expenditures of $79.8 billion rest on a number of assumptions and highly doubtful contingencies. Revenues totaling $84 billion in the coming year 1961 would involve an increase of $15.7 billion over collections in fiscal 1959, or an increase of 23 percent between these 2 years. The recordbreaking $84 billion tax take expected in this budget rests on a rosy outlook predicated on great national prosperity and large profits—with inflated dollars. It assumes the enactment of legislation raising postal income by some $554 million, a proposal emphatically rejected by this Congress in the last session. It assumes the extension of Korean wartime taxes. It proposes new taxes. In all, of the six budgets previously submitted by the Bureau of the Budget during this administration, the original spending estimates were exceeded, as shown by the following tabulation:

Variations in Spending

[In billions]

Budget	President's original budget estimate	Actual result	Over (+) or under (−), original estimate
1960 budget (latest estimate)	$77.0	[1] $78.4	+$1.4
1959 budget	73.9	80.7	+6.8
1958 budget	71.8	71.9	+.1
1957 budget	65.9	69.4	+3.5
1956 budget	62.4	66.5	+4.1
1955 budget	65.6	64.6	−1.0

[1] Revised estimate, as shown in 1961 budget.

NOTE.—Figures represent "net budget expenditures" as used in the budget.

Similarly, there have been wide variations in revenue results contrasted to original budget estimates. The following table of official figures shows that situation:

Variations in Revenues

[In billions]

Budget	President's original budget estimate	Actual result	Over (+) or under (−), original estimate
1960 budget (latest estimate)	$77.1	[1] $78.6	+$1.5
1959 budget	74.4	68.3	−6.1
1958 budget	73.6	69.1	−4.5
1957 budget	66.3	71.0	+4.7
1956 budget	60.0	68.1	+8.1
1955 budget	62.6	60.4	−2.2

[1] Revised estimate, as shown in 1961 budget.

NOTE.—Figures represent "net budget receipts" as used in the budget.

And in addition, original budget estimates of deficits and surpluses matched against actual results affords comparisons much in point to the $4.2 billion surplus figure. The following table shows how far and how often the mark has been missed in the last 6 years:

Variations in deficit and surplus estimates under the present administration

[In billions]

Budget	President's original budget estimate	Actual result
1954 budget	(1)	−$3.1
1955 budget	−$2.9	−4.2
1956 budget	−2.4	+1.6
1957 budget	+.4	+1.6
1958 budget	+1.8	−2.8
1959 budget	+.5	−12.4
1960 budget	+.1	[2] +.2
Total for last 6 years	−2.5	−16.0
1961 budget estimate	+4.2

[1] Submitted by previous administration but revised and administered by present administration.
[2] Latest official estimate (in 1961 budget).

NOTE.—Highway trust fund which began with fiscal 1957, not included.

There is no arresting assurance that we can realize these highly desirable predictions this year with any more accuracy than we did last year. Inevitably, the collector, the tax gatherer, working diligently around the clock, bringing in larger and larger amounts, collecting from the taxpayers of the country larger national revenues than were ever enjoyed by any nation since the beginning of time—the busy tax collector has not been able to keep up with the spenders in the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

As a result, today we are saddled with the largest national debt that ever kindled the fires of inflation; that ever increased the cost of living; that ever debased the currency; that ever limited business expansion; that ever curtailed employment; that ever imperiled national defense in this or any other country.

WHO PREPARES RECORDBREAKING BUDGETS?

All fiscal recommendations start with the President. Congress does not make the budget. The President makes it. It includes only what he recommends. He is directed by law to make such tax, spending, and appropriation recommendations as in his judgment are necessary. The President is in complete command. He is not required to submit his recommendations to anyone before including them in the budget. He is by law completely free to recommend cuts in appropriations of any magnitude and revisions of basic legislation to correspond.

They do not have to recommend more and more spending—as in this budget and as in past budgets.

They do not have to urge extension of war tax rates in time of peace—as in this budget and in every budget.

They do not have to recommend new taxes and new revenues—as in this budget and in past budgets.

So, Mr. Speaker, when the administration talks economy, hope of tax relief, the practice of self-restraint in expenditure, and holding the line on the cost of living—when they talk this but submit record budgets, that is the executive branch of the Government and not the legislative branch of the Government.

Some features of this budget do not comport with the goals announced in this and past messages. And this final effective budget from the President discloses beyond all challenge that this administration, after 8 years in office, has not accomplished a single one of the laudable objectives promised in the 1952 and 1956 campaigns.

The message calls for restraint in expenditure but the budget proposes to spend $1.4 billion more than this year. It was only a little over a year ago that the President declared war on excessive spending. He was quoted this way:

I think every place we are spending too much money * * * We must start right from the biggest and go right down to the smallest.

He decried what he termed "loose handling of our fiscal affairs." But the budget submitted shortly thereafter proposed to spend more. And it also proposed increased appropriations, both large and small.

You remember the bristling vetoes of last year's public works appropriations and the castigation of the number of new project starts especially because of their long-range expenditure effect. But we find this budget advocating new project starts that will call for even more spending in the future. In fact, it proposes 42 new starts requiring $38 million in 1961 and a total commitment of $500 million over a period of years. This budget was being formulated at the time Congress was being advised in a veto message concerning new starts that

This tremendous expansion in Government expenditures in just this one area in so short a period of time brings into sharp focus how Congress by action in one year builds increases into the Federal budget in future years. * * * This illustrates how easily effective control of Federal spending can be lost.

Overspending in respect to water resources is hurtful to the United States and to the proper development of these resources themselves. The American people are opposed to overspending no matter where it is attempted.

It is almost inconceivable that the sins of the Congress in the last session can be made virtues of the executive branch in just 5 months.

I include a summary of budget receipts, expenditures, and surpluses or deficits for the 8 fiscal years 1954–61.

Net budget receipts, expenditures, and deficit (−) or surplus (+), 8 fiscal years, 1954–61

[In billions]

Fiscal year	Net receipts	Net expenditures	Deficit (−) or surplus (+)
1. Fiscal 1954 (from July 1953)	$64.7	$67.8	−$3.1
2. Fiscal 1955	60.4	64.6	−4.2
3. Fiscal 1956	68.1	66.5	+1.6
4. Fiscal 1957:
(a) Including highway trust fund	72.5	70.3	+2.2
(b) Excluding highway fund as per budget	71.0	69.4	+1.6
5. Fiscal 1958:
(a) Including highway trust fund	71.2	73.5	−2.3
(b) Excluding highway fund as per budget	69.1	71.9	−2.8
6. Fiscal 1959:
(a) Including highway trust fund	70.4	83.4	−13.0
(b) Excluding highway fund as per budget	68.3	80.7	−12.4
7. Fiscal 1960 (revised estimates in 1961 budget):
(a) Including highway trust fund	81.2	[1] 81.5	−.3
(b) Excluding highway fund as per budget	78.6	[1] 78.4	+.2
8. Fiscal 1961 (budget estimates):
(a) Including highway trust fund	[2] 86.9	[3] 82.7	+4.2
(b) Excluding highway fund as per budget	[2] 84.0	[3] 79.8	+4.2
Total, all 8 years:
(a) Including highway trust fund	575.4	590.3	−14.9
(b) Excluding highway fund as per budget	564.2	579.1	−14.9

[1] Includes $378,000,000 from supplementals proposed to be submitted.
[2] Including revenues from proposed legislation (continuation of certain excise taxes; certain new fuel taxes, etc.)
[3] Among other things, assumes enactment of additional $554,000,000 in postal revenue.

THE PUBLIC DEBT AND INTEREST COSTS

As shown by the pending budget, the national debt this coming June the 30th is estimated at $284,500 million. Granting that it will be no more than that—and that is an unknown—even that figure represents an increase of $18,400 million during the first 7 fiscal years under this administration. The debt stood at $266,100 million when this administration assumed full control and responsibility in June of 1953.

This is the record.

Our debt today is far above the highest of the World War II debts. It is $29 billion above the postwar low-water mark. On the first day of this month, the national debt stood at $290,924,917,717.63. That represents a mortgage of $1,623.04 against every man, woman, and child in America today.

The President has transmitted to the Congress six straight requests to raise the old statutory $275 billion debt ceiling. In consequence, the temporary ceiling is today, $295 billion. The permanent ceiling is $285 billion.

Now the administration, in this budget, has asked for another extension for next year. Failure to control spending while collecting the highest revenues of all time has forced step by step, piece by piece, and year by year the conversion of the so-called temporary ceilings of earlier years to a permanent status. Even the once restraining influence of the debt ceiling has now gone by the board.

But, Mr. Speaker, the greatest evil attending the flowering and fruition of this astronomical debt is the high jacking of the rate of interest, the carrying charge on the debt, and the influence it has had on American business, individual, and corporate. Formerly, and for years, especially in time of peace, the Government was able to borrow money at less than 2 percent—perhaps a fraction above or a fraction below—and the bond issues of the Government were always oversubscribed.

The public debt—8 fiscal years

[In billions]

1. Actual increase, 6 fiscal years (1954–59):
July 1953	$266.1
July 1959	284.7
Increase in the 6 years	+18.6
2. Current budget estimate of change during current fiscal year 1960 (July 1959 to July 1960—from $284.7 to $284.5)	−0.2
3. Estimated increase in the 7 years	+18.4
4. Budget estimate of change during fiscal year 1961 (July 1960 to July 1961—from $284.5 to $280)	−4.5
5. Total budget estimate of increase for the 8 years, July 1953 to July 1961	+13.9

NOTE.—Old statutory limit of $275 billion raised as follows:

For fiscal 1955 by $6 billion (temporary).
For fiscal 1956 by $6 billion (temporary).
For fiscal 1957 by $3 billion (temporary).
For fiscal 1958 by $5 billion (temporary).
For fiscal 1959 by $8 billion (permanently to $283 billion); $5 billion (temporarily to $288 billion).

For fiscal 1960 by $10 billion (permanently to $285 billion); $10 billion (temporarily to $295 billion).

NOTE.—Budget message for 1961 indicates request will be made later in session for a temporary increase for 1961 beyond the permanent ceiling of $285 billion (amount unspecified, but something less than $10 billion in force during fiscal 1960).

Interest on the public debt

1. The debt:	Billion
June 30, 1959	$284.7
June 30, 1960 (estimated)	284.5
June 30, 1961 (estimated)	280.0
2. Interest on the debt:	Million
Fiscal 1959	$7,592
Fiscal 1960 (current estimate)	9,300
(Increase of $1,700 million, fiscal 1960 over fiscal 1959.)
Fiscal 1961 (current estimate)	9,500

(Increase of $200 million, fiscal 1961 over fiscal 1960, although debt is estimated to drop by some $4.5 billions.)

3. In the current fiscal year 1960, interest on the debt averages $25,479,400 every day, $1,061,000 every hour, $17,690 every minute.

4. In the current fiscal 1960, interest on the debt exceeds interest cost for fiscal 1959 by $4,657,000 every day, $194,000 every hour, $3,230 every minute.

5. In fiscal year 1961, interest on the debt is estimated to average $26,027,300 every day, $1,084,400 every hour, $18,000 every minute.

Now, due to the fact that we have spent and spent and overspent our income, it has been necessary to raise the interest on Government bonds, in order to make them sufficiently attractive to the buyer. Today we are paying in excess of 5 percent for short-term loans. Treasury notes of 6 months or a year, for money which we formerly borrowed for less than 1 percent. It has never happened before in time of peace.

This situation could have been avoided if even in the last fiscal year the administration had recommended and Congress in response to that recommendation, had spent $12 billion less than the revenues instead of $12 billion more than the revenues

With the $12 billion cash in hand we would have paid it on the national debt, the cost of living would have dropped, the dollar would have been stabilized, business would have continued to expand, inflation would have faded and our bonds would have again been marketable at far less than present high rates.

But the sky was the limit and the budget recommended and Congress obligingly spent $12 billion more than we took in. We were living high on the hog and we spent $12 billion more than our income. We whistled for the grizzly and the grizzly came. Every month, in an effort to sell that $12½ billion we spent above revenue, every month more savings bonds were cashed than were sold. The public did not want them. Our credit was slipping. Exports were dropping. Imports were increasing. The balance of trade was heavily against us. Investors abroad were alerted. Foreign creditors, alarmed at our improvidence, began to demand gold. Assurances by Chairman Martin, of the Federal Reserve Board, have checked only temporarily the demand of foreign creditors for gold. Unless the administration and the Congress can, in the few remaining months of this fiscal year, restore the confidence of the world in the ability of the United States to manage its financial affairs in keeping with accepted business principles, our gold reserves will shortly drop below our bank requirements. Unheard of. Undreamed of. Incredible.

But if the Government were the only one to suffer from the effects of this spending debauch that would be bad enough. But the Government is the least of the victims. When you raise the cost of money above 5 percent to the Government, you raise the cost of money—the rate of interest—to every borrower in the United States. And you particularly raise the interest, the cost of borrowing and the opportunity to borrow to those who are least able to pay exorbitant interest. The Government has been lending money for many activities at reasonable rates of interest. But if the Government must pay 5½ percent for short time loans, it cannot lend money for housing, for contractors or builders or workmen or for people who need homes, at a rate they can afford to pay.

Banks and loan associations cannot lend money at 4 or 4½ percent when the Government itself must pay 5½ percent.

One of the greatest beneficiaries of President Roosevelt's wise provisions for credit is the farmer—the farmers in my State and the farmers in your State.

He authorized the now familiar production credit associations to whom he lent money at 3½ percent permitting them to lend it to the farmer for 4½ percent, retaining the extra cent for amortization of their debt to the Government. Farmers who must have capital for crop production but who cannot borrow a cent from any bank, can come to the Production Credit Association and get the money they need at a low rate of interest. These associations are managed by the farmers themselves and have proven remarkably successful. They are operating in every county in my district and in the last 10 years have not lost a dollar. Every loan has been repaid with interest. Bankers who formerly opposed them now approve them because farmers to whom they could not lend have now prospered to the point where they carry substantial bank accounts.

But the Production Credit Associations have received notice that beginning the first of the month interest will be advanced to 7 percent, due to the fact that the Government must pay 5½ percent itself and can no longer lend the money at 3½ percent.

So the farmer's interest goes up to 7 percent. And the farmer, the man who works longest and hardest and receives the lowest pay for his labor and the lowest return on his investment, whose wife and children work with him, who is today receiving the lowest price for his product, and who must pay all of these increased costs of operation, machinery, fertilizer, insecticides, and every other cost of production—the farmer who is getting less all the time and paying more all the time—who is least able to pay—must pay 7 percent for his money. Why? Because this administration and this Congress spent $12,500 million more than we took in.

In the same category we have the GI loans under which the veteran is to receive money at 5½ percent. But when the Government must itself pay 5½ percent the money sources are dried up and no one will lend the veteran money which was available to all as long as a prudent operation of Government finances kept governments down to 2 percent.

Likewise the FHA, created to lend money at 5¾ percent and under which loans were freely made at that rate, a rate profitable to the Government and the borrower alike, is now wholly unworkable because the Government required to pay 5½ percent interest in the money market cannot relend it at the statutory rate of 5¾ percent.

Numerous other instances indicate faintly the widespread disaster resulting from high rates of interest which the mismanagement of Government finances has brought about.

There seems to be a general impression that money does not cost the Government anything. But the interest alone on the national debt for fiscal 1960, as represented in this budget, is $9,300 million. Every year the Federal Government must pay $9,300 million merely for interest, and with nothing to show for it at the end of the year. Only 20 years ago we operated the entire Government on a good deal less than that. Not only does this budget call for $9,300 million in interest for 1960, but the President tells us that next year—fiscal 1961—it will be $9,500 million. That is 12 cents out of every dollar of budget spending.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I wonder if the gentleman would approve of a request for an extension of time. The gentleman's time is approaching at the end of his speech, and I note there are Members here who wish to comment on his speech. If I should propound a request for a 15-minute extension of time for the gentleman, would he approve?

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to have the time to yield to other Members.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 15 minutes, in order that some points of his speech might be commented upon and questioned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would like to advise the gentleman from California that there are other special orders pending immediately at the conclusion of the time allotted to the gentleman from Missouri. However, if the gentlemen who have the special orders have no objection, I can entertain a unanimous-consent request. Is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COLLIER] here?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have 10 minutes immediately following the speech by the gentleman from Missouri. Would the gentleman from California be willing to incorporate that in his request?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I revise my request that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], be allowed to follow the gentleman from Missouri for 10 minutes, immediately thereafter, as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman withhold his request? I see the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COLLIER], is here. There has been a request for an extension of time. Does the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from Wisconsin have any objection?

Mr. COLLIER. No objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the request will be granted, 15 minutes for the gentleman from Missouri and 10 minutes for the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Will the 15 minutes for the gentleman from Missouri come after the gentleman from New York uses his 10 minutes?

Mr. TABER. Oh, no.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Then, my original request stands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri will be recognized for an additional 15 minutes, and immediately after that the gentleman from New York will be recognized for 10 minutes.

DEFENSE AND NONDEFENSE SPENDING

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, heavy defense outlays in recent years has tended to obscure the genesis of these inflationary deficit budgets. The impression persists that they have come primarily from the necessity of heavy defense spending. That is not so. It is the nondefense items that have unbalanced recent budgets, as the following official data unerringly discloses:

Net budget expenditures—Defense and nondefense (8 fiscal years 1954–61)

[In billions of dollars]

Fiscal year	Major national security		All other programs		Total net expenditures
	Defense-military	Total	As per budget	Including highway trust fund	As per budget	Including highway trust fund
Fiscal 1953 (Korean war year)	$43.6	$50.4	$23.9	$23.9	$74.3	$74.3
* * * * *	*	*	*	*	*	*
Fiscal 1954	40.3	46.9	20.9	20.9	67.8	67.8
Fiscal 1955	35.5	40.6	24.0	24.0	64.6	64.6
Fiscal 1956	35.8	40.6	25.9	25.9	66.5	66.5
Fiscal 1957	38.4	43.3	26.1	27.0	69.4	70.3
Fiscal 1958	39.1	44.1	27.8	29.4	71.9	73.5
Fiscal 1959	41.2	46.4	34.3	37.0	80.7	83.4
Fiscal 1960 (latest estimates from 1961 budget document)	40.9	45.6	32.8	35.9	[1] 78.4	81.5
Fiscal 1961 (budget estimates)	41.0	45.6	34.2	37.1	79.8	82.7
Comparisons:
a. 1961 budget compared with last war year (1953)	−2.6	−4.8	+10.3	+13.2	+5.5	[2] +8.4
b. 1961 compared with 1st year of present administration (1954)	+.7	−1.3	[3] +13.3	[4] +16.2	+12.0	+14.9
c. 1961 compared with 1st year showing surplus under present administration (1956)	+5.2	+5.0	+8.3	+11.2	+13.3	+16.2
d. 1961 compared with last completed year (1959)	−.2	−.8	−.1	+.1	−.9	−.7
e. 1961 compared with current 1960 estimate	+.1		+1.4	+1.2	+1.4	+1.2

[1] Includes $378,000,000 estimated to be expended from anticipated 1960 fiscal supplementals, also estimated at $1,125,000,000 (all but $23,000,000 of the $378,000,000 is for nondefense).
[2] Represents increase of 11 percent over war year of 1953.
[3] Represents increase of 63 percent over 1st year of 1954.
[4] Represents increase of 77 percent over 1st year of 1954.

NOTE.—Highway trust fund began with fiscal year 1957.

As will be noted, the entire increase of $1.4 billion in spending in this 1961 budget compared to the year 1960 is allotted to nondefense items. The national security total remains unchanged.

For nondefense, this budget for 1961 proposes spending $13.3 billion, or 63 percent more than fiscal 1954, the first year of the present administration. Including the highway item, it is up $16.2 billion, an increase of 77 percent.

On the other hand, defense spending for 1961 in this budget is $1.3 billion below the 1954 total. And it is unchanged from the current year.

The record is plain. Nondefense spending has far outstripped defense spending. And it has come at the urging of the administration in a succession of record-breaking budgets.

Before it is too late—if it is not already too late, before the value of the dollar plummets still further, we must reverse this relentless trend to ever-increasing expenditure.

This budget is too high. It is inflationary. We must cut it. Nothing within the power of men to alter should logically be regarded as beyond reach of the knife. We should probe deeply into every item. We must dispense with every nonessential. And that includes the defense budgets. It is not so much a question of what we spend for defense as it is what we spend it for. We must dispense with outmoded, obsolete, obsolescent weapons and systems. We are long past the point where we can afford the luxury of adherence to business as usual.

NEW AUTHORITY TO OBLIGATE THE GOVERNMENT

The amount of authority to obligate the Government, either enacted or requested, is the most consistently accurate yardstick by which to measure future spending. That comes first. Spending follows. The President recommends $79.4 billion of new obligating authority in this budget for 1961. With the highway fund, the requests total $82.6 billion.

I include a table for the 8 years 1954–61:

Appropriations and other forms of authority to obligate the Government ("New obligational authority")

[A rearrangement of budget table 7 with certain additions]

[In billions of dollars]

Type of authority	Enacted, 1954	Enacted, 1955	Enacted, 1956	Enacted, 1957	Enacted, 1958	Enacted, 1959	1960		1961 (total proposed)	1961 compared with—
							Already enacted	Total proposed		1960 enacted	1960 total proposed
1. Appropriations:
(a) Annual	51.8	45.8	50.8	58.9	61.9	67.7	66.5	67.6	68.6	+2.1	+1.0
(b) Permanent (annual action not required)	6.8	6.8	7.4	7.8	8.1	8.1	9.9	9.9	10.2	+.3	+.3
Total, appropriations	58.6	52.6	58.2	66.7	70.0	75.8	76.4	77.5	78.8	+2.4	+1.3
2. Public debt receipt authority	3.6	3.0	3.1	3.2	5.7	5.4	1.7	1.7	.5	−1.2	−1.2
3. Contract authority	.9	1.0	2.4	.3	.5	.4	.6	.6	.4	−.2	−.2
4. Reappropriation of prior funds	.4	1.2	.4	.1	.2	.1	.2	.2	.1	−.1	−.1
Total, all forms of authority	63.5	57.8	64.1	70.3	76.4	81.7	78.9	80.0	79.8	+.9	−.2
5. Deduct appropriations to liquidate contract authority previously granted	−.7	−.7	−.9	−.1	−.1	−.3	−.3	−.3	−.4	+.1	+.1
Net new obligating authority per budget	62.8	57.1	63.2	70.2	[1] 76.3	[1] 81.4	78.6	79.7	79.4	+.8	−.3
6. Add highway trust fund for proper comparison with years prior to 1957:
(a) New contract authority	----------	----------	----------	2.6	3.6	3.4	2.9	2.9	[2] 3.1	+.2	+.2
(b) Tax refunds and interest on genera fund advances	*	----------	----------	----------	.1	.1	.1	.1	.1	----------	----------
Grand total	62.8	57.1	63.2	72.8	[1] 80.0	[1] 84.9	81.6	82.7	82.6	+1.0	−.1

[1] The budgets for 1959 and 1960 recommended several large supplementals for the respective immediately preceding fiscal years (1958 and 1959) which normally should have been carried in the regular bills for the ensuing year or were otherwise unusual or special items which tend to distort comparisons between years.

[2] Includes $900,000,000 under proposed legislation.

HAVE LIVING COSTS BEEN REDUCED?

Mr. Speaker, the inevitable result of these recordbreaking budgets and deficits has been a steady upward march in the cost of living. This was also among the things they promised to halt. But they have failed in that also. The cost of living keeps skyrocketing as the dollar plunges in value. The official index hit a new high water mark last November—and that was merely topping record highs reached in five of the preceding 6 months. The dollar is now worth only 47.3 cents.

Life savings have been eroded; money accumulated for old age is being dissipated; pensions and allowances won't do what they were intended to do; wages buy less and less; every morning it costs more to set the breakfast table.

And it is all because we have spent for non-defense purposes money we did not have—money we had to borrow—for things we could get along without. And it has been done at the urging of the administration in these budgets. As conclusively shown, they asked for more and more.

Here is the official data in support:

Consumer Price Index and purchasing power of the dollar

	Consumer Price Index (1947–49=100)		Purchasing power of the dollar [1] (calendar year 1939=100)
	All items	Foods
YEARS
1939	59.4	47.1	100.0
1940	59.9	47.8	99.2
1941	62.9	52.2	94.4
1942	69.7	61.3	85.2
1943	74.0	68.3	80.3
1944	75.2	67.4	79.0
1945	76.9	68.9	77.2

[1] As measured by the BLS Consumer Price Index.
[2] New record high.

Consumer Price Index and purchasing power of the dollar—Continued

	Consumer Price Index (1947–49=100)		Purchasing power of the dollar (calendar year 1939=100)
	All items	Foods
1946	83.4	79.0	71.2
1947	95.5	95.9	62.2
1948	102.8	104.1	57.8
1949	101.8	100.0	58.3
1950	102.8	101.2	57.8
1951	111.0	112.6	53.5
1952	113.5	114.6	52.3
1953	114.4	112.8	51.9
1954	114.8	112.6	51.7
1955	114.5	110.9	51.9
1956	116.2	111.7	51.1
1957	120.2	115.4	49.4
1958	123.5	120.3	48.1
SELECTED MONTHS
1946—June	79.8	72.1	74.4
1950—June	101.8	100.5	58.3
1952—December	114.1	113.8	52.1
1953—January	113.9	113.1	52.2
1954—January	115.2	113.1	51.6
1955—January	114.3	110.6	52.0
1956—January	114.6	109.2	51.8
1957—January	118.2	112.8	50.3
1958—January	[2] 122.3	118.2	48.6
April	[2] 123.5	121.6	48.1
July	[2] 123.9	121.7	47.9
August	123.7	120.7	48.0
September	123.7	120.3	48.0
October	123.7	119.7	48.0
November	123.9	119.4	47.9
December	123.7	118.7	48.0
1959—January	123.8	119.0	48.0
February	123.7	118.2	48.0
March	123.7	117.7	48.0
April	123.9	117.6	47.9
May	[2] 124.0	117.7	47.9
June	[2] 124.5	118.9	47.7
July	[2] 124.9	119.4	47.6
August	124.8	118.3	47.6
September	[2] 125.2	118.7	47.4
October	[2] 125.5	118.4	47.3
November	[2] 125.6	117.9	47.3

Source: Office of the Secretary of the Treasury, debt analysis staff, Dec. 22, 1959.

SEVEN-YEAR COMPARATIVE RECORD

Mr. Speaker, it is timely to submit a comparative accounting of the condition of Treasury finances administered during the 7 years thus far under the present administration, fiscal year 1954 through the present fiscal year 1960—with the immediately preceding 7 years of fiscals 1947 through 1953 under the previous administration. The figures for the current fiscal year 1960 are still tentative since there are 5 more months to go, but they are probably close enough to the mark to suffice for such comparison. In 3 of the 7 years under the previous administration we were at war in Korea.

Budget revenues during the present administration exceed the previous administration by $150.9 billion. They have taken more taxes from the people.

Budget expenditures under the present administration exceed expenditures under the previous administration by $164.3 billion. They have spent more, and as documented, mostly for nondefense purposes.

The cumulative net deficit under the present administration is $19.1 billion. They have not lived within income. Under the previous adminstration, it was only $5.7 billion, including the 3 war years in Korea. Eliminating the war years, there was a surplus, not a deficit.

As to the public debt, up to this coming June 30, the debt under the present administration has increased by $18.4 billion, whereas under the previous administration in 7 years it was reduced by $3.3 billion. In the 4 peacetime years, 1947–50, it was reduced by $12 billion, But even with the Korean war years, the previous administration reduced it. In the last 7 years bigger and bigger debts have been saddled on generations yet unborn.

The following 7-year comparisons are submitted in substantiation:

7-year comparative figures on income spending, deficits or surpluses, and debt changes

[In billions of dollars]

7-year tax take, net budget receipts:
Under present administration (fiscals 1954–60)	480.2
Under previous administration (fiscals 1947–53)	329.3
Present administration over previous	+150.9
7-year outgo, net budget expenditures:
Under present administration (fiscals 1954–60)	499.3
Under previous administration (fiscals 1947–53)	335.0
Present administration over previous	+164.3
7-year deficits:
Under present administration (fiscals 1954–60, all peacetime years)	−19.1
Under previous administration (fiscals 1947–53, of which 1951–53 were war years in Korea)	[1] −5.7
Present administration over previous	+13.4
7-year changes in Federal public debt:
Under present administration (July 1953 to July 1960—from $266.1 billion to $284.5 billion)	+18.4
Under previous administration (July 1946 to July 1953—from $269.4 billion to $266.1 billion)	−3.3
Present administration over previous	+21.7

[1] The net deficit during the Korean war years, fiscals 1951–53, was $9.9 billion. Thus the 4 peacetime years, fiscals 1947–50, showed a net surplus of $4.2 billions.

NOTES: For simplicity here and so as to tie directly to official "budget" figures, amounts applicable to the Highway Trust Fund for fiscals 1957–60 have been omitted.

Amounts included for fiscal 1960, ending June 30, 1960, are estimated as shown in 1961 budget.

THE RUSSIAN DANGER

Mr. Speaker, the situation is even more desperate than this.

We have witnessed in the last decade one of the most remarkable developments in history; a nation just emerging from barbarism, a nation which had never won a war in all its history has, in the last decade become the greatest military power in the world today. They have greater manpower, more modern weapons; have attained greater scientific accomplishments; have extended control over a majority of the peoples of two continents. And they have indicated that they cannot live in the same world with our form of government and our system of finance.

They make no secret of the fact that they expect to control the world.

Ten years ago they were not only a backward people, a people without previous cultural training or scientific attainments, their entire land was devastated and impoverished by the ravages of war. The German Army, perhaps the greatest army ever mobilized, had ravaged their country to the very gates of their capital. They did not leave a bridge, a railroad, a building. They stripped the country clean of food, factories, supplies, and foundation herds. On this side at the close of the war not a single bridge was out of place, not a brick upon any chimney top had been disturbed, not a single railroad rail had been moved. We continued business as usual. We were the greatest scientific nation in the world. And still, incredible as it may seem, they have completely outclassed us, completely outdistanced us in scientific achievements.

Down at the Pentagon they waved away any apprehensions about the future. "Oh," they said, "we can destroy any nation that attacks us." They said the Russians have nothing; do not have to be taken into consideration. They have no mechanical genius. It was not until the Russians presented indisputable evidence, until they put into orbit the first artificial satellite in the history of science that we realized our danger.

Today it is universally conceded that we are 4 years behind them in vital military weapons. It will take 3 or 4 years for us to overtake them, but of course the Russians will not play fair, they will not stand still while we are catching up with them. They will keep going. Perhaps by the end of the 4 years they will then be 8 years ahead of us; at least we have no convincing reason to believe otherwise.

The great need of our Defense Department, the great need for national defense, is money. This $12 billions we spent above our revenue last year was not spent for war purposes, it was not spent to arm our defense forces, it was not spent to develop missiles or nuclear submarines, it was spent for nondefense purposes. But if the Russians come over it will not avail us much when instant annihilation strikes our centers of population, mobilization, communication, and production.

So, Mr. Speaker, because I want to leave some time for the distinguished gentleman from California, let me earnestly recommend that in this session of Congress, not for the sake of victory, but for the sake of bare survival we keep this budget within the national income.

There is no second place in a world in which Russia is first.

I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I want to thank the gentleman for yielding and accepting additional time because, in my opinion, he has made the most important speech on the budget and the rapidly accelerating interest rate problem that has been made in this Congress for many years. The gentleman is eminently qualified from his long years of experience as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to do this particular job which he has done today. I am sure his words will be read far and wide, and probably be reprinted in some of the financial journals of our Nation.

The gentleman has stressed two points, the budget and the interest rate. I want to point out that in the 7 years immediately following the war the average annual budget had an interest rate of 2.38 percent. During the war, when we averaged a $52 billion deficit every year for 4 years, we increased from 1940 to 1945 from a $43 billion national debt to a $258 billion national debt. Yet, the debt management under the Roosevelt-Truman administration kept the interest rate at 2.38 percent or an average of 2.38 percent notwithstanding this tremendous deficit. In the 7 past years, under the Eisenhower administration, our debt has gone up. The gentleman gave the figure of around $18 billion. The figures show that in 1953 the debt was $266 billion and the estimated debt this year is $284 billion, which would give the $18 billion debt increase for those 7 years. This is a little less than $3 billion a year deficit. Yet, the interest rate in that period of time has gone up 60 percent. It is costing 60 percent more on the debt cost. The cost of money, that is, the interest rates, rose under the Eisenhower administration's 7 years from 2.20 percent average in 1953 to 4.25 percent in 1960 on long-term Government bonds or an increase of almost 100 percent and we paid to 5.36 percent in 1960 on short-term notes and bills or an increase of 150 percent. So I believe the gentleman will probably concur in this remark that debt management has a great deal to do with interest rates. Is that not true?

Mr. CANNON. Unquestionably.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I hold in my hand a document known as Document No. 67, which is entitled "Congressional Action on the Presidential Requests for Appropriations and New Obligational Authority," put out by a committee in the other body in which it shows that in the last session, the Congress appropriated $1,881,410,093 less than requested in the budget estimates of the President. Is the gentleman aware of those figures?

Mr. CANNON. The figures are a matter of record.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. And in new obligational authority, we have heard a great deal about the backdoor financing method in new obligational authority, the so-called backdoor financing, there has been asked a total of $81,227,609,151 and the Congress has granted $79,428,598,352 or $2,580,410,093 less than the administration has asked in the so-called "backdoor financing." I think the gentleman will agree that the charge against the Democratic Party that has been in control of the Congress, is unfounded in the light of these figures. If these figures are not right, I would like to have the gentleman or someone at the proper time prove that they are not correct.

Mr. CANNON. The figures speak for themselves.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I would like to call to the attention of the Members of the House, if the gentleman will allow me just 1 more moment to do so, to present January 17 issue of the U.S. News. He will find on pages 50 and 51 an item on this interest proposition which would be of great value to read. It takes different booms and depressions and it points out in every instance prior to a depression there was a series of interest rate raises as a result of the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury Department actions. This holds true in the depression of 1919–20, 1928–29, 1936–37, 1948, 1952–53, 1955, and in 1957, and it also says that, during the boom of 1958–60, the discount rate already has been raised five times and that another hike is likely. Interest rates are the highest they have been in a generation.

In view of the record which is portrayed of depression which occurred immediately after a series of tight money methods on the part of the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury Department, are we not justified in expecting another depression such as followed the other, unless this is corrected?

Mr. CANNON. As far as I am aware, there is not a national magazine, or a metropolitan newspaper which does not disapprove of Government deficits, which does not urge upon the President and upon the Congress a retrenchment of expenditures, down to the point where we will live within our income.

I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I am just going to go into a few things that I think ought to be called to the attention of the House.

Just before I came to the floor I looked at the current Treasury statement issued on the 12th day of January, and it showed, making adjustment for the 12 days, that the expenditures of the Government during the period from July 1, 1959, to December 31, 1959, increased just about $1 billion. The receipts of the Government in that same period increased a little over $6 billion.

In view of the fact that the trend is that way and we have a prospect of better revenues in the last half of the fiscal year, I can see no question but what the receipts of the Government will be at least $8 billion more in the last half of this current fiscal year. This is going to result in a balanced budget, provided some of these taxes relating to excises are restored and kept going from this point on for another period. That makes practically a balanced budget for this year. I am satisfied, with the trend of the economic situation, that we can count on an increase in the fiscal year 1961 of receipts and that we should not have a terrific increase in expenditures. That is if this Congress and the Members of it will go along with what is needed right straight down the line rather than for all the frills and gewgaws that a lot of people think they would like to have.

Those things can upset the applecart completely, but if we are going to approach anything like a balanced budget and keep it balanced we must hold expenditures down and not authorize all sorts of projects we cannot afford to have. You know and I know that everywhere we look we see governmental expenditures, both Federal, State, and local, getting way out of hand. We must remember, however, that the responsibility lies with us to keep from contributing to that tendency which is so dangerous at this time.

I believe, and I have been watching it pretty closely, that the present operations of the Defense Department have given us an armed force sufficient to take care of our needs. There is no question but what we would be able to repel what the Russians might do in the case of emergency. We have got to keep it that way. At the same time we have got to cull out of the Military Establishment as well as everything else the things that are not needed.

I hope the membership of the Congress will go along with the idea of trying to help those of us on the Appropriations Committee who are trying to keep these expenditures down so that we will be able to make the Congress proper contribution to a balanced budget.

One of the worst things that those of us who desire to see appropriations properly justified and the unnecessary items cut out has for many years been the back-door approach picture. That resulted in over $5 billion of appropriations that the committee had nothing to do with last year. It is about time that we stop that approach to the Treasury of the United States. I hope that the Budget will not send up any more such things and that the President will not approve any more projects passed on the back-door approach to the Treasury.

DISASTER OR PROGRESS?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, we stand at the dawn of a new decade—one horizoned with both rich promise and awesome peril. Are our political parties, Republican and Democrat, constituted, organized, and prepared to meet the challenges of the 1960's? In a nation which governs through a two-party system, this is an all important question. In quest of an answer, a series of speeches will be delivered by a group of Republicans in the House. This is the first in that series.

We shall outline three major challenges. We shall seek to analyze the differences in the ways the two parties respond to these challenges.

Why should we attempt this? In the hands of the voter at the polls resides the power to point this country toward the greatest disasters or the most profound progress in our entire history. The decision will be reached cumulatively by a storekeeper in New York City, a dairy farmer in Wisconsin, an autoworker in Michigan, an executive in Los Angeles, a housewife in Tennessee—and by millions of others. Public political debate over the real issues is an absolute necessity if the American people are to be alerted to the grave choice they cannot escape.

We propose, therefore, to examine the decade ahead.

In the space age, ironically, the exploration of new horizons in human relations and government on earth will be even more important than the exploration of outer space.

Both in human relations and in outer space, we voyage now into an epoch very much like the first great age of discovery and exploration which uncovered the New World. On Columbus' famous voyage, the crew at one point panicked and wanted to turn back because the waters into which their leader was taking them did not appear on Old World charts and maps. They lacked the vision of the Great Navigator. Indispensable to Columbus' genius was the knowledge that if a new world was to be discovered, courage and pioneer faith were required.

There are those today who would timidly turn to socialism, centralized control and the planned state in human relations and government in order to escape the uncharted waters into which our civilization now ventures. Many would go back to the Old World of the New Deal, to the hackneyed solution of a decade of depression. They would substitute statism for freedom and enterprise. Like Columbus, we must understand that new shores can never be reached by those who shrink from exercising the freedom and initiative required to go forward. Those who want to use the old charts and centrally control every social, economic, cultural, educational, and research problem are placing security above freedom, dictation above individual creativity and materialism above the God-given spirit of man.

As we look to the decade of the 1960's, one course of action would be to meet the challenges of promise and peril by turning back, diluting the pioneer spirit, meeting Russian statism by greater statism at home, spending extravagantly today and letting our children pay the awful debts tomorrow.

The other course is to meet the challenges by advancing toward them with courage, free creativity, meeting Russian centralization and regimentation with greater incentives and leadership at home, putting our financial house in order, providing an inheritance of freedom and prosperity for our children, and granting our Nation the economic health to flourish and grow over the centuries.

Can 179 million Americans pick and choose knowingly and properly between these two routes if the two political parties do not clarify the differences in the routes? Political parties become thieves and robbers in the market place of public opinion when they try to confuse rather than clarify how they plan to respond to the perils and promises ahead. We Republicans who undertake this speech series believe that candor is essential. Our purpose is to clarify the differences in party responses to the challenges of the 1960's.

To face successfully the challenges of this decade, what are the qualities a political party needs?

Our survival and our growth depend upon a much greater sense of purpose and unity than the Nation has evidenced in the last few decades. Indeed, Russia's astonishing accomplishments in a few select fields of endeavor have resulted from her driving sense of unified purpose. The fast moving technological, industrial, managerial and social advances of today involve such a maze of continuing change that purpose is needed if we are to prevent a totality of confusion, division and frustration.

In the time-space age, our country will constantly cry out for unity and purpose. A party seriously divided against itself will never be able to give the Nation the unity and purpose it so urgently needs. To furnish leadership toward these qualities, a party must have within itself a basic degree of unity. By that, I do not mean that everyone within the party must agree on every issue. But I do mean that disagreement and dissension must not reach the dimensions which exist in the Democrat Party today. Each day we see that party expending its energies on party civil war, and in the end obtaining intraparty peace only by compromising and camouflaging vital issues before they reach the public. Theirs is a strategy of negatism with the public paying the price for party schizophrenia. In the time-space age ahead, political parties must have within themselves basic unity to be effective.

The country today is suffering from the current intraparty disunity which is monopolizing the energies of the Democrat Party.

We cannot as a Nation afford a party in control of the Congress whose Members' time and energies are consumed in intraparty wrangling rather than legislating to meet the needs of the Nation.

Second. If a political party is to be more than just a conspiracy to gain power, it must be a party of principle. A party which is concerned with only day-to-day demands of its lust for power becomes a gathering of officeseekers and their friends. Its concern for self-preservation takes precedence over its concern for national preservation. On the other hand, the party of principle will hold to certain unchanging beliefs about freedom, so precious that they will not be sacrificed for any political victory. And these unchanging principles must flourish into a forward-looking philosophy that seeks out the issues and abhors escapism. To a major degree, the legislative actions of that party must support this philosophy lest its principles and philosophy become a sham.

Third. A political party must have democracy within its ranks. Whether in State committees, the national committee, or in the congressional organization, it must represent the viewpoints within the party. It must shun party dictatorships and organize itself to express rank-and-file views Fourth. A political party must have a sense of responsibility toward the future. Open to any political party is the tempting opportunity to buy votes by squandering the public money. For that type of timeserving, selfish politics, the next generation will have to foot the bill. What is more, it is a myopic political party which can see only ever increasing outlays of dollars as the solution to a host of continuing problems. It is an enlightened and farsighted party which chooses, if needed, the difficult way in order to avoid expedient solutions that will harm and impede this Nation a decade or so hence.

The greatest temptation of expediency is to solve a dilemma by placing overriding authority in the hands of the Federal Government. Wielded by a benevolent executive or administrator, such power might be used wisely. But a government of law, not of men who preempt the power of law, was the design of our Republic. Sooner or later, such power in the hands of man is abused and the liberties of the people reduced.

It is much easier for a monopoly or for a large pressure group, or for a small group of unscrupulous politicians to control one national legislature as against control of 50 State legislatures.

The problems of Florida are not the problems of Oregon. The industrial complexion of Detroit is not the industrial complexion of Hollywood. The academic approach at Harvard University is not necessarily the academic approach at North Texas State Teachers College. Overfederalization ignores this and cultivates two massive evils. First is the habit of superficial generalizations—the attempt to standardize the governmental response to every local and specific need.

Second, overfederalization takes the government away from the people. The decisionmaking process becomes remote from the storekeeper in New York City, the dairy farmer in Wisconsin, the housewife in Tennessee. The people find that all aspects of their way of life—their education, their housing, their culture, are being controlled from afar. This is the way for the United States, like ancient Rome, to slip from a Republic to an authoritarian state.

I repeat, four qualities are needed for a political party to meet the challenges of this decade: First, a basic degree of unity and purpose; second, a coherent, forward-looking philosophy based on principle; third, democracy and genuine representation within the party organization; and fourth, a responsibility toward future generations of Americans. Only with these qualities can a party help preserve a free and dynamic America in the years ahead.

Permit me to apply these tests to the Republican Party.

Does it have the unity and purpose to give unity and purpose to the Nation?

The Republican Party is more united today than perhaps ever before in its history. While there will always be room for disagreement between its members, and those disagreements are freely expressed in party councils, there is no cleavage on basic party principles or philosophy.

The Republican Party is not torn apart by regional differences, nor is it in constant battle with itself over fundamental beliefs. There is no strife between its National and State elements. Its leader can speak for the whole party, not for just fragments of it. It is prepared to offer the Nation continuity of executive and legislative leadership because its philosophy and principles, rather than its urge for power, are its motivating force.

Our unity in Congress was dramatized during the consideration of labor reform legislation last year. This was perhaps the most important issue of the session, for labor reform has become a major concern of our times, just as business reform was a major concern of the 1890's and the subsequent era of Theodore Roosevelt Republicanism. On this crucial issue, almost 90 percent of the Republican Members of this body voted to substitute the Landrum-Griffin bill for the weak committee bill, thus insuring that the Nation would meet the issue head-on with effective legislation. Republican unity contrasted with the remarkable schism in the majority party on this all-important vote.

Does the Republican Party possess a coherent, forward-looking philosophy based on principle?

I believe that ours is the party of principle; the party that would rather be right if it means sacrificing a political victory; the party which believes in a government of laws to prevent seizure of dominant powers by any arm or faction; the party which believes that individual freedom is man's most valuable possession.

We believe, as the preface of the report of the committe on program and progress of the Republican National Committee put it, that:

> The Nation's greatness comes from the tremendous, God-given strength in each of us that is unlocked when a man is his own master reaching for his own destiny, with the opportunity to move constantly toward a better life.
>
> This principle underlies our determination to guard against the heedless growth of the Central Government in Washington—and to keep the basic control of Government in the hands of the people, as against those who wish to give more and more authority to the Central Government—away from the people.
>
> It prompts the Republican policy of due care in public spending to avoid eating away the right of the people to save or to invest their own money in their own way, as against those who show no such faith in the ability of the people to handle their own money. * * *
>
> Government paternalism carries a price tag, the surrender of the individual's right to order his own life, to plan his own future. * * *
>
> The unregimented mind has a better chance to reach out for new ideas than the mind that operates as the prisoner of a political dogma; in a space age of limitless horizons, the race will go to the side with the freest, farthest-ranging minds in search of truth.

The third question, Does the Republican Party have real democracy and representation within its ranks?

Political bossism is the exception rather than the rule in the Republican Party organization. The party's strength comes from the grassroots. Its leaders gain office in democratic elections. It is remarkably free from the political machines which plague the other major party.

Nor has the Republican Party allowed itself to be taken over by power-hungry pressure groups. It has refused, for example, to sell its soul for the votes promised by union bosses. The sources of the Republican Party's power are its members. It has not become the appendage of any self-serving economic group.

True democracy in the Republican Party carries over into its party organization in the Congress. Its congressional leaders neither seek nor are given the dictatorial powers over party strategy and policy which characterize the majority party. We operate through frequent party conferences. Policy advice comes from elected policy committees.

It would not be amiss at this point, I believe, to point out that Republicans in Congress are not feuding about whether to have policy committees or whether or not party policy is democratically determined. Republican policy committees are operating in both Houses now.

They are committees which have been democratically selected and designed to represent all shades of opinion within the party membership. In the House, for example, I can personally testify that the Republican policy committee is a functioning, representative body, assisting in the formulation of Republican legislative policy in the House and providing close liaison between the executive and legislative branches. Its members are elected by fellow members under a system which insures that each geographical area and each newly elected group has representation. The committee meets regularly every Tuesday with special meetings called whenever required.

The effective operation of both Republican policy committees contrast with the situation in the majority party, where in one House, its policy committee is threatened with downgrading into a scheduling committee, and in the other, no policy-formulating committee has ever existed. This denial of democratic procedure within one of our parties is responsible for the constant wrangling in one House over policy matters and the undercurrent of protest in this body against the junta-type organization of the majority party. The substitution of intraparty wrangling in the Democrat Party for effective legislative procedures gives Republicans no comfort. Regardless of party, we know that the Nation suffers when the majority party in Congress dissipates its energies in civil war.

We Republicans place great emphasis upon democratic procedure within our party primarily, of course, because we feel that party practice must coincide with our party's basic belief in the democratic practices of free government. Just as strongly, however, we feel that any party which refuses to provide the channels, within itself, for the free expression of new ideas is doomed to stagnation and becomes ill-equipped to make the decisions necessary for the survival of freedom in the decades ahead.

I would hope that the time will come when both parties, in both Houses, will function through formalized policy committees, similar to those recommended by the Joint Committee on the Reorganization of Congress in the 79th Congress.

The fourth question: Is the Republican Party forward looking and concerned with the welfare of future generations?

No other principle of the Republican Party is as deep and instinctive as our belief that no generation can live solely for itself but instead has the heaviest of obligations to preserve the Nation and its institutions, strengthened and improved, for those who follow. What we have now we know was won for us only by the efforts and sacrifices of those who went before us. We have the high moral duty to labor and sacrifice, if need be, to preserve and protect our heritage for the generations to come.

It is this principle which leads us to oppose programs which can solve temporary difficulties only at the price of the irretrievable loss of national strength or individual freedom. It is this principle which urges us to advance solutions which require effort and sacrifice now but will pay dividends in the future in the form of a sound political and economic structure for us and our children.

As an example, we Republicans are the leaders in the fight against inflation: a battle fought on many fronts—against excessive spending, for sound taxing policies, in support of rational debt management. For our efforts, we often hear Republicans accused of being preoccupied with balanced budgets, as negative, as stand-patters. What could be less negative and more far-seeing than this battle to insure that the next generations inherit freedom instead of economic tyranny? What is more negative, destructive and immoral than to squander money and engage in other acts of irresponsibility today and lose our children their freedom tomorrow?

Daily on the floor of this House, Republicans have battled for the long-range welfare of the Nation and its people; against those who would choose the easy but wrong way; against those who would divide the people into groups, stir selfish passions, appeal to special interests and promise what cannot be delivered.

Republicans in this body have stood for principle in foreign and domestic policy, against those whose addiction to expediency places them in an endless sea of confusion.

The Republican program is geared for the protection of interests of the American family—the interest of that family in preserving peace with justice so that no son of theirs will be sacrificed because of blundering diplomacy; the interest of that family in maintaining a sound dollar, so that their savings for their children's education will not be eroded, so that the power of free decision will not be lost by prices and debts which make us all slaves to an economic monster.

We will articulate these beliefs, this program, our actions to the American people. But, we will go beyond, and that is the principal reason for this series of speeches by Republican Members. We will discuss, in frankness and fullness, the challenges of the age ahead.

Three of these challenges will be examined in detail. First is the challenge of preserving peace with justice. This deeply involves the Communist peril and our response to it. Second is the challenge of maturing labor-management relations into constructive avenues which will protect the public, as well as the parties involved, and help foster economic growth. Third is the challenge of controlling inflation and high prices in a way which will preserve the economic freedom of the average American family. We will examine the way our party and the other party responds to these challenges.

Already, in the decade of the 1960's, we in this body are making history. Just as surely, we make history when we fail to act as when we do act. Our every move carries us one step closer to the dreadful perils or one step closer to the boundless promises. The clock ticks off the time, and each striking hour, our political parties face, irrevocably, a judgment. At the final sounding, either the peril or the promise will have won.

It is the declaration and firm belief of the Republican Party that we can defeat the peril and bring the promise into being if this Nation will harness and put to work the God-given strength of free men and women. To this end, we propose to dedicate ourselves and our party in the decade ahead.

ROLLCALL VOTE ON APPROPRIATION BILLS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COLLIER], is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, while most of us have not had an opportunity to fully digest the 1961 Federal budget which was presented this afternoon, it is certainly not too early to view and review the fiscal situation of the Nation with deep concern as we approach our deliberations on a score of appropriation bills.

The full and final responsibility for balancing the new budget and opening the door to applying any surplus to the national debt lies squarely upon the Members of this body.

Recording of yea and nay votes on all appropriation bills brought before us is, in my opinion, the first step in curtailing excessive Government spending and prudent refinancing of the national debt.

Within the next few weeks Congress will be grappling with a variety of legislation, including a score of appropriation bills for both committed and new Federal programs.

This being a presidential campaign year and politics being what they are on the American scene today, we can expect the usual pressures both internally and externally for programs which will move outside the realm of good fiscal judgment.

With the advent of the end of the steel strike and an era of great prosperity at hand, it may be easier to yield to these pressures.

It is not necessary to remind any Member of this House of the great public consternation which arose less than a year ago over deficit spending and inflation.

While messages of this nature have not flooded congressional offices as yet this year, it is my hope and my prediction that the same sentiment still prevails and these sentiments may well be transmitted to us before this session of Congress is another 6 or 7 weeks old.

It has been easy for Members of this Body to claim economy voting records and it has been just as easy through newsletters and news releases for Members of this body to convey to the folks back home a deep and undying interest in fiscal responsibility.

It is politically popular to take credit for assisting in a balanced budget, particularly when it is also possible to do so in the face of supporting every expanded Federal spending program offered for public or private consumption.

We need only go back to January of 1958 when a boom year was predicted and Congress went its merry way in spending generously of the anticipated tax income, only to encounter a temporary recession which left a deficit of 12 billion 400 million dollars.

Although we should not have to be so warned, one of the outstanding weekly news publications in the Nation has just pointed to this situation with the warning that it could happen again.

But back to the matter of pinning individual responsibility squarely upon the Members of this body from which all spending bills must originate.

Last July, sensing the inability of the average citizen to score his Representative on his record of fiscal responsibility, I introduced a bill providing for amending the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 so as to require the yeas and nays in the case of final action by the Senate and the House of Representatives on appropriation bills.

I am pleased to say that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules, Representative SMITH of Virginia, has advised me that he will bring the matter of this legislation to the attention of the Rules Committee at its first meeting.

I sincerely believe the time has arrived when each of us should be agreeable, if not anxious, to accept our individual responsibility in the matter of our stand for or against such appropriation bills as are presented.

Let me further state that I see no reason why any Member of Congress should, when voting in the good conscience of his convictions on the expenditure of Federal funds, object to the adoption of a rule such as this which simply puts him on record in pursuing such convictions.

Looking to the core of our present fiscal situation, and projecting the cost of our national debt, legislation of some nature in this area has never been of greater demand than it is today.

I believe the average citizen should have an opportunity to itemize, if you please, the appropriation approvals of his Representatives in Congress.

All things being equal, and the high level of prosperity in the country continuing throughout the next fiscal year, any deficit in the new budget would be a shame.

It would certainly be an admission to the American public that this Congress lacks an understanding of the seriousness of our present fiscal problem, which is the hangover of many years of deficit spending sprees.

It has become vitally essential that any surplus that might be accumulated be applied against the astronomical national debt, as recommended by President Eisenhower.

And let me say the day we find ourselves in a position to reduce even a small portion of this costly obligation would be just cause for a national holiday.

As I have said before, I repeat that it is most unfortunate that the youth of this generation do not have a lobby here in Washington to protect their interest in the dollars they have yet to earn, for most of them will find, with their great American heritage, an obligation which this generation is bequeathing to them.

This problem of fiscal responsibility is certainly no longer one that can be construed as entirely of a domestic nature.

Unless we choose to blind ourselves to what is happening in the world money market, we must realize that our dollar troubles here have a very serious international implication.

Not only are dollars piling up faster abroad than ever before in history, but we are actually losing gold because U.S. payments to other nations are now exceeding our receipts.

Our labor costs in this country, now at an all-time high, are making it more and more difficult to hold foreign markets, although foreign manufactured goods continue to come into this country at an increased pace.

This is naturally going to expedite the growing tendency of industry to move abroad where labor costs are lower, taxes are lower, and potential profits accordingly higher.

This, coupled with the necessity of having to refinance $25 billion of our national debt by the midsixties, and roughly $2 billion of this within a matter of 5 to 6 months, while interest rates are the highest in the history of this Nation, should have a sobering effect upon any enthusiastic programs of deficit spending in the months ahead.

We continue to spend billions for national defense, yet it frequently appears that we forget that a strong internal economy and a sound fiscal policy are as vital to our national security as any ingredient of its foundation.

Further devaluation of the dollar, increased indebtedness and its eroding effect upon the stability of our economy at home can only be construed abroad as a decay in the general strength of this Nation.

Election year or no election year, the seriousness of the situation faces us as squarely as any national problem before us today.

It can be made either a challenge of statesmanship or bypassed for political expediency.

The choice is before each Member of this House as we move into the legislative task before us.

THE NORTHERN DEMOCRAT-SOUTHERN DEMOCRAT COALITION

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BASS of Tennessee). Under the previous order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS] for 20 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have entitled these remarks "The Northern Democrat-Southern Democrat Coalition."

Mr. Speaker I drafted a letter to my constituents to inform them of the status of the civil rights legislation. After drafting this letter I thought I would prefer to deliver this on the floor of the House so that anyone who wants to take exception to what I say will have an opportunity.

Dear constituents, the 2d session of the 86th Congress has started on a very curious note. The House has been meeting every day for just a short time, but transacting very little business.

The reason for the meetings, as stated by Congressman JOHN MCCORMACK, the majority leader, is "to give the Members of the House an opportunity to sign the discharge petition to bring the civil rights bill onto the floor of the House for debate."

The majority leader, along with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Congressman CELLER, and a few other spokesmen for the northern city wing of the Democratic Party, have been making speeches chastising the Republicans in the House who compose about one-third of the membership for not signing this discharge petition.

Certain members of the working press, TV, and radio commentators have echoed the statements of these congressional leaders. Some have gone a step farther by raising the question whether the Republicans had a deal with the Southern Democrats to get through the Landrum-Griffin labor reform bill and now the Republicans are "paying off to the Southern Democrats." Once again a Southern Democrat-Republican coalition is suggested as being the reason the Democratic Party cannot function as a party.

WHAT ABOUT THE NORTHERN DEMOCRAT-SOUTHERN DEMOCRAT COALITION?

Now what is the truth of the situation? The truth is easily obtainable by any observer of the Washington scene. The truth has been known for years. Why is not the truth reported to the people so that they can evaluate the situation themselves?

I regret to state that rigged quiz shows and payola rackets are only a symptom of a much more serious disease which has afflicted our Nation. Indeed, some of the loudest cries condemning the decline of morals evidenced by rigged quiz shows and payola come from people who are engaged and have been engaged for many years in a much more serious distortion of the truth to fool the people. They are engaged in no parlor games or selling a particular product to the public, they are engaged in hoodwinking the people on the issues involved in the national security and well-being of our society.

In many instances these people are motivated by good intentions. They believe that the people do not know what is the best for themselves, therefore they must be led into doing what is best for themselves. If it is necessary to deceive them so that they will do what is for their own good, then deceive them.

I am convinced that good intentions can never in the long run compensate for the damage which results from the use of willful deception. I am convinced that the people of this country properly supplied with the facts and arguments surrounding the issues of the day will come to intelligent conclusions and support the policies proposed by the persons they have selected to lead the Nation. The people do not have to be fooled for their own best interests. Representative government can work if we will work at it.

I want to make it quite clear that in my judgment neither political party has a monopoly on this business of trying to fool the people. Likewise, in both political parties, there are persons who are fighting against this debilitating philosophy of fooling the people for their own best interests. On the other hand, those who have been most active and successful in their efforts to fool the people in recent years are in my judgment as wrong in their goals of what is good for the people, as they are in their methods. The members of the group I refer to have styled themselves as liberals. Actually they are not liberal by any dictionary definition of the word inasmuch as their programs invariably call for more government, not less government, and therefore less individual freedom. Their programs call for more Federal Government at the expense of local and State governments. Their programs call for more control by the executive department of the Federal Government at the expense of the Federal legislative and Federal judicial branches of the Government. In essence, this group of liberals are the modern day Federalists who believe that in modern times our society must have more of a centralized planned economy if we are to continue to advance and to compete with the other societies in the world.

Now back to the question about the Southern Democrat-Republican coalition that has been described in the public over a period of years. This proposition is one of the themes advanced by these so-called liberals. What is the truth? The truth is that the real coalition is between them and the Southern Democrats. Congressman CELLER and Congressman MCCORMACK and Congressman ROOSEVELT, for example, voted for and influenced their liberal congressional following to vote for Congressman SMITH of Virginia to be chairman of the Rules Committee, and Congressman BARDEN to be chairman of the Education and Labor Committee. In return for this support Congressman SMITH and Congressman BARDEN voted and threw their support to elect JOHN MCCORMACK majority leader of this coalition and voted for Congressman CELLER to be chairman of the Judiciary Committee. In the other body a similar situation prevails, the details of which I shall not set out in order to conform to the statement I made in response to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Do I understand the gentleman made reference to Senators in his speech here?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Yes; I was referring to them.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Is that in conformity with the rules of the House?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I think in context, it is, because I am not discussing any particular issue or casting any aspersions on them.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. The point of order is made to the Chair. As I understand it, the rules of the House prohibit Members of the House from referring to action of the Senators or anything in that relationship. The gentleman has, on a number of occasions, made reference to Senators EASTLAND, HENNINGS, HUMPHREY, and several others. Now, that is contrary to the rules of the House and should be stricken.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I will say this, if the gentleman wants to insist on his point of order, I will delete the actual names in order to comply with the rules and in order to discuss the issue I was trying to bring out. But, I will be happy to agree to strike those names and proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, then, if the gentleman from Colorado has no objection, the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I will withdraw the reference to the Senators. That is what I suggest I do, and I agree with the gentleman's point that it is a proper point of order.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. As long as you are willing to admit that you are violating the rules of the House, that is all right with me.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Now, wait a minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Colorado insist on his point of order?

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. No; I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado withdraws his point of order. The Chair requests that the gentleman from Missouri proceed in order. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I thank the Speaker.

In speaking about the rules of the House, the rule is a very good one, and one I do try to observe carefully, and I think all Members should. The purpose of the rule, though, is to preserve amity between this House and the Senate. Frequently it becomes a very awkward rule, however, in order to discuss some of the pertinent public issues. I think my reference to the Senators was courteous and in no sense a degradation of them or in any way taking issue with them on any specific issue. I was commenting on party organization.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Do you think that it is fair to the Senators to make a comparison of what is taking place here in the House by naming them specifically in a letter that you now propose to send to your constituents?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Sure. What I say to my constituents is my own business. And, the rules of the House are not involved in that, I might say. Certainly, in order to discuss the basic issues that affect the country, it is pretty difficult not to refer to the other body at times, because they do have some influence on both your party organization and mine.

In other words, the obviousness and bigness of the Southern Democrat-Northern Democrat coalition and its long-standing operation has been such that it is completely overlooked in viewing the national scene. Hitler realized that the big lie carried greater weight because human nature tends to overlook the obvious. We tend to dismiss basic truths by referring to them with the conceit of the half educated as platitudes. So this self-styled liberal group establishing their basic coalition with the Southern Democrats has sought to distract the people from this true and obvious picture by calling the splits that occur from time to time in the coalition as the Southern Democrats go a different direction, a Republican-Southern Democrat coalition.

Are there occasions when the split is different and the liberal Democrats go their way and vote with the Republicans? Certainly; and these splits are almost as frequent as are the Southern Democratic lapses from the basic coalition. It happens every time civil rights legislation is before the House. It has been happening with more frequency in the past couple of years, I am happy to state, on farm legislation. But does the self-styled "liberal" group talk about the Northern-Republican coalition when this occurs? It does not. But in the South in order to keep the southerners voting for Representatives who will support the coalition there is plenty of talk about it.

BACK TO THE DISCHARGE PETITION

The liberal groups who make such great protestations about being for civil rights need to be called to task for ignoring and indeed undermining the most basic civil rights which our society possesses. The most basic right is the right to vote and have the vote counted honestly. Both the Southern Democrats as a group and a majority of the Northern city Democrats are guilty to a considerable degree of constant violation of this basic civil right—the southerners in their denial of the vote to the Negro and the Northern city Democrats in their boss-ridden city machines where fraudulent voting is almost a byword. This is not to give the Republican Party a clean bill of health in this regard. But I think the people of the country might well contemplate the contrast of the two parties in this respect.

An independent Congress, acting according to rules, not by personal whim, is a second foundation stone in any code of civil liberties. Why are the self-styled liberals always ready to discredit the rules of the House whenever they have trouble getting through some specific measure they claim to favor? This group was behind the idea of packing the Supreme Court when in the thirties they did not like what the Court was doing. Now they defend the Court against similar attacks of the southerners, not because they seek to preserve the integrity of the Court—as proven by their previous behavior—but because what the Court is now saying meets with their approval.

This is not to say that the rules of the House are sacrosanct and beyond improvement. Indeed, the rules need constant looking into and improving, but this calls for specific criticism and specific recommendations for reform. For example, 3 years ago I helped to write and to get through new rules for committee procedure in the House. Yet, these rules had scarcely been on the books when one of the committee—the Oversight Subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—was guilty of gross violation of it, in my opinion. Almost alone I took the floor of the House to try to preserve the integrity of these rules. Not one of the self-styled liberals had the interest to defend rules that they had stated were necessary reforms.

When I first was assigned to the Joint Economic Committee in 1954 I found the committee had no rules of procedure. It took 6 months of complaint and pressure on the then chairman, Senator DOUGLAS, of Illinois, to get rules written.

Now are the rules of the House adequate to get the civil rights bill on the floor of the House without the discharge petition process? The answer is unequivocally, "Yes." The discharge petition itself is a proper procedure and a part of the rules but it is in the nature of a last resort measure and should only be used if all machinery in the Congress has proved ineffective against arbitrary and unjustifiable action or lack of action on the part of a group of Congressmen. Under the House rules, no one or two Congressmen, no matter what their position is—even if they be Speaker and majority leader—can stop proper measures from coming to the floor of the House against the will of the majority.

The question is, Have all reasonable measures under the House rules to bring the civil rights bill on the floor of the House been exhausted? The answer is, Even the basic procedure of bringing the matter before the Rules Committee has not been undertaken with any real force by Congressman CELLER, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which voted out the bill as the result I might state of a Northern Democrat-Republican coalition. The bill was reported out last August in the closing days of the first session. Chairman CELLER wrote a letter to Congressman SMITH, chairman of the Rules Committee, asking for a hearing on a rule. By Congressman CELLER's own statement on the floor he has done nothing since then to try to get a hearing for a rule before the Rules Committee.

Even if the Rules Committee controlled, as it is by the Northern Democrat-Southern Democrat coalition, 8 to 4, were unable to get a rule because the coalition would not hold together on this issue, there are other ways of getting the job done. Incidentally, the Rules Committee would vote out a rule if the Northern Democrats will supply three votes to the Republicans on the Rules Committee and just bring the necessary pressure on the chairman of the Rules Committee to call the committee together for this purpose. The Northern Democrats have not taken this route because, I presume, they are trying to keep the people of the country from realizing the true story of Northern Democratic-Southern Democratic coalition. That it is not a political party in the proper sense of the word that is an organization of people joining together on the basis of a common belief in certain fundamental principles of government. It is a coalition for power—"You vote for our man, we will vote for yours even though our views are completely discordant on all major issues."

The silence of the Republican Members of the House on this issue stems from their natural reluctance to help the opposition, and specifically their reluctance to help in hiding the truth from the people. The Republican members of the Rules Committee will not state how they will vote on the rule before the matter is presented to them. This is in accordance with good procedure and good precedence. The self-styled liberals know full well these four Republicans will vote for a rule based both on their past actions and votes and on the tradition of the Republican Party. So do the self-styled liberal newsmen who are yakking about a Southern Democrat-Republican coalition know this to be the reasonable prognostication. Furthermore, there should be no doubt in anyone's mind based upon past voting records that probably all of the 153 Republicans in the House, save a handful of less than 10, will vote for the civil rights bill. The Republicans, I hope, are not going to help keep the leadership of the Northern Democrat-Southern Democrat coalition from exposing this coalition to the people for just what it is, I regret, a coalition for power and not for principle.

There is an easy procedure to call up the civil rights bill without any reference to the Rules Committee. When the reform was made back in the early 1900's to expand the Rules Committee from a 3-man committee completely dominated by the Speaker—a Republican in those days—to a 12-man committee which would be more responsive to the will of the House membership and so to the people, the reformers wisely realized that even with a 12-man committee and one that was set to have 8 men from the majority party and 4 from the minority, the Speaker might still work with this group of 8 to thwart the will of the majority of the House. Accordingly, they created a procedure entitled "Calendar Wednesday." This procedure guarantees through very careful drafting that any committee which has voted out a bill by majority vote can bring the bill out to the floor for debate and amendment with ample time for debate whether the Speaker likes it or not and with reasonable expedition.

The present Speaker—like, I believe, his Republican and Democratic predecessors—does not like to call attention to the procedures of Calendar Wednesday. Certainly nothing would call it to the attention of the country more than a proper use of it. The Speakers have not liked and do not like this rule because it is a real diminution on their power as they well know it to be and it was intended to be.

The self-styled liberals almost destroyed any possible effectiveness of Calendar Wednesday back in 1949 by pushing through the 21-day rule. This gave back to the Speaker some of the powers over the Rules Committee which the enlargement from 3 to 12 members had taken from him. The 21-day rule provided that after the Rules Committee had failed to act on a bill for 21 days the Speaker could recognize the chairman of the committee to bring the bill up on the floor of the House for debate. The significance of the rule is that it gave this power which Calendar Wednesday gives to the majority of a legislative committee to call up a bill for debate also to the Speaker. This takes some of the steam, whatever steam there may be, out of the drive to use Calendar Wednesday and gives to the Speaker just one more device to bend the will of the majority to his own will.

Fortunately the next Congress in 1951 repealed the 21-day rule. So this device to keep the Calendar Wednesday procedure from being used does not stand as an excuse for Chairman CELLER not using Calendar Wednesday to bring up the civil rights bill.

The clincher about the deceptiveness of the Southern Democrat-Northern Democrat tactics in resorting to a discharge petition procedure is brought out by the fact that neither the Speaker—a Texan Democrat—nor the majority leader—a Massachusetts Democrat—will sign the discharge petition. Of course they will not. Signing a discharge petition in essence means that the signer has lost complete faith in the ability of the political party in control of the House to live up to its responsibilities as a political party. It also means a complete collapse of the leadership of the House to implement its decisions.

I have never signed a discharge petition since I have been in the Congress. There are many Members who take the same position, based upon the belief in the essential soundness of the House procedures and the importance of preserving these procedures and the procedures of orderly leadership.

That is not to say that the time would never come when I would sign a discharge petition. The time might come but it would only be when there was such a collapse of leadership of a political party that a willful minority segment of that party was thwarting the will of the majority and the issues were of serious nature to our people.

I believe we are approaching such a situation. Civil rights are serious to our Nation. This bill which relates to the basic civil right that of voting should be on the floor for debate and passage. However, I know that the leadership of the Northern Democrat-Southern Democrat coalition has not yet collapsed to the point where it cannot work its will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BASS of Tennessee). The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Frankly, I wish it would reach this point because I have long felt that it is an unholy alliance which is hurting the cause both of good and of representative government in the United States. Certainly I will not play this coalition game to try to deceive the public about its demise when I know it is still very much alive and kicking. This is not payola or a quiz game we are playing. This is life and it is in earnest. The future of our country is wrapped up in the outcome. If this coalition through its elected leader, the Speaker, SAM RAYBURN of Texas, wishes to state that the coalition has been abolished and that it is no longer capable of providing leadership to this Congress, then I will sign this discharge petition. Otherwise, let us face it, a Congress which is controlled almost 2 to 1 by the Northern Democrat-Southern Democrat coalition, as a coalition has decided it does not want a civil rights bill. This means the northern wing of the coalition has agreed to pay this price to the southern wing in order to keep the coalition going. I hope the Republican Party will stand firm on refusing to aid and abet them. I further hope the truth of what is going on will get through the silken curtain of the liberal newsmen to the public.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this is a letter he is sending out to his constituents?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. This was a letter that I wrote. I regularly send a newsletter to my constituents. This was a letter I was going to send to them. Then, after writing it, as I said at the beginning, I thought I would prefer to deliver it on the floor of the House so that those who might want to take exception to it would have an opportunity to do so. So it will be in the RECORD and those who want to take exception, I hope will do so and I will be very glad to listen to what they have to say.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. What was the gentleman's statement about Members of the House voting for the chairman of a committee, like the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit me, if I were to add the phrase "in effect were voting" that would make it absolutely accurate. I know the gentleman is familiar with the procedure. So when, in effect, you do organize the House through a coalition, and I think that is a fair term, of Northern Democrats and Southern Democratic votes, that perforce means that those men will become chairmen of these committees, as the gentleman well knows. So, in effect, that is voting for those gentlemen in both senses to be chairmen of these committees. I am trying to bring out the point which I know is true, and I think the gentleman knows it is true, that the coalition is between Northern and Southern Democrats and only incidentally do we Republicans ever get together with the Northern Democrats at times on civil rights, and with the Southern Democrats at times on fiscal policy.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Does the gentleman mean when the rules of the House were adopted that the membership or the chairmanship and so forth of the committees was then and there determined?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I would say, as a practical effect, yes; and the gentleman knows it. Your party has control and if you do not want to choose chairmen of the committees another way, you could decide that.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. One other question. Did you vote against the adoption of the rules of the House?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I voted against SAM RAYBURN for Speaker, yes, and that is the issue. That is the key vote in the House.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. That does not answer the question.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I believe it does.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Did you vote against the adoption of the rules of the House?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I submit I answered the real question which is that I voted to organize the House through the Republican Party. The gentleman voted to organize the House through the Democratic Party. The result of that has been just as I have described. The gentleman voted for Judge SMITH to be head of the Committee on Rules; did he not?

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. In reality was not the House already organized?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. No, no. The organization, the first day, as the gentleman knows, is to elect the Speaker.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRICE. I think the gentleman would agree with me that to attempt to bring the civil rights measure up under the Calendar Wednesday procedure would be a very ineffective way to do it.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. No. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. PRICE. Why would the gentleman think that would be a good way to do it?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Because it can be done without the Speaker or anyone else stopping it. As the gentleman knows, Calendar Wednesday occurs every Wednesday. All the Committee on the Judiciary has to do is to wait until its turn. No other committee has any bill ready, as I understand it, and the committee could probably get an early Wednesday.

Mr. PRICE. In the first place, any Member of the House can object to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. That is right, and I am going to object it, I may say.

Mr. PRICE. That is, if you really favor civil rights, you would not be doing the cause any good, because what you would be doing under the rules under which the bill is considered under Calendar Wednesday, the bill would still be with us at the end of the session. The gentleman is familiar with the rule which limits the time on Calendar Wednesday to the committee which succeeds in calling up the bill to 2 hours.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Oh, the gentleman is not correct.

Mr. PRICE. So the committee would take the full 2 hours.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. PRICE. Under the Calendar Wednesday rule the committee on call that handles the bill has 2 hours for debate; 1 hour for the proponents and 1 for the other side.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Let me point this out. The gentleman must realize that then the committee proceeds under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. PRICE. The committee is limited to 2 hours of general debate on Calendar Wednesday. If that time expires and the committee rises they cannot proceed with the reading of the bill, and then the committee may have to wait until its next turn on the calendar.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I think this debate should go on further.

Mr. PRICE. I would be willing for the gentleman to check my parliamentary opinion.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I have checked the Calendar Wednesday rule. I regret it is not used.

Mr. PRICE. It is not used, for this reason——

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. PRICE. It is used on less controversial bills.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. The last time it was used was on a civil-rights bill.

Mr. PRICE. Because they know it would have no effect. It would never finish the bill.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. The gentleman is incorrect. I will be glad to have debate with the gentleman on this sometime in the very near future.

Mr. PRICE. I do not think it is a question of debate. It can be checked as a parliamentary question.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KASEM. I wish to commend the gentleman for refraining from the use of the childish words "Democrat Party" that has been indulged in so frequently by Members on the Republican side.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I thank the gentleman.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

A TRIBUTE TO THE BICENTENNIAL OF RICHARD ALLEN, A GREAT AMERICAN

Mr. SISK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, the year 1960, February 14 to be precise, is the 200th anniversary of the birth of a great American, Bishop Richard Allen, a former slave who after purchase of his own freedom founded the African Methodist Episcopal Church

As a civic leader and a citizen dedicated to the principle of brotherhood and equality for all mankind, Richard Allen exemplified the best tradition of his time. It is noteworthy that he was eminently respected by his contemporaries and fellow Philadelphians, Benjamin Franklin, Dr. Benjamin Rush, and others whose names were affixed to the Declaration of Independence in 1776.

To mark the anniversary of Allen's birth, the African Methodist Episcopal Church will hold a year-long observance commencing February 14, 15, and 16 in the city of Philadelphia. A committee of distinguished Philadelphians has been formed to launch this bicentennial with appropriate dignity and ceremony.

The name of Richard Allen is revered not only by the members of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in America, but throughout the world wherever the message of brotherhood as a Christian principle has been carried.

It is most fitting that the entire populace of the United States join with the African Methodist Episcopal Church in paying tribute to Richard Allen, and I deem it a signal honor as a clergyman to make this tribute to his life a matter of official record.

The life and philosophy of Richard Allen becomes increasingly meaningful in the year of 1960. Indeed, the struggle for civil rights in which we are now engaged has its roots deep in the fruits of his life and works.

It was Richard Allen's objections to racial segregation in the Methodist Church of Philadelphia that led to the founding of the present African Methodist Episcopal Church as a Christian body foresworn to the right to worship without humiliation and dedicated to the principle: God our Father, Christ our Redeemer, man our brother.

Most of the early fighters for the freedom of Negroes were members of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. Hundreds of the first Negro teachers received their early training under its auspices, and Wilberforce University, Xenia, Ohio, the first institution of higher learning for Negroes in the United States, was founded by African Methodists.

Bishop Sherman Lawrence Greene, of Atlanta, Ga., is chairman of the Bicentennial Observance Commission. As senior bishop of his church, Bishop Greene is also the closest link to the tradition and philosophy of Richard Allen. It is pertinent, therefore, to note the following exhortation made by Bishop Greene in a pastoral letter to his colleagues on January 2 of this year:

The 1950's saw many far-reaching changes in our status. Paced by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, we have won victory after victory in the courts of the land. The most singular victory, however, is the raising of the banner of unity and oneness in the goals toward which we are struggling.

We must keep it crystal clear as well as firmly declared the Negro leadership is dedicated to make liberty and justice for all a living reality.

Our preachments of democracy will continue to have a hollow ring so long as we are complacent about the existence of segregation on account of race or religion, or so long as any of God's children are denied their due.

To implement this policy of massive insistence, the A.M.E. Church, both clergy and laymen, must maintain constant vigilance. They must be more concerned with the proper exercise of the right of franchise, and they must vote into office only those who unequivocably share our hope for a bias-free America by 1963.

This statement, calling for massive insistence on first-class Americanism, was warmly endorsed by the national board of directors of the NAACP at its annual meeting—New York, N.Y., January 4, 1960. It exemplifies a spirit and social gospel that is patriotism in its purest sense. It is dedicated to the realization of the principles on which this, our Nation, is founded.

One of the denomination's ranking general officers, Dr. George Arnett Singleton, of Philadelphia, widely regarded as a man of letters and a keen student of history, is editor of the oldest of Negro magazines, the A.M.E. Church Review. Dr. Singleton has compiled the following highlights of the life of Richard Allen:

RICHARD ALLEN

He was born in Philadelphia, a slave of a Quaker lawyer, Hon. Benjamin Chew, chief justice of the Commonwealth, February 14, 1760. Because of financial problems he was sold with his family to a Mr. Stokley, near Dover, Del. At the age of 17 he was converted under the preaching of Freeborn Garretson, and became a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He purchased his freedom. During the Revolutionary War he was a noncombatant and hauled salt for George Washington from Rehoboth, Del. When the Christmas conference met at Lovely Lane, Baltimore, Md., in 1784, and organized the Methodist Church as a connection, Richard Allen was present. He traveled as a preacher, returned to Philadelphia in 1786, joined Old St. George Church, Fourth and Vine Streets; organized a prayer band of 42 members. Because of segregation, and an attempt to pull his friends from their knees while in the act of prayer, one Sunday morning in 1787 he led them out by faith.

He purchased an old abandoned blacksmith shop for $35 at Sixth and Walnut Streets, hauled it with his own team of horses to Sixth and Lombard, and founded Mother Bethel, which stands upon the sacred spot.

During the yellow fever epidemic of 1793, under the direction of Dr. Rush he nursed and treated the patients. The sick he carried to the hospital managed by Stephen Girard, and buried the dead.

January 23, 1794, he was given a letter of commendation by the mayor of Philadelphia, Hon. Matthew Clarkson:

"Having, during the prevalence of the late malignant disorder, had almost daily opportunities of seeing the conduct of Absalom Jones and Richard Allen, and the people employed by them to bury the dead: I with cheerfulness give this testimony of my approbation of their proceedings, so far as they came under my notice, their diligence, attention, and decency of deportment, afforded me, at the time much satisfaction.

"MATTHEW CLARKSON,
"Mayor.

"PHILADELPHIA, January 23, 1794."

Allen organized a Sunday school, a day school, and a mutual aid society. For the War of 1812 he organized a regiment of Black Legion to defend the Nation.

Allen was the first ordained preacher of color in America, in 1799. In 1816, with 15 ministers and laymen, he organized the African Methodist Episcopal Church as a connection, because of segregation. Today the denomination has over a million members in the United States, Canada, the West Indies Islands, Bermuda, South America, West and South Africa; 7,000 churches, and 6,800 preachers. He was the first bishop elected and ordained April 11, 1816.

In 1817 he published the first book of discipline, and in 1818, the first hymnal.

The A.M.E. Church now owns and operates the oldest college by people of color in America, Wilberforce University, Ohio; Allen University, Columbia, S.C.; Morris Brown College, Atlanta, Ga.; Kittrell College, North Carolina; Edward Waters College, Jacksonville, Fla.; Payne College, Birmingham, Ala.; Campbell College, Jackson, Miss.; Paul Quinn College, Waco, Tex.; Shorter College, Little Rock, Ark.; and Payne Theological Seminary, Wilberforce, Ohio. And there are schools in South America and Africa. The Douglas Hospital, Kansas City, Kans.; Camp Baber, Mich.; and the Reid Community Center, Charleston, S.C.

The church publishes the oldest religious journal, the Christian Recorder, and the oldest magazine, the African Methodist Episcopal Church Review.

Richard Allen took the leadership in organizing a Masonic lodge in Philadelphia, March 26, 1797, and was the treasurer of the first African lodge.

The bicentennial celebration is in honor of the pioneer champion of religious liberty in America. Upon the foundation which he laid a stride is now being made toward first-class citizenship for all. The motto of the church is: "God our Father, Christ our Redeemer, man our brother."

THE EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON HOME BUYING

Mr. SISK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RAINS] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINS. Mr. Speaker, the home buyer is once again one of the first victims of the administration's high interest rate, hard money policy. Once again we are witnessing the paradox of a slump in residential construction at a time when most other sectors of the economy are rising.

The typical American family who wants to buy its own home, like the farmer and the small businessman, is simply unable to compete with the giant corporations for the limited supply of money. Even if home buyers were able to pay ever higher interest rates, this would not solve the problem. Last year, the Congress reluctantly authorized an increase in the interest rate on VA-guaranteed home loans. In spite of this, the discount charged by the Federal National Mortgage Association when it purchases these loans is even higher now than it was at the lower rate.

More direct action is necessary if American families are to realize their deep-rooted hopes of homeownership.

Moreover, we must act and act promptly to halt the decline in home building which has already resulted in the loss of some half a million jobs. We must not forget that the dropoff in housing was a major contributing factor to the recession of 1958.

To meet this serious and growing problem I have introduced the emergency homeownership bill, H.R. 9371, and I have scheduled hearings on the bill before the Housing Subcommittee beginning next Monday.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to place into the RECORD a section-by-section summary of the emergency homeownership bill, as follows:

EMERGENCY HOMEOWNERSHIP ACT—SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

In general, it is the purpose of the bill to halt the serious slump in residential construction, to increase both onsite and offsite job opportunities, to help achieve an expanding full employment economy, and to broaden homeownership opportunities for the American people.

The first section of the bill provides that the act may be cited by its short title (the Emergency Homeownership Act).

Section 2 amends section 203(b) of the National Housing Act (the regular residential housing mortgage insurance program) to make it clear that FHA may insure mortgage loans made by individuals as well as those made by corporate and other commercial lenders in order to make the program more effective in smaller towns and communities.

Section 3 amends section 203(c) of the National Housing Act so as to fix the premium charge for mortgage insurance granted under the regular residential housing program during the 1-year period beginning on date of enactment at one-fourth of 1 percent. Under existing law the FHA Commissioner has discretion to fix this charge at any point between one-half of 1 percent and 1 percent.

Section 4 amends title III of the National Housing Act to provide that it shall be one of the purposes of the Federal National Mortgage Association, in its secondary market operations, to aid in the stabilization of the mortgage market.

Section 5 amends section 302(b) of the National Housing Act to require FNMA, during the 1-year period beginning on date of enactment, to purchase any mortgage which is offered to it regardless of the type of housing covered, so long as title to the property is good and the mortgage is otherwise eligible and not in default. FNMA's authority to limit the age of eligible mortgages would not be changed. (Under current regulations, eligible mortgages cannot be more than 4 months old.)

Section 6 amends section 302(b) of the National Housing Act to prohibit FNMA, during the 1-year period beginning on date of enactment, from selling or otherwise disposing of any mortgage which it may hold.

Section 7 amends section 303(b) of the National Housing Act to fix the amount of FNMA stock which a person is required to purchase when selling a mortgage to FNMA, during the 1-year period beginning on date of enactment, at 1 percent of the unpaid principal amount of the mortgage. Under existing law FNMA has discretion to fix this requirement at any point between 2 percent and 1 percent of such unpaid principal amount.

Section 8 amends section 305(b) of the National Housing Act to require that FNMA, in the performance of its special assistance functions, during the 1-year period beginning on date of enactment, shall not pay less than par for any mortgage.

Section 9 amends section 305(b) of the National Housing Act to provide that the maximum charges or fees which FNMA may impose for its commitment and purchase of a mortgage under the special assistance program, during the 1-year period beginning on date of enactment, shall be 1 percent of the unpaid principal amount of the mortgage, with one-fourth being collected at the time of commitment and the remainder at the time of purchase. Under existing law, FNMA has full discretion to fix these charges and fees. (Under current regulations, these fees total 1½ percent with one-half of this amount collected at the time of commitment.)

Section 10 amends section 305(g) of the National Housing Act to make it clear that mortgages on cooperative housing insured by FHA under section 213 are eligible for purchase by FNMA under its program 10 special assistance operations. (See sec. 11.)

Section 11 amends section 305(g) of the National Housing Act to provide an additional $1 billion for FNMA's program 10 operations. This program was established by the Emergency Housing Act of 1958 under FNMA's special assistance function for the purchase of mortgages on new construction. This bill retains the present ceiling of $13,500 per mortgage (or per dwelling unit in the case of sec. 213 mortgages) but adds the further provision that the association may by regulation increase the amount by not more than $1,000 in high-cost areas.

Section 12 amends section 305 of the National Housing Act to create a $50 million special assistance fund for the purchase by FNMA of mortgages which are insured under section 203(i) (and which cover new construction). No such mortgage could be purchased from the new fund if any service charges other than the usual origination fee had been imposed. (Under current regulations, FHA permits a special service charge of one-half of 1 percent on the outstanding balance of the mortgage to be added to the monthly carrying cost on loans of $8,000 or less.)

Section 13 requires the originating mortgagee under an FHA-insured mortgage or a VA-insured or guaranteed loan to report to the agency involved the amount of any fees, charges, or discounts paid in connection with such mortgage or loan.

DANGER IN YOUR DRINKING WATER

Mr. SISK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, last year I inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 169 articles in a series called "Poison in Your Water." This series chronicled the horrifying scandalous waste found in America's use of its water resources for open sewers. They told of the danger to human life from germs and bacteria of typhoid, dysentery, infectious hepatitis, toxic materials like cyanides, zinc, salts, and phenol which are being dumped in hundreds of ton lots into our rivers and streams throughout this country.

An article appeared in the January 1960 issue of Good Housekeeping, entitled "Danger in Your Drinking Water," chronicling more danger to our American people in the poisons, wastes, filth, and germs we find in the water that we drink every day. I hope all will read this splendid article by a distinguished author, Mr. Alvin B. Toffler, together with the remarks of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Mr. Arthur S. Flemming, who says:

Our water resources must be vigilantly safeguarded. Our Department is providing extensive assistance to States and communities in the control of pollution under the strengthened Federal Water Pollution Control Act of 1956. The enforcement authority written into this act at the insistence of the Department provides for the first time an effective mechanism of encouraging and if necessary, requiring the construction of waste-treatment plants to control pollution of interstate streams. But the battle must be waged on a broad front—in intrastate as well as in interstate waters. If it is not, we may be confronted with a crisis of such gravity as to jeopardize the further growth and development of many areas of the country and even the health of millions of people.

This article, inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 11, 1960, by my colleague, the Honorable BYRON L. JOHNSON, of Colorado, puts forth strong arguments why H.R. 3610 should be enacted by Congress at the earliest possible moment and signed into law by the President. It also shows sound reasons why the Congress must appropriate the full $50 million authorized for grants to the States for water pollution control under the provisions of Public Law 660. It is a compelling argument in favor of my bill (H.R. 8494) to strengthen the enforcement authority of the Federal Government in the field of water pollution control.

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY IS PREDICTED AS A BOOM YEAR FOR BIG BUSINESS AND A BUST YEAR FOR SMALL BUSINESS—TIGHT MONEY AGAIN

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, Miss Sylvia Porter points out in her column today that small business failures are rising. She predicts the greatest wave of small business bankruptcies in 1960 since the depression thirties.

Last year was a near-record year for small business bankruptcies. The total topped 14,000, or more than 300 a week.

The reason for the rise in small business failures in periods when big business is booming is the Federal Reserve's tight-money policy.

The Federal Reserve authorities still like to say that "the interest rate allocates credit"; but nothing could be further from the fact.

Credit is extended on a kind of priority system. Big industry and big finance have all kinds of interlocking relationships and reciprocal back-scratching arrangements. These are paralleled by the vast interlocking directorates of the big banks, insurance companies, mutual savings banks, investment banks, and, of course, the big industrial and utility corporations.

The big industrial and utility corporations have first priority. When there is adequate credit, small business gets what is left over. When credit is not adequate to meet both big business demands and small business needs, small business gets left out.

To find the deadly shadow of what will happen in the year ahead, we need only to look back to what happened during the last tight-money squeeze. For a 2-year period, beginning late in 1955 and ending late in 1957, credit was made progressively tighter. Many thousands of efficient, deserving small businesses were squeezed into bankruptcy.

At my suggestion the Federal Reserve finally made a survey of its member banks to find out how business credit had been divided up among firms of various sizes at the beginning and at the end of the big squeeze. Despite a large increase in business in this period, the smallest size firms—those with assets of $50,000 or less—had 3 percent less bank credit in October 1957 than they had in October 1955.

The giant firms—those with more than $100 million of assets—had 66 percent more bank credit at the end of 1957 than they had had at the end of 1955.

In between these two extremes the various size classes had shared in the available credit in a manner graduated in accordance with their size. In other words, the big corporations got most, the middle-size corporations got less, and the small firms got still less.

For the Members' attention, I will insert Miss Porter's column from the Washington Evening Star of today. No doubt those Members who have small businesses in their districts will be interested in reading this, as will other Members who are concerned about what is happening to the competitive structure of American business and to the public welfare generally.

The article follows:

YOUR MONEY'S WORTH

(By Sylvia Porter)

WAVE OF SMALL FAILURES DUE

A wave of bankruptcies among small businessmen is due this year.

The number of small business failures is heading for the highest level since the depression thirties. It's almost certain that 1959's total of 14,000 bankruptcies will be topped. It's almost certain that businesses will be dying at a rate of more than 300 a week as the year rolls on.

The ironic explanation lies in the very fact of prosperity. The economic boom is bringing on the most severe money squeeze in over a generation, and this credit pinch will spell disaster for smaller concerns.

A second explanation lies in the upsurge in competition, older firms without the know-how to compete successfully in a rough period and tender infants without adequate credit lines will die.

I am not guessing about this trend. The background of prosperity and tight money is unmistakable now.

Against this background, all I am doing is making a simple—and conservative—projection of Dun & Bradstreet's authoritative compilations of the total and type of failures which occurred in 1959.

CREDIT IS PROBLEM

As always in a boom cycle, thousands of enthusiastic but inexperienced individuals try to realize the American dream of going into business for themselves.

But the significant fact is that in this boom, credit is becoming tougher and increasingly expensive to get.

A big, established corporation can get credit. Even if it can't get all it wants, it will have the financial connections to raise what it must have to compete and grow.

But the smaller businessman? The Nation's banks aren't organized to supply him with risk capital, and in this era of tight money they understandably favor their long-standing, "safe" customers.

The capital markets aren't set up to provide him at tolerable cost with the long-term funds he needs to grow.

The revolutionary system of small business investment companies created by law in 1958 to help finance small business has so far been an appalling flop.

And even if a small firm can get a loan, the cost in many instances may be just too steep. With the bluest of blue-chip companies paying close to 6 percent for loans, the charges—plus extras—to a little, marginal concern may be unbearable.

COMPETITION GAINING

Nor is there any denying the intensifying competition in this era as domestic and foreign producers scramble for a share of our dollar. In this sort of era, a high-cost, low-efficiency firm is fighting a losing battle on prices, services, research.

The statistics don't show the trend yet. Actually, Dun & Bradstreet's failure statistics were leveling off as 1959 closed. But the lull won't last as the money pinch really starts to pinch.

Most vulnerable will be merchandising and food stores, high-cost service shops, businesses in the $5,000 to $25,000 range. Killing them will be not only their experience, but also their inability to get the cash imperative if they are to compete and grow.

Surely we are not so complacent that we will smugly view this trend during a period of record prosperity?

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. BARR (at the request of Mr. DENTON), for an indefinite period, on account of illness.

Mr. WITHROW (at the request of Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin), on account of illness.

Mr. GARY (at the request of Mr. SMITH of Virginia), for 1 week, on account of illness.

Mr. SCHERER, on account of official business participating in discussions on road legislation at American Road Builders Association annual meeting.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. CANNON, for 40 minutes, following the reading of the President's budget message today.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, for 1 hour, tomorrow.

Mr. PATMAN, for 30 minutes, on Wednesday and Thursday next, and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. REUSS (at the request of Mr. KASTENMEIER), for 1 hour, on Wednesday, January 20.

Mr. MURPHY, for 1 hour, on February 16, on independence of Lithuania.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri, for 20 minutes, today.

Mr. GRIFFIN (at the request of Mr. CUNNINGHAM), on Tuesday, January 19, for 1 hour.

(At the request of Mr. SISK, permission to address the House following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore granted:)

Mr. ADDONIZIO, for 10 minutes, tomorrow.

Mr. POWELL, for 30 minutes, on Tuesday and for 30 minutes on Wednesday.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. FORAND.

Mr. BRADEMAS and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. YOUNG.

Mr. MCGINLEY and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. ALGER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Wisconsin and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. EDMONDSON, to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include with his remarks a statement by Mrs. PFOST, of Idaho.

Mr. KASTENMEIER, to extend his remarks in the RECORD together with extraneous matter.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. CUNNINGHAM) were granted permission to extend their remarks and include extraneous matter in the RECORD:)

Mr. SCHWENGEL.

(At the request of Mr. SISK, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)

Mr. GALLAGHER.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. SISK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 47 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 19, 1960, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1670. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting proposed supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year 1960 in the amount of $23 million for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (H. Doc. No. 301); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

1671. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (H. Doc. No. 302); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1672. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (H. Doc. No. 303); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1673. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of Federal Prison Industries, Inc., for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (H. Doc No. 304); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1674. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of the Virgin Islands Corporation for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (H. Doc. No. 305); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1675. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of the Federal home loan banks for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (H. Doc. No. 306); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1676. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of the Federal Facilities Corporation, General Services Administration, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (H. Doc. No. 307); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1677. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of Federal Crop Insurance Corporation (FCIC) for the fiscal year 1959 (H. Doc. No. 308); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1678. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the review of selected phases of low-rent housing and liquidating activities of the regional offices of the Public Housing Administration, Housing and Home Finance Agency (H. Doc. No. 309); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1679. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (H. Doc. No. 310); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1680. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of the Tennessee Valley Authority for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (H. Doc. No. 311); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1681. A letter from the Inspector General and Comptroller, Mutual Security, Department of State, transmitting the quarterly report on utilization of foreign currencies as provided by section 108 of the Mutual Security Appropriation Act, 1959 (Public Law 85-853), for the period October 1 through December 31, 1959; to the Committee on Appropriations.

1682. A letter from the Secretary of Defense, transmitting the report required pursuant to the provisions of section 412(a) of Public Law 86-149, approved August 19, 1959; to the Committee on Armed Services.

1683. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Army, transmitting the required report on the Department of the Army aviation personnel above the rank of major receiving monthly flight pay for the period July 1 through December 31, 1959, pursuant to 60 Stat. 20; 37 U.S.C. 118a-1; to the Committee on Armed Services.

1684. A letter from the Administrator, Housing and Home Finance Agency, transmitting drafts of proposed legislation entitled (1) "A bill to authorize use of additional funds, to the extent specified in appropriation acts, for public facility loans"; (2) "A bill to authorize use of additional funds, to the extent specified in appropriation acts, for the purchase of mortgages by the Federal National Mortgage Association under its special assistance program"; and (3) "A bill to amend title I of the National Housing Act"; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

1685. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting the 47th Annual Report of the Secretary of Commerce for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959, pursuant to the act of February 14, 1903 (5 U.S.C. 604); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1686. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report on the activities of, expenditures by, and donations to the Anthracite Experiment Station of the Bureau of Mines, Schuylkill Haven, Pa., for the calendar year 1959, pursuant to (56 Stat. 1056); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

1687. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of contract relating to proposed construction work dealing with the Talent division of the Rogue River Basin project, Oregon, pursuant to the act of June 13, 1956 (70 Stat. 274); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

1688. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to authorize the purchase and exchange of land and interests therein on the Blue Ridge and Natchez Trace Parkways"; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

1689. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to authorize the reconveyance of tribally owned lands by the Muckleshoot Indian Tribe of the State of Washington to the original allottees, their heirs, devisees, or assigns"; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

1690. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to suspend the application of sections 3114 and 3115 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, during periods of war or national emergency, to vessels operated by or for the account of the United States, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1691. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting the annual report of the Foreign-Trade Zones Board for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959, together with the reports covering the operations during the same period of foreign-trade zones Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5, located respectively at New York City, New Orleans, San Francisco, and Seattle, pursuant to Public Law 566, 81st Congress; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1692. A letter from the Director of Personnel, Department of Commerce, transmitting a report concerning positions in grades GS-16, 17, and 18 in the Department of Commerce for fiscal year 1959, pursuant to Public Law 854, 84th Congress; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

1693. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Personnel and Reserve Forces), transmitting a report of all settlements made under the authority of section 2732 entitled "Property loss: incident to service; members of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps, and civilian employees," for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959, pursuant to title 10 United States Code, section 2732(f); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1694. A letter from the Acting Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to give effect to certain obligations of the United States under the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949, by regulating use of the Red Cross and other emblems, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1695. A letter from the national commander, Military Order of the Purple Heart of the United States of America, Inc., transmitting the financial report of the Military Order of the Purple Heart of the United States of America, Inc., for the fiscal year August 1, 1958, to July 31, 1959, pursuant to Public Law 761, 85th Congress; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1696. A letter from the national commander, Military Order of the Purple Heart of the United States of America, Inc., relative to and confirming the final dissolution and liquidation of the Military Order of the Purple Heart, Inc., formerly incorporated under the laws of the State of New Jersey, pursuant to Public Law 761, 85th Congress; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1697. A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, U.S. Department of Justice, transmitting copies of orders granting the applications for permanent residence filed by the subjects, pursuant to the Refugee Relief Act of 1953; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey: Joint Committee on the Disposition of Executive Papers. House Report No. 1203. Report on the disposition of certain papers of sundry executive departments. Ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. LANE: Committee on the Judiciary. H.R. 6027. A bill to provide for the payment of a disability retirement annuity to Joseph J. O'Loughlin; with amendment (Rept. No. 1204). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MILLS:

H.R. 9660. A bill to amend section 6659(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the procedure for assessing certain additions to tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MASON:

H.R. 9661. A bill to amend section 6659(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the procedure for assessing certain additions to tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MILLS:

H.R. 9662. A bill to make technical revisions in the income-tax provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 relating to estates, trusts, partners, and partnerships, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MASON:

H.R. 9663. A bill to make technical revisions in the income-tax provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 relating to estates, trusts, partners, and partnerships, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ABBITT:

H.R. 9664. A bill to stabilize support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and to provide for adjustment in such levels in relation to farm cost; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. FOUNTAIN:

H.R. 9665. A bill to stabilize support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and to provide for adjustment in such levels in relation to farm cost; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

H.R. 9666. A bill to stabilize support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and to provide for adjustment in such levels in relation to farm cost; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. JENNINGS:

H.R. 9667. A bill to stabilize support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and to provide for adjustment in such levels in relation to farm cost; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. McMILLAN:

H.R. 9668. A bill to stabilize support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and to provide for adjustment in such levels in relation to farm costs; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. PERKINS:

H.R. 9669. A bill to stabilize support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and to provide for adjustment in such levels in relation to farm costs; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. STUBBLEFIELD:

H.R. 9670. A bill to stabilize support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and to provide for adjustment in such levels in relation to farm cost; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. WATTS:

H.R. 9671. A bill to stabilize support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and to provide for adjustment in such levels in relation to farm cost; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. ABERNETHY:

H.R. 9672. A bill to amend the Postal Field Service Compensation Act of 1955 in order to reduce from 10 hours to 9 hours the length of the period in which 8 hours of work per day shall be performed; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. ANDREWS:

H.R. 9673. A bill to authorize a 10-year program of grants for construction of veterinary medical, educational facilities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ASHLEY:

H.R. 9674. A bill to authorize the payment to local governments of sums in lieu of taxes and special assessments with respect to certain Federal real property, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana:

H.R. 9675. A bill to amend the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Science and Astronautics.

By Mr. CELLER:

H.R. 9676. A bill to amend section 4248 of title 18, United States Code, relating to the termination of custody of mentally incompetent prisoners; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COHELAN:

H.R. 9677. A bill to increase the authorized maximum expenditure for the fiscal years 1960 and 1961 under the special milk program for children; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. COLMER:

H.R. 9678. A bill to deem teachers in the State of Mississippi to be employees of such State for purposes of title II of the Social Security Act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DINGELL:

H.R. 9679. A bill to amend the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. DOYLE:

H.R. 9680. A bill authorizing the conveyance of certain property in the city of San Diego to the State of California; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. GRAY:

H.R. 9681. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to provide for the payment of pensions to veterans of World War I; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. HÉBERT:

H.R. 9682. A bill relating to the employment of retired commissioned officers by contractors of the Department of Defense and the Armed Forces and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. HERLONG (by request):

H.R. 9683. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to provide for the payment of pensions to veterans of World War I; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Wisconsin:

H.R. 9684. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide a more realistic definition of the term "disability" for purposes of entitlement to disability insurance benefits and disability freeze; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KING of California:

H.R. 9685. A bill to amend section 309(a)(1) of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KITCHIN:

H.R. 9686. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide a more realistic definition of the term "disability" for purposes of entitlement to disability insurance benefits and the disability freeze; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LIBONATI:

H.R. 9687. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide a more realistic definition of the term "disability" for purposes of entitlement to disability insurance benefits and disability freeze; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. McFALL:

H.R. 9688. A bill to increase the authorized maximum expenditure for the fiscal years 1960 and 1961 under the special milk program for children; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. McGOVERN:

H.R. 9689. A bill to establish a price-support level for milk and butterfat; to the Committee on Agriculture.

H.R. 9690. A bill to increase and extend the special milk program; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. McMILLAN:

H.R. 9691. A bill to create a Federal planning commission to conduct a study of the possible establishment in the District of Columbia of a national fisheries center; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MADDEN:

H.R. 9692. A bill to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act, to promote quality and price stabilization, to define and restrain certain unfair methods of distribution and to confirm and define the rights of producers and resellers in the distribution of goods identified by distinguishing brands, names, or trademarks, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mrs. MAY:

H.R. 9693. A bill to amend the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, as amended, to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to issue marketing orders with respect to certain processed fruits; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. CLEM MILLER:

H.R. 9694. A bill to increase the authorized maximum expenditure for the fiscal years 1960 and 1961 under the special milk program for children; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. MORRIS of New Mexico:

H.R. 9695. A bill to extend the veterans' home loan program to February 1, 1965; to provide for direct loans to veterans in areas where housing credit is otherwise not generally available; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. REUSS:

H.R. 9696. A bill to extend the conservation reserve program for 5 years, to limit annual payments under it to $5,000 for any one producer, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. RHODES of Arizona:

H.R. 9697. A bill to provide for the conveyance of certain real property of the United States to the city of Phoenix, Ariz.; to the Committee on Government Operations.

By Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania:

H.R. 9698. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide that a fully insured individual may qualify for the disability "freeze" and for disability insurance benefits, in certain cases, with 10 quarters of coverage; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SAUND:

H.R. 9699. A bill to increase the authorized maximum expenditure for the fiscal years 1960 and 1961 under the special milk program for children; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. SMITH of California:

H.R. 9700. A bill to provide that the coverage of religious science practitioners under the Federal old-age, survivors, and disability insurance system shall be on an elective basis; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TOLL:

H.R. 9701. A bill to provide for the installation of the 5-inch guns from the U.S.S. Colorado on board the former U.S.S. Olympia; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. VINSON:

H.R. 9702. A bill to amend section 2771 of title 10, United States Code, to authorize certain payments of deceased members' final accounts without the necessity of settlement by General Accounting Office; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. WIER:

H.R. 9703. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to provide for the payment of pensions to veterans of World War I; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. BAILEY:

H.R. 9704. A bill to authorize the establishment of a Youth Conservation Corps to provide healthful outdoor training and employment for young men and to advance the conservation, development, and management of national resources of timber, soil, and range, and of recreational areas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. FOLEY:

H.R. 9705. A bill to provide for investment of the civil service retirement and disability fund, for appropriations to such fund, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. GUBSER:

H.R. 9706. A bill authorizing the conveyance of certain property in the city of San Diego to the State of California; to the Committee on Armed Services.

H.R. 9707. A bill to amend title I of the Housing Act of 1949 to eliminate the existing requirement that a determination of need be made by the community involved before any hotel or other transient housing can be constructed in the redevelopment of an urban renewal area with assistance under such title; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming:

H.R. 9708. A bill to require an act of Congress for public land withdrawals in excess of 5,000 acres in the aggregate for any project or facility of any department or agency of the Government; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. DINGELL:

H.J. Res. 553. Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution of March 25, 1953, relating to electrical and mechanical office equipment for the use of Members, officers, and committees of the House of Representatives, to remove certain limitations; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina:

H.J. Res. 554. Joint resolution declaring Good Friday in each year to be a legal public holiday; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BENTLEY:

H. Con. Res. 455. Concurrent resolution to express the sense of Congress declaring the policy of the United States relative to the intervention of the international communistic movement in the Western Hemisphere; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mrs. CHURCH:

H. Con. Res. 456. Concurrent resolution expressing the concern and disapproval of Congress at the recent desecration of places of worship; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. EVERETT:

H. Con. Res. 457. Concurrent resolution to authorize printing as a House document a publication relating to the nomination and election of President and Vice President, including the manner of selecting delegates to national political conventions; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. RODINO:

H. Con. Res. 458. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SELDEN:

H. Con. Res. 459. Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that any variation in the traditional interpretation of the treaties between the United States and the Republic of Panama may only be made pursuant to treaty; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BUCKLEY:

H. Res. 421. Resolution to amend House Resolution 107, 86th Congress; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. POWELL:

H. Res. 422. Resolution extending greetings and sincere felicitations to the members and clergy of the African Methodist Episcopal Church on the occasion of the 200th anniversary of the birth of Bishop Richard Allen, the founder of the African Methodist Episcopal Church; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RAINS:

H. Res. 423. Resolution to provide additional funds for the expenses of the studies, investigations, and inquiries authorized by House Resolution 81; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. POWELL:

H. Res. 424. Resolution extending cordial good wishes and sincere felicitations on the occasion of the unveiling of a bust of Noble Sissle, a great American showman and musician; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BOSCH:

H.R. 9709. A bill for the relief of Giuseppe De Paulis; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BURDICK:

H.R. 9710. A bill for the relief of the surviving widow of Randolph Weum; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DOWNING:

H.R. 9711. A bill for the relief of Robert L. Stoermer; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 9712. A bill for the relief of Walter L. Brown; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DOYLE:

H.R. 9713. A bill for the relief of Joseph Andrew Wright; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McGOVERN:

H.R. 9714. A bill for the relief of Isabel Perez-Morales; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McDONOUGH:

H.R. 9715. A bill for the relief of Otis Drinkard; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CLEM MILLER:

H.R. 9716. A bill for the relief of Maria (Antonina) Kulisic; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NORBLAD:

H.R. 9717. A bill for the relief of Masako Ishiguro; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RIVERS of Alaska:

H.R. 9718. A bill providing for the award of the Congressional Medal of Honor to Dr. Thomas Dooley; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. ROONEY:

H.R. 9719. A bill for the relief of Calogera Virone Messina; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. UTT:

H.R. 9720. A bill for the relief of John J. Russell and Emma J. Russell; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Small Business Opinion Poll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a tabulation of opinion among small businessmen throughout the country and in New York State, submitted to me by the National Small Business Men's Association. This survey, conducted last summer, deals with five questions of great interest to the small businessman and to the Nation as a whole. It is of interest to note that percentagewise the small business community of New York State—numerically the largest in the United States—is in agreement on all five issues with the U.S. small business community. Each of us—whatever may be our views on each issue—can certainly be helped by this information.

I wish to compliment not only the National Small Business Men's Association for the splendid service they perform in keeeping the Congress informed of the currents of small business opinion—information vital to the effective execution of our legislative duties—but I would like to extend a special word of commendation to the small businessman himself, whose sense of responsible citizenship prompts him to take time out of a busy day to fill out his opinion ballot so that his views may be recorded and made known to us. The motto engraved on the front of each ballot reads: "Eternal Vigilance Is the Price of Liberty." I believe that the small businessman of this country is giving proof of his understanding of these words by his display of civic responsibility in recording his opinion.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

	National percentage			New York State percentage
	For	Against	No vote	For	Against	No vote
1. Faster tax writeoff for equipment and machinery	83	14	3	87	9	4
2. Ending farm subsidies	87	11	2	90	7	3
3. Fair trade laws	43	52	5	39	55	6
4. Government insurance to provide old folks' medical care	21	76	3	16	79	5
5. Tax-exempt pension plans for self-employed	67	30	3	61	32	7

Gas and Germ Warfare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply pleased last week that when the President of the United States was asked in his press conference what he thought of the use of gas or germ warfare, he replied that his own instincts would be against United States use of these agents unless they had first been employed against us.

The President also said that no official proposal had reached him to change the long-standing American policy, which is that only if they are used first by an enemy will the United States employ these agents. But it is clear, as a story in the New York Times of November 10, 1959, said and as a letter to me from the President indicates, that a reevaluation of the policy is taking place. The President's letter to me said that "the Defense Department is reviewing the status of this matter," that is, the use of chemical and biological weapons.

It seems to me that, despite the President's laudable personal view, it is necessary to have a formal national position on record, to stand beyond Mr. Eisenhower's term and to restrain the efforts of certain elements in the Defense Department to free gas and germ warfare to be used "like any other weapon." Last September, I therefore introduced House Concurrent Resolution 433, now before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, to reaffirm the statement of President Roosevelt in 1943 that "the United States shall under no circumstances resort to the use of biological weapons or the use of poisonous or obnoxious gases unless they are first used by our enemies."

I hope that the President's expression of his personal views will serve to stimulate the passage of House Concurrent Resolution 433, and I am pleased to say that there has been increasing public concern on this matter. For the information of the Congress, as to the President's view, I should like to insert at this point in the RECORD my correspondence with him and his statement at the press conference:

DECEMBER 21, 1959.
The Honorable DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER,
The President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I write in the wake of your journey for peace to ask you to restrain unpeaceful demands of the Army.

During the last several months, a public relations campaign has been waged in the press by present and retired armed service officers to change our basic policy of not using chemical and biological weapons.

From various newspaper accounts, it now appears that the Army and other groups within the Department of Defense have recommended, both officially and unofficially, that we change our policy concerning the use of chemical and biological weapons.

Many citizens and Members of Congress, including myself, are very disturbed about these recommendations. They negate our position as enunciated by President Roosevelt on June 8, 1943, when he stated that the United States under no circumstances would use poisonous or obnoxious gases unless first used by our enemies. The abhorrence of chemical and biological weapons stems from our basic belief that even in war we must preserve the essence of humanity and humane principles.

It strikes me as utter folly that we should accede to the judgment of certain members of the Defense Department, when it is now more important than ever that the United States continue to express itself as repudiating the use of chemical and biological weapons as a preventive or preemptive means of attack.

It is interesting to note that the Soviet Union has recently been taking the propaganda initiative regarding the use of CBR during wartime. At the end of August of this year, Premier Khrushchev stated in a message to a conference of leading scientists who met in Canada:

"We share the concern of scientists, who justly point out that the use of these weapons may have no less horrible a consequence than the use of atomic or hydrogen weapons. Not by chance were chemical and bacteriological weapons condemned by mankind, and their military use prohibited by international agreement through the Geneva protocol of 1925. As is well known the Soviet Union strongly supports the prohibition of all types of weapons of mass annihilation, including nuclear as well as chemical and biological weapons. We hold that their use runs counter to humane principles, the rules of international law, and the conscience of all peoples."

Conversely, it disturbs me that our Nation, which repudiates naked power politics, should consider sacrificing its unassailable position regarding chemical and biological weapons when the people of the world are hoping for a settlement on the armaments question.

While we may be constrained to develop these weapons qualitatively and quantitatively if international negotiation in the CBR area fails and if the realities of the situation demand that we continue to produce these weapons, we should not change our long-standing policy of not using these weapons first in any eventuality. We must reaffirm our resolve never to initiate the use of these weapons.

Because of this, and because of the urgency of the problem, I earnestly suggest international negotiations in the field of chemical and biological weapons. Although this question is one which will be very difficult to negotiate, this should not deter us from seeking both solution and negotiation in this area of armaments activity.

Because of the urgency of the problem, I have introduced in the Congress a concurrent resolution which will reaffirm our policy of nonuse of biological and chemical weapons unless they are first introduced into warfare against us. I sincerely hope that the American position will not be changed. Knowing of your interest in and admiring your efforts on behalf of world peace, I am sure that our policies will not be changed in this area.

Sincerely,
ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER,
Member of Congress.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., December 31, 1959.
The Honorable ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. KASTENMEIER: I appreciate the concern which prompted your December 21 letter concerning the use of chemical and biological weapons. The Defense Department is reviewing the status of this matter with particular reference to some of the new features mentioned in your letter. You will of course have a further reply as promptly as possible.

Sincerely,
DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

PRESIDENTIAL PRESS CONFERENCE, JANUARY 13, 1960

Ronald W. May, Capital Times, Madison, Wis.: "Mr. President, Representative KASTENMEIER, of Wisconsin, has suggested that there might be a change in our traditional policy of not using chemical, germ, or poison gas warfare first. He said that Army people have tried to—indicated that they believed that maybe we should change our policy and use these first either in a large or even in a small war. Is this true?"

Answer: "I will say this: No such official suggestion has been made to me and so far as my own instinct is concerned is to not start such a thing as that first."

Address by Hon. John F. Kennedy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM PROXMIRE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a great speech by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. This speech is highly significant because it sets forth the views of one of the leading candidates for the Presidency on his conception of the kind of President the Nation and the times demand.

I also ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that immediately following the Kennedy speech, there be printed in the RECORD a perceptive analysis of the significance of this speech by the chief of the New York Times Washington bureau, Mr. James Reston.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF SENATOR KENNEDY'S SPEECH

The modern presidential campaign covers every issue in and out of the platform from cranberries to creation. But the public is rarely alerted to a candidate's views about the central issue on which all the rest turn. That central issue—and the point of my comments this noon—is not the farm problem or defense or India. It is the Presidency itself.

Of course a candidate's views on specific policies are important, but Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft shared policy views with entirely different results in the White House. Of course it is important to elect a good man with good intentions, but Woodrow Wilson and Warren G. Harding were both good men of good intentions; so were Lincoln and Buchanan; but there is a Lincoln Room in the White House and no Buchanan Room.

The history of this Nation—its brightest and its bleakest pages—has been written largely in terms of the different views our Presidents have had of the Presidency itself. This history ought to tell us that the American people in 1960 have an imperative right to know what any man bidding for the Presidency thinks about the place he is bidding for, whether he is aware of and willing to use the powerful resources of that Office; whether his model will be Taft or Roosevelt, Wilson or Harding.

Not since the days of Woodrow Wilson has any candidate spoken on the Presidency itself before the votes have been irrevocably cast. Let us hope that the 1960 campaign, in addition to discussing the familiar issues where our positions too often blur, will also talk about the Presidency itself, as an instrument for dealing with those issues, as an Office with varying roles, powers, and limitations.

CRITICIZES EISENHOWER

During the past 8 years, we have seen one concept of the Presidency at work. Our needs and hopes have been eloquently stated—but the initiative and follow-through have too often been left to others. And too often his own objectives have been lost by the President's failure to override objections from within his own party, in the Congress or even in his Cabinet.

The American people in 1952 and 1956 may have preferred this detached, limited concept of the Presidency after 20 years of fast-moving, creative Presidential rule. Perhaps historians will regard this as necessarily one of those frequent periods of consolidation, a time to draw breath, to recoup our national energy. To quote the state of the Union message: "No Congress * * * on surveying the state of the Nation, has met with a more pleasing prospect than that which appears at the present time."

Unfortunately this is not Mr. Eisenhower's last message to the Congress, but Calvin Coolidge's. He followed to the White House Mr. Harding, whose sponsor declared very frankly that the times did not demand a first-rate President. If true, the times and the man met.

But the question is what do the times—and the people—demand for the next 4 years in the White House?

RULES OUT CASUAL BYSTANDER

They demand a vigorous proponent of the national interest—not a passive broker for conflicting private interests. They demand a man capable of acting as the commander in chief of the Grand Alliance, not merely a bookkeeper who feels that his work is done when the numbers on the balance sheet come out even. They demand that he be the head of a responsible party, not rise so far above politics as to be invisible—a man who will formulate and fight for legislative policies, not be a casual bystander to the legislative process.

Today a restricted concept of the Presidency is not enough. For beneath today's surface gloss of peace and prosperity are increasingly dangerous, unsolved, long-postponed problems—problems that will inevitably explode to the surface during the next 4 years of the next administration—the growing missile gap, the rise of Communist China, the despair of the underdeveloped nations, the explosive situations in Berlin and in the Formosa Straits, the deterioration of NATO, the lack of an arms control agreement, and all the domestic problems of our farms, cities, and schools.

This administration has not faced up to these and other problems. Much has been said—but I am reminded of the old Chinese proverb: "There is a great deal of noise on the stairs but nobody comes into the room."

The President's state of the Union message reminded me of the exhortation from "King Lear" but goes: "I will do such things—what they are I know not * * * but they shall be the wonders of the earth."

In the decade that lies ahead—in the challenging revolutionary sixties—the American Presidency will demand more than ringing manifestoes issued from the rear of the battle. It will demand that the President place himself in the very thick of the fight, that he care passionately about the fate of the people he leads, that he be willing to serve them at the risk of incurring their momentary displeasure.

AS CHIEF EXECUTIVE

Whatever the political affiliation of our next President, whatever his views may be on all the issues and problems that rush in upon us, he must above all be the Chief Executive in every sense of the word. He must be prepared to exercise the fullest powers of his Office—all that are specified and some that are not. He must master complex problems as well as receive one-page memorandums. He must originate action as well as study groups. He must reopen the channels of communication between the world of thought and the seat of power.

Ulysses Grant considered the President "a purely administrative officer." If he administered the Government departments efficiently, delegated his functions smoothly, and performed his ceremonies of state with decorum and grace, no more was to be expected of him. But that is not the place the Presidency was meant to have in American life. The President is alone, at the top—the loneliest job there is, as Harry Truman has said.

If there is destructive dissension among the services, he alone can step in and straighten it out—instead of waiting for unanimity. If administrative agencies are not carrying out their mandate—if a brushfire threatens some part of the globe—he alone can act, without waiting for the Congress. If his farm program fails, he alone deserves the blame, not his Secretary of Agriculture.

"The President is at liberty, both in law and conscience, to be as big a man as he can." So wrote Prof. Woodrow Wilson. But President Woodrow Wilson discovered that to be a big man in the White House inevitably brings cries of dictatorship.

So did Lincoln and Jackson and the two Roosevelts. And so may the next occupant of that office, if he is the man the times demand. But how much better it would be, in the turbulent sixties, to have a Roosevelt or a Wilson than to have another James Buchanan, cringing in the White House, afraid to move.

Nor can we afford a Chief Executive who is praised primarily for what he did not do, the disasters he prevented, the bills he vetoed—a President wishing his subordinates would produce more missiles or build more schools. We will need instead what the Constitution envisioned: a Chief Executive who is the vital center of action in our whole scheme of Government.

AS LEGISLATIVE LEADER

This includes the legislative process as well. The President cannot afford—for the sake of the Office as well as the Nation—to be another Warren G. Harding, described by one backer as a man who "would, when elected, sign whatever bill the Senate sent him—and not send bills for the Senate to pass." Rather he must know when to lead the Congress, when to consult it and when he should act alone.

Having served 14 years in the legislative branch, I would not look with favor upon its domination by the Executive. Under our government of "power as the rival of power," to use Hamilton's phrase, Congress must not surrender its responsibilities. But neither should it dominate. However large its share in the formulation of domestic programs, it is the President alone who must make the major decisions of our foreign policy.

That is what the Constitution wisely commands. And, even domestically, the President must initiate policies and devise laws to meet the needs of the Nation. And he must be prepared to use all the resources of his office to insure the enactment of that legislation—even when conflict is the result.

By the end of his term Theodore Roosevelt was not popular in the Congress—particularly when he criticized an amendment to the Treasury appropriation which forbade the use of Secret Service men to investigate Congressmen.

And the feeling was mutual, Roosevelt saying: "I do not much admire the Senate, because it is such a helpless body when efficient work is to be done."

QUOTES WILSON ON SENATE

And Woodrow Wilson was even more bitter after his frustrating quarrels. Asked if he might run for the Senate in 1920, he replied: "Outside of the United States, the Senate does not amount to a damn. And inside the United States the Senate is mostly despised. They haven't had a thought down there is 50 years."

But, however bitter their farewells, the facts of the matter are that Roosevelt and Wilson did get things done—not only through their Executive powers but through the Congress as well. Calvin Coolidge, on the other hand, departed from Washington with cheers of Congress still ringing in his ears. But when his World Court bill was under fire on Capitol Hill he sent no messages, gave no encouragement to the bill's leaders, and paid little or no attention to the whole proceeding—and the cause of world justice was set back.

To be sure, Coolidge had held the usual White House breakfasts with congressional leaders—but they were aimed, as he himself said, at "good fellowship," not a discussion of "public business." And at his press conferences, according to press historians, where he preferred to talk about the local flower show and its exhibits, reporters who finally extracted from him a single sentence—"I'm against that bill"—would rush to file tongue-in-cheek dispatches, proclaiming that: "President Coolidge, in a fighting mood, today served notice on Congress that he intended to combat, with all the resources at his command, the pending bill * * *"

But in the coming years we will need a real fighting mood in the White House—a man who will not retreat in the face of pressure from his congressional leaders—who will not let down those supporting his views on the floor. Divided Government over the past 6 years has only been further confused by this lack of legislative leadership. To restore it next year will help restore purpose to both the Presidency and the Congress.

AS PARTY LEADER

The facts of the matter are that legislative leadership is not possible without party leadership, in the most political sense—and Mr. Eisenhower prefers to stay above politics (although a weekly news magazine last fall reported the startling news, and I quote, that "President Eisenhower is emerging as a major political figure"). When asked, early in his first term, how he liked the "game of politics," he replied with a frown that his questioner was using a derogatory phrase. "Being President," he said, "is a very great experience * * * but the word 'politics' * * * I have no great liking for that."

But no President, it seems to me, can escape politics. He has not only been chosen by the Nation—he has been chosen by his party. And if he insists that he is "President of all the people" and should, therefore, offend none of them—if he blurs the issues and differences between the parties—if he neglects the party machinery and avoids his party's leadership—then he has not only weakened the political party as an instrument of the democratic process—he has dealt a blow to the democratic process itself.

I prefer the example of Abe Lincoln, who loved politics with the passion of a born practitioner. For example, he waited up all night in 1863 to get the crucial returns on the Ohio governorship. When the Unionist candidate was elected, Lincoln wired: "Glory God in the highest. Ohio has saved the Nation."

AS A MORAL LEADER

But the White House is not only the center of political leadership. It must be the center of moral leadership—a "bully pulpit," as Theodore Roosevelt described it. For only the President represents the national interest. And upon him alone converge all the needs and aspirations of all parts of the country, all departments of the Government, all nations of the world.

It is not enough merely to represent prevailing sentiment—to follow McKinley's practice, as described by Joe Cannon, of "keeping his ear so close to the ground he got it full of grasshoppers." We will need in the sixties a President who is willing and able to summon his national constituency to its finest hour—to alert the people to our dangers and our opportunities—to demand of them the sacrifices that will be necessary. Despite the increasing evidence of a lost national purpose and a soft national will, F.D.R.'s words in his first inaugural still ring true: "In every dark hour of our national life, a leadership of frankness and vigor has met with that understanding and support of the people themselves which is essential to victory."

Roosevelt fulfilled the role of moral leadership. So did Wilson and Lincoln, Truman and Jackson and Teddy Roosevelt. They led the people as well as the Government—they fought for great ideals as well as bills. And the time has come to demand that kind of leadership again.

And so, as this vital campaign begins, let us discuss the issues the next President will face—but let us also discuss the powers and tools with which we must face them.

For we must endow that office with extraordinary strength and vision. We must act in the image of Abraham Lincoln summoning his wartime Cabinet to a meeting on the Emancipation Proclamation. That Cabinet has been carefully chosen to please and reflect many elements in the country. But "I have gathered you together," Lincoln said, "to hear what I have written down. I do not wish your advice about the main matter—that I have determined for myself."

And later, when he went to sign after several hours of exhausting handshaking that had left his arm weak, he said to those present: "If my name goes down in history, it will be for this act. My whole soul is in it. If my hand trembles when I sign this proclamation, all who examine the document hereafter will say: 'He hesitated.'"

But Lincoln's hand did not tremble. He did not hesitate. He did not equivocate. For he was the President of the United States.

It is in this spirit that we must go forth in the coming months and years.

SENATOR'S DISCUSSION OF PRESIDENCY OPENS A PRIVATE DEBATE TO THE PUBLIC

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON, January 14.—There are really two quite different presidential debates going on in this country: a private debate and a public debate.

The public debate has dealt primarily with secondary issues. It has dealt with the past. It has centered on personalities. It has discussed Vice President NIXON's record in the forties. It has centered on Adlai E. Stevenson's two defeats, Senator John F. Kennedy's religion, Senator Lyndon B. Johnson's Texas heritage, President Eisenhower's popularity, Governor Rockefeller's wealth, and a variety of technicalities on the tactics and strategy of how to win.

The private debate has been much more limited but much more serious. It has looked to the future. It has inquired into the qualities necessary in a President of the sixties. It has dealt a great deal on the difference between what the public thinks is true about the present and what is actually true.

Fortunately, Senator KENNEDY made a genuine attempt today to bring these two debates together. In his performance at the National Press Club this noon, he made the first really serious political speech of the formal campaign.

For he dealt with the primary issue. He dealt with the future. He analyzed the Presidency as it is now being interpreted by President Eisenhower, and how he believes it must be interpreted in the future.

SCORNS SURFACE GLOSS

This was no attempt to ride the current popular waves of illusion. He was highly critical of the President in the full knowledge that the President is at the height of his personal popularity. He scorned today's surface gloss of peace and prosperity and insisted on emphasizing the increasingly dangerous, unsolved and long-postponed problems of the missile gap, the rise of Communist China, the despair of the underdeveloped nations, the explosive situations in Berlin and the Formosa Straits, the deterioration of NATO, the lack of arms control, and all the domestic problems of our farms, cities, and schools.

Honest men and women will differ and differ violently about the Senator's characterization of the President as a man who does not follow through on his own goals, as a bookkeeper who feels that his work is done when the numbers on the balance sheet come out even.

In the present mood of wishful thinking in the country, the Senator has taken a chance. But right or wrong, he has at least started to discuss serious issues in a major arena where they cannot be ignored or brushed off.

The President's news conference yesterday illustrates what the Senator is talking about. In that conference, the President made these statements:

On Vice President NIXON's intervention to settle the steel strike: "Any idea that there was threat or pressure brought to bear upon the companies is silly."

On the assertion of Sir Anthony Eden, former British Prime Minister, that he had stopped a U.S. plan to intervene in the Indochina war: "I do know this: that there was never any plan developed to be put into execution in that particular instance."

On the charges that the defenses of the United States are inadequate: "I want to tell you this: I've spent my life in this, and I know more about it than almost anybody, I think, that is in this country. * * * I believe that the matter of defense has been handled well and efficiently * * *."

CONVINCING TO MANY

Now, these statements dominated the news today. They were widely published, and no doubt they were convincing to most people who read them.

Yet it is a fact that there are a great many well-informed people in the Capital today who still believe that pressure was applied to the steel companies to settle, who know that there was a National Security Council debate, provoked by Adm. Arthur W. Radford's proposal to intervene with air power in the delta of Indochina in 1954, and who are still dissatisfied with the President's personal defense of the Nation's arms program.

For months the President's popularity has smothered the debate on defense. He has not satisfied many people even in his own administration by assertions of greater personal knowledge of modern defense requirements.

In short, the President has defeated his critics but has not convinced them. They have continued the private debate, but have been increasingly frustrated in the belief that the President was telling the public what it wanted to hear.

What Senator KENNEDY is at least attempting to do is to force these issues into the open. He is saying quite bluntly that the way to begin a presidential campaign is with a definition of what the Presidency should be in the coming years. And he is saying frankly that if the people want the kind of leadership President Eisenhower has given them, they better not choose the Senator from Massachusetts because he does not think this is what the country needs.

Maybe the people will take him up on this. That remains to be seen. But anyway he is bringing the private debate into the public domain, and that at least gives people a chance to make up their own minds.

Congressman Brock Lauds Truckers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DONALD F. McGINLEY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. McGINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Midwest provides the Nation with the finest meat to be found in the world, and it does it in great volume. This is no accident and is not the single accomplishment of any one group. It is a huge and efficient industry the effects of which are felt throughout the entire economy of the area.

One of the component parts of the livestock empire is a business that has in itself grown to be a strong and valuable industry. This is the livestock trucking industry.

I think the importance of this industry, made up of many big lines and small, independent truckers, is very well outlined in a speech made by my colleague from the Third District of Nebraska, LARRY BROCK, who spoke to the farm-to-market truckers at their 17th annual get-together of truckers and businessmen in Sioux City, Iowa, last month.

I commend to the attention of our colleagues the following address given by my good friend and colleague, LARRY BROCK:

The trucking industry has often been called the mainspring of the Nation's economy in recent years. Throughout the country the motor truck is the important link in the transportation of virtually all commodities, an estimated 75 percent of all tonnage moving daily in the Nation's commerce moving by this method. Although other means of transportation play an important role, their scope of operations is limited by peculiar facilities requirements. All of these methods of transport must be supplemented by the use of trucks for cargo to reach its ultimate destination. The motor truck is the only form of transportation available to more than 25,000 communities in the United States.

In absolute terms, no single transportation service has advanced so rapidly over the past 20 years. But it is significant that the greatest advances in truck transportation have been accomplished without the impetus of major technological breakthroughs which have so drastically changed the airline and water carriers, and even the railroad industries. Though vastly greater in size, trucking seems not to have changed much in character, being still a highly volatile, competitive industry.

The trucking industry has grown from a few thousand one-man one-vehicle operations to include 18,000 common carrier companies subject to ICC regulation; yet these comprise only one-quarter of the trucking industry, the other 75 percent consisting of private and contract carriers. Common carriers operate about 1.5 million of the approximately 11 million trucks on the highways. Some 800 class I carriers (those whose annual revenues exceed $1 million) were responsible for more than half the industry's earnings in 1957. An estimated 260,856 million ton-miles of intercity freight traffic moved by truck in 1957.

Freight hauled by trucks during the second quarter of 1959 rose 20.5 percent over the similar 1958 period with all geographic regions showing gains. The growth in trucking was particularly great in the central regions of the country where tonnages of truck-hauled freight increased 33.4 percent over a year ago.

The trucking industry is both young and dynamic and will continue to grow with the expanding national economy.

Gifts for National Debt Reduction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in the January 15 issue of the Washington Evening Star it was reported that a patriotic American, the late Mrs. W. L. (Will) Clayton, has bequeathed a sizable sum "to my beloved country, the United States of America, to be used for the retirement of the national debt." It does not detract from the splendid patriotism shown by Mrs. Clayton to point out that other Americans also feel deeply about the necessity of reducing our national debt and, from time to time, spontaneously come forward with gifts and bequests to reduce the national debt. On September 3, 1957, it was reported that the late Arthur E. Lamper bequeathed U.S. bonds valued at between $5,000 and $10,000 for this purpose. On May 8, 1957, the press carried the story of Miss Sheila M. Martin who gave $120 to Treasury Secretary Humphrey for national debt reduction. On March 5, 1959, it was reported that an 11-year-old Miami, Fla., girl, Kathy Hewitt, had offered her life savings of $61 to help pay off the national debt.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the Treasury tells me that under present law it cannot give absolute assurance that a gift or bequest for reducing the national debt will be devoted exclusively to that purpose. I have introduced a bill, H.R. 6292, which would make it possible to give such assurance. Once this legislation is enacted, it will be possible for a private organization to make concerted efforts to obtain debt reducing contributions from American citizens who feel that they would like to make special contributions to show their love for their country. If Mrs. Clayton and the others mentioned above will make such contributions spontaneously and without assurance that their gifts will be used to reduce the national debt, how many others will come forward with contributions if given that assurance?

The Need To Redefine Disability

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESTER R. JOHNSON
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. JOHNSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, our social security program is now on the eve of its 25th anniversary. During the almost a quarter of a century that the program has been in operation we have come a long way in securing the future of our workers and their families. But any program needs to be revised from time to time in order to strengthen the areas in which it is weak.

I feel that one of the parts of the social security program which needs to be reexamined and revised is the portion dealing with disability benefits. During the first session of the 86th Congress, I introduced a bill to eliminate the 50-year age requirement for the payment of disability benefits under social security. Today I am introducing a measure which would provide a more realistic definition of the term disability.

Under the rigid requirements of the present law, many thousands of men and women who are considered to be totally disabled by employers and by competent medical authorities still cannot secure disability benefits or qualify for the disability freeze of their incomes. For if such a person can perform any kind of work at all, no matter what it is or how far removed it may be from the type of work for which he is trained, then he is not disabled so far as social security is concerned.

Take, for instance, an accountant who has spent 40 years in that profession and who now is not physically able to continue in this field. If he still is able to sell apples in the street he does not qualify for disability benefits under social security.

This narrow definition of disability works a very real hardship on our senior citizens who no longer work on their regular jobs. Many of these people have no other skills. Employers are reluctant to train older people for new jobs that they would be able to perform. Unskilled jobs usually involve physical labor which is beyond the strength of the aging. As a result, these people suffer financial hardship and the humiliation of having to ask local welfare agencies for assistance.

As a woman from my home district in Wisconsin so ably put it:

> You have to be ready for the coffin before you can draw social security disability benefits.

The bill I have introduced would change the definition of disability in the present social security law to provide that an individual shall be considered unable to engage in any substantial gainful activity if he is unable, by reason of his physical or mental impairment, to engage in the occupation or employment last performed by him on a regular basis before he became disabled.

In other words, when a person is disabled to the point where he no longer can do the job for which he has been trained and in which he has been working for years, then he will be eligible for social security disability benefits or the disability freeze.

We cannot turn our backs on our responsibility to this country's senior citizens. When President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed the original Social Security Act, he called it "a cornerstone in a structure which is being built but is by no means complete." It is up to us to see that the resulting structure is worthy of its fine foundation.

Senator Green To Retire

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, it was with mixed emotions that I received the announcement that Senator GREEN would not seek reelection.

The Honorable THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, now in his 93d year, is the senior Senator from Rhode Island, and has been in the Senate since January 1937. He has the distinction of being the oldest man ever to serve in Congress.

I am saddened at the thought that such a great statesman and so excellent a representative of our State will not be with us in the Halls of Congress after this session.

I am happy, however, at the thought that after so many years of arduous service as Governor of our State and as one of our U.S. Senators he will have an opportunity to relax and take life easy.

We will miss his sage counsel and advice in the Halls of Congress but I am confident that while he will withdraw from active service he will continue his keen interest in politics and will be available to us whenever we call on him.

His leaving active political life will leave a void that will be hard to fill. His long experience in public affairs, both foreign and domestic, has been invaluable to our State and country, both under Republican as well as Democratic administrations.

About a year ago Senator GREEN gave us an example of his greatness, of his patriotism, and of his love for America. He did what few, if any, Members of Congress have ever done—step down voluntarily from the chairmanship of a great committee.

He relinquished the chairmanship of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee because he felt that his impaired sight and hearing made it impossible for him to discharge the duties of that high office as he felt it should be done.

He now informs us that medical attention has remedied the condition although it has not done so to a degree sufficient to permit him to discharge his congressional duties as he feels should be done and, therefore, has decided not to seek reelection.

I have known Senator GREEN intimately for more than a quarter century. I served under him while he was Governor of our State and we were both elected to Congress for the first time, on the same ticket, in 1936, he to the Senate and I to the House. I cherish the fact that he has been my friend, and I am thankful for his wide counsel.

He is a man of wealth with a heart of gold. Although endowed with this world's goods he has always taken a keen interest in those less fortunate than himself.

He was one of the first to sponsor cafeterias for workers in plants, and one of the originators of a banking system that made loans to needy people.

He always has taken a great interest in education and made possible the education of a number of youngsters who, without him, never would have been able to attend college.

He has devoted himself to the care of the unfortunates and during his service as Governor of our State he rehabilitated and expanded the facilities at our State institutions. The new and up-to-date buildings that he sponsored there is a monument to his humanitarianism.

This is only a minor part of what could be said of this great man.

Is it any wonder, then, that the leaders and Members of the Senate, and, particularly the members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, should have tried to prevail on Senator GREEN to continue as chairman, and paid such high tribute to him when he announced that he would retire? They know of his devotion to duty and his unrelenting efforts in the interest of our country.

In his retirement I wish him health and happiness. He can well rejoice at his many accomplishments for the benefit of humanity and I am sure he will take with him many fine memories that will help him in his retirement.

We of Rhode Island salute Senator GREEN. We love him.

Gordon Canfield Retires and the District Loses a "Champ"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CORNELIUS E. GALLAGHER
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I share in the regrets which have been echoed by Members of Congress upon learning that the dean of New Jersey's delegation, GORDON CANFIELD, is to retire after a long and dedicated service to the people of New Jersey and to the country. I would like to include as part of my remarks the following editorial from the Paterson News of December 16, 1959, and the following letter which I have written to the editor of the Paterson News:

GORDON CANFIELD RETIRES AND THE DISTRICT LOSES A "CHAMP"

Things won't be the same in Passaic County politics from here on in—at least in the even years of congressional elections.

GORDON CANFIELD has been the Congressman from this Eighth District through a generation and only the youngish oldtimer will be able to recall that it was his "boss," the late George N. Seger, who was his predecessor. That was 20 years ago.

Thus for well nigh two decades CANFIELD has served us in Washington, and as a public servant and as a Republican candidate every 2 years, he was a veritable champion. In the Republican heydays and in the lean years when the magic name of Franklin D. Roosevelt was cutting down Republicans, the people remembered GORDON CANFIELD'S beneficences and he was always top man on his ticket. Some good candidates fell by the wayside before the Canfield juggernaut.

The answer was Congressman CANFIELD'S dedicated service, and in truth, it was this around-the-clock devotion which has finally determined him to retire from the political wars. To have continued in the only way he knows how to campaign or to serve in office might have permanently impaired his health.

So who can quarrel with his decision not to run again in spite of the void he will leave and the heart tug his decision to retire inspires? He has certainly earned the right to call it a day as a candidate after 37 years in Washington.

What was the secret of Congressman CANFIELD'S unmatched success? It was being with and for people. It could just as well have been coined in his name when it was said that to have a friend one must be a friend.

Just a few years ago, an overexuberant Democratic candidate, seeking to probe the CANFIELD success secret, came up with the bombastic charge that all the Congressman had to offer was his friendship for the little man. That did it, touched off such an atomic indignation among the rank and file of the voters that the ingenious candidate was snowed under.

The "little man" was there at the polls to vote for his friend. It has always been so—no letter unanswered, no opportunity for service ignored. Thousands knew his friendly intercession, his always solicitous concern for the people of his district.

During World War II, Congressman CANFIELD became restive at home. So he shipped aboard a freighter, made the rounds of the camps where his hometown boys were serving, comforted them, brought messages back to anxious loved ones. He braved the dangers of the sea, walked in the historical London blitz, was horrified at the Nazi slaughterhouse in Buchenwald. Here was one man who knew firsthand what he talked about to his people, and they believed in him.

In Congress, Mr. CANFIELD stood up and was counted. He was one of the first to warn of the threat of communism, because he had seen its creeping infection spreading when he was in Europe. He fought for proper defenses, for recognition of missile preparedness. He alone of all Republican candidates was endorsed by labor, which constantly was on the Democratic side.

But he was no rubberstamp for any man or any cause. He had courage.

And so when GORDON CANFIELD decides now he cannot rally the strength of another vigorous campaign with all its exactions, when he feels he would like to nestle home with his faithful family and rest a bit on the laurels he has earned, who among us will say him "Nay"?

The Eighth District yields him to the inexorability of time only in Congress.

There will be other opportunities for service for this man of decency, integrity, and dedication.

Meantime, all people of good will, regardless of politics, will wish him well as he begins his final year of service in Congress, and among these the News is happy to be counted as delighted that through all his years of matchless service we were his stanch and unremitting supporters.

Of him it will be said with truth: "Well done thou true and faithful servant."

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 7, 1960.

Mr. HARRY B. HAINES,
Editor, the Paterson News,
Paterson, N.J.

DEAR MR. HAINES: I wish to applaud your fine editorial on the retirement of GORDON CANFIELD. He is a man for whom it is really difficult to find words adequate for the praise he deserves. You touched the core of the man when you said it was dedicated service. But there is more—for he possessed a sincerity which transcended everything else he did. He extended this sincere desire to help to all men regardless of politics. He believed that the Congress of the United States was deserving of the best effort of the men elected to serve in that body and that this best effort should not be dependent on any political label.

I am sure that some people feel that politics preclude praising men of the opposite party, but as a newly elected Democrat to the Congress, I can say without hesitation that no one was more inspirational to me than the dean of our delegation—GORDON CANFIELD.

He made a great contribution to the United States for no man in Congress was more dedicated, more conscientious or more aware of his responsibility.

I, as well as my colleagues I am sure, will miss him greatly. I join with all of his many friends and admirers in heartily endorsing the wonderful words you expressed in your paper. I hope that in the years to come he will enjoy the good health and happy life he so richly deserves.

With my best wishes.

Sincerely,

CORNELIUS E. GALLAGHER,
Member of Congress.

Dumping of Atomic Waste Into the Waters of the Gulf of Mexico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN YOUNG
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to call to the attention of the House of Representatives a most serious and hazardous proposal now under consideration by the Atomic Energy Commission which may have far-reaching and injurious effects on every American citizen now alive and on generations to come.

On January 13, 1958, a private industrial company, the Industrial Waste Disposal Corp., of Houston, Tex., filed application with the Atomic Energy Commission for a license authorizing this company to receive, package and dispose of certain radioactive waste materials by placing this radioactive material in cement containers and dumping them in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico. On December 5, 1958, the Atomic Energy Commission published in the Federal Register a "Notice of Proposed Issuance of Byproduct Material License to the Industrial Waste Disposal Corp.," which would authorize the disposal of this radioactive waste in this manner. The notice stated that the license would be issued unless formal hearing was requested.

Immediate public interest was expressed in this matter and various municipalities and groups demanded a hearing. The State of Texas also requested a hearing. Hearings were held in Houston on January 22, 1959. After these hearings, the AEC issued an intermediate decision the effect of which was to approve the dumping license of the disposal company. An appeal to the full Commission was taken by interested parties, and final hearings are set here in Washington on January 20, 1960.

I most firmly believe, and I think a majority of the Members of this body will feel as I do, that the dumping of atomic waste into waters of the oceans touching our shores poses a possibility of a serious hazard to the health and well-being of our citizens. At best, the evidence introduced by the AEC at previous hearings was speculative and conjectural. I believe the U.S. Congress would be derelict in its duty to the people of this country if we stand idly by and allow without protest a branch of the Federal Government to engage in a practice which may have far-reaching ill effects upon the health of the citizens. I most seriously object to the approval of this disposal license by the Atomic Energy Commission until such time as it has been established beyond any doubt that the dumping of this atomic material in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico will not be harmful to human life or marine life in the disposal area.

I feel, likewise, that it should be definitely determined at this time to what extent this disposal program will be accelerated or expanded in future operations for the disposal of atomic waste. I understand it has been the experience of other waste disposal areas, both in Europe and off the shores of this country, where dumping and disposal operations have been inaugurated, that these dumping operations tend to expand and increase to the point where the number of curies contained in the original operation may be infinitesimal as compared to the vastly increased number of curies contained in the cumulated subsequent dumping operations.

This is not an isolated matter, pertaining to the citizens of the States bordering the Gulf of Mexico alone. I have in my files a list of proposed dumping grounds running the full length of the Atlantic seaboard, around the Florida coast, and the entire Gulf of Mexico. Thus, today we are concerned with one dumping operation in the Gulf of Mexico, tomorrow and in future years, if we open the door for this proposed plan, we may be faced with radioactive waters lapping our shores from Maine to Texas, and from Oregon to California. This would indeed be a Frankenstein monster which we might not be able to control or rectify.

This problem not only has national significance, but has now become a matter touching on our relations with our neighbor to the South. About a month ago the Government of the Republic of Mexico, acting through channels, protested to our Department of State the dumping of this atomic waste in Gulf of Mexico waters. In a letter dated November 18, 1959, to the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, Mr. Rubottom, Assistant Secretary of State, advised the AEC that the Mexican Government is making formal protest to this proposed action by a branch of the U.S. Government. In his letter of protest to the Atomic Energy Commission, Mr. Rubottom states:

> From the note of the Mexican Embassy it may be inferred that the Mexican Government believes disposal of radioactive wastes so close to its shores would be interpreted in Mexico as a unilateral and arbitrary act on the part of the United States, adverse results from which would present virtually identical hazards to the residents of the two countries. Our Embassy at Mexico City concurs in the Department's view that Mexico's reaction to the granting of the license would be uniformly adverse and would cause harm to our relations with Mexico, regardless of any explanations that might be given. Furthermore, it would be difficult to explain why the United States unilaterally and without the concurrence of Mexico selected a site for disposal of radioactive wastes in an area approximately 180 miles from the shores of both countries, particularly as so little can be known with certainty in Mexico regarding the possible adverse effects oceanic waste disposal might have over a long period of time.

Mr. Speaker, I share the concern of the Government of Mexico for the future health and well-being of its citizens, and it appears to me that the U.S. Congress might do well to follow the example set us by the Republic of Mexico and express a similar concern for the people of our own country whose lives and health are endangered by this proposed action on the part of one of our Federal agencies.

Lead and Zinc Miners Still Seek Justice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ED EDMONDSON
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, the lead and zinc miners of the United States are still looking to Washington for justice.

Last week, the Tariff Commission began its third series of hearings in 7 years into the unquestionable distress and injury of our domestic lead and zinc producers.

Another strong showing was made that hundreds of American mines are still shut down, and thousands of American miners are still unemployed, as a result of recordbreaking foreign imports of lead and zinc.

There can be no serious question of the fact that quotas imposed by the administration in October of 1958 are not doing the job of reopening our shutdown mines and restoring the vitality and prosperity of our domestic lead and zinc producers.

From coast to coast, the evidence points in the other direction: the quotas have failed in their purpose, and must be strengthened or supplemented by other measures.

One of the splendid statements made on this point before the Tariff Commission was made by my distinguished colleague from Idaho, the Honorable GRACIE PFOST, who testified on January 12, 1960.

Mrs. PFOST, who has been one of the finest champions of the domestic miner in this body throughout her period of service, called for prompt and fair conclusions by the Tariff Commission.

The complete text of Mrs. PFOST's statement follows:

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSWOMAN GRACIE PFOST BEFORE THE U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION ON INVESTIGATION OF THE DOMESTIC LEAD AND ZINC INDUSTRY, JANUARY 12, 1960

Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission, I appreciate the opportunity to appear here today.

As a Representative of a congressional district in Idaho which is a heavy producer of lead and zinc, and as a member of the House Subcommittee on Mines and Mining, I am especially interested in this investigation by the Tariff Commission.

I understand Mr. Charles E. Schwab, of Kellogg, Idaho, who was until recently executive secretary of the Emergency Lead and Zinc Producers Committee in Washington, D.C., will appear later during these hearings and will give a very comprehensive picture as the situation exists in the lead-zinc field.

He did a tremendous job in coordinating the presentations made in behalf of industry before this Commission and the Congress. Mr. Schwab has recently been appointed superintendent of operations of the Bunker Hill Co. in north Idaho, and while he will be missed here, we are glad to have him home again where he will continue working toward a solution to our problem.

First, I want to express my appreciation to the Commission which has been tremendously helpful in making an objective analysis and the unanimous findings of serious injury in 1954 and 1958. These findings have laid the foundation for this hearing, and for your report to the Congress which I hope will be coming shortly.

This investigation, pursuant to Senate Resolution 162, and passed by the 86th Congress, deals with the full range of lead and zinc products, whether manufactured or unmanufactured. The investigation is timely in view of the clearly adverse effect imported ores and products have upon the depressed lead and zinc mining industry in Idaho and other mining States.

In my judgment, even with quotas operating throughout the entire year, no lead-zinc producer operated at a profit in 1959. In Idaho, the lead-zinc picture has progressively deteriorated since January 1, 1952, the date selected as the base point by the Tariff Commission for its first unanimous finding of injury (May 1954).

In the great Coeur d'Alene mining district in my State, one complete section known as the Pine Creek area, has only one mine working today, where seven mines previously operated.

Underground employment has declined 40 percent in the Coeur d'Alenes during this period and practically all of the moderate and small-size producers have been forced out of business. An estimated 2,000 workers have lost their jobs.

You have only to examine the annual financial reports of those mines still operating to see that the steady and excessive influx of metal imports continues its devastating and fatal impact upon this area.

It has been conservatively estimated that committees, school districts, counties, and State tax revenues during these 7 years have declined about $5 million a year in the Coeur d'Alenes, as the mines have closed down. Let me point out too, that the shutdowns do not eliminate the cost of maintaining the mines to prevent serious damage and to protect investments. Large expenditures are needed for pumping, retimbering, and other upkeep to forestall mine flooding and cave-ins.

The citizens of the mining areas in Idaho have had faith that the mining problem will be corrected. They have gone forward with building a new hospital, a new school, and other community projects. The Commission has the opportunity now, because of prior decisions to recommend an answer which will again provide a healthy economic climate in ours and other domestic mining areas.

The need for relief to the domestic mining industry in general has been abundantly established by hearings held last year before the Subcommittee on Mines and Mining on House Concurrent Resolution 177. I commend to the attention of the members of this Commission the record of these hearings and the committee's report, House Report No. 708.

The hearings contain statements by 21 Members of the House, 2 State Governors, and 67 other persons. All that these people ask is that the domestic mining industry be allowed to maintain itself in a sound and healthy condition. Such a condition is essential to the wise use of natural resources and the long-range growth and defense of the country.

The domestic industry is entitled to a fair share of the domestic market where economically feasible. The economic feasibility of domestic lead and zinc mining to supply a substantial share of the domestic market has long been established.

The mineral output of the United States in 1959 did not follow the upturn in economic activity. The total value of all minerals, including fuels, was less in 1959 than in 1957. Low metal prices and other factors dropped domestic mine output of lead to 251,000 short tons, the smallest since 1900. Mine output of zinc in 1959 was no higher than in 1958, despite the quota established in October of 1958. The combined price of lead and zinc metals is at present not materially higher than immediately after the imposition of the quotas, and is substantially below the level indicated by domestic mining interests as essential for restoration of production.

Perhaps the most disturbing element in this situation is the severe decline in employment for mining workers. Our so-called magnanimous foreign policy has backfired on U.S. workers.

American know-how has gone abroad. Now cheap foreign labor and the newest machinery installed in foreign lands is causing an invasion of our own shores.

It would be one thing if this invasion had come about gradually through the free enterprise of individuals and firms. Then our domestic firms and workers could have made normal readjustments. But the Government itself has directly stimulated the situation through loans, grants, barter, technical assistance and otherwise in foreign lands.

National policy requires that domestic production at least be reasonably protected from undue hardships arising from the Government's own actions in the economic sphere.

The folly of counting unduly on foreign sources of essential raw materials has been demonstrated once again in the new export taxes on minerals and related measures taken by the Cuban Government of Fidel Castro. The policy of the Congress, expressed in House Concurrent Resolution 177 and numerous earlier measures, is to avoid critical dependence upon foreign sources. It is essential to maintain a sound and stable domestic mining and minerals industry.

The law as it now stands delegates control over tariffs to the executive branch acting on the basis of investigations of the Tariff Commission. It has been urged that Congress should reestablish and exercise direct control over tariffs. In the meanwhile, the existing process should be effectively employed.

Time is of the essence in the Commission's current lead and zinc study. Undue delay in making the report would compound the current injury and might impede the consideration of related measures by Congress.

I urge that the Commission give its close and speedy attention to the testimony presented in this hearing, so that prompt and fair conclusions and recommendations may be made.

Some Suggestions for a Farm Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED SCHWENGEL
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. SCHWENGEL. Mr. Speaker, when I was in the district this fall, I talked to as many farmers as I could in order to bring back a cross section of ideas which might improve some of the inequities in the farm program.

In many instances, I asked the farmers to whom I talked, to set their ideas down on paper so that I could make them known to Congress.

Mr. Emery Hemingway, Rural Route No. 5, Iowa City, Iowa, a long-time friend and a successful Johnson County farmer, is one of the first to outline the basic ideas which he feels will improve the farm program.

In presenting these suggestions to the Members, I do not make a wholesale endorsement of all of the ideas, but offer them for consideration with the hope that there may be some proposals here which can be incorporated into farm legislation and improve conditions, not only for Midwest farmers, but for the entire farm economy.

Mr. Hemingway's proposal follows:

Any farm program must have at least three goals:

First. Full parity for agriculture.

Second. Be fair and equitable between producers, and protect the smaller family farm from being taken over by the larger farms.

Third. Promote good soil conservation.

Historic bases are erroneous and unfair between producers and we must have a sound base to start from such as the crop acres in the farm.

Some suggestions for a long-time farm program are, first, applying flexible price supports to soil conservation; or second, the higher the soil-depleting crops to the crop acres in the farm the lower the price supports; and third, let the farmer decide at what percent of parity he wants his crops supported, or not at all.

In the old AAA farm program the number of crop acres in every farm were recorded.

Now, let us have this sound, fair, base to work from and apply flexible price supports to a soil-conservation program in about these percents:

First. The farmer who keeps his intertilled crops-soil depleting crops under 30 percent of his crop acres the Government gives him a price support of full parity.

Second. The farmer who plants between 30 and 35 percent of his crop acres in soil-depleting crops the Government gives him a price support of 90 percent of parity.

Third. Between 35 and 40 percent—80 percent of parity.

Fourth. Between 40 and 45 percent—70 percent of parity.

Then if you want to go further than that, classify the farms according to their capabilities and let the higher capability farms have a higher soil-depleting base, or crop base, than the lower capability farms.

No producer should be able to turn all of his crop over to the Government to market in any one year.

The Government should only handle surpluses and not become the marketing agency for a producer's whole crop.

A better way would be to use the sound base we started with—crop acres in the farm—and let the farmer deliver up to 10 bushels to the acre times the crop acres in the farm as a limit.

What we need are longer crop rotations on a lot of farms that have been causing the surplus trouble.

By longer crop rotations some of us have held down our feed grain crops and built a soil fertility bank at our own expense, but the farmer who has been over-producing feed grain crops has destroyed the price and we are penalized for practicing soil conservation.

The soil-bank program has some good features, but in most cases only rewards the producer who has been causing the most trouble by over-cropping his land, and puts all his poor land in the soil bank and lets the Government pay him to build it up again.

If we do not apply flexible price supports to a soil conservation program then we must set a crop base using the crop acres in the farms to start from, and have this base include cotton as well as the feed grains—corn, sorghums, and beans—and the farmer keep the production of all these crops under this base or no supports.

This would bring about cross-compliance on these crops.

Wheat has its own program and there should be some regulation so the wheat producer, if he keeps under his acreage for price supports, he cannot put in other crops that will help defeat the other programs.

Rice, peanuts and tobacco have more or less a program of their own. We should have found out before this that no program will work without some cross-compliance.

A farm program of price supports and acreage controls, two price systems or commodity by commodity approach, will work if you put regulations and controls on the right producers in the right way at the right time, but none of them will work without these controls.

Not enough farmers will self-discipline themselves to make any voluntary program work.

This is the legislation that needs to be enacted right now.

Now, that Congress and the Department of Agriculture apparently have done nothing to keep production in line with market demand without building up huge abnormal surpluses of feed grains, and are creating an over production of live stock, the farmer is producing at an average of around 78 percent of parity. He is not getting his rightful share of the national income and the livestock producer is entitled to some consideration.

The sheep men have their subsidy program.

The hog producer should have a program in which the Government pays a subsidy between the market price and $21 for No. 1 hogs, market price; $20 for No. 2 hogs, market price; and $19 for No. 3 hogs and only on hogs weighing between 190 pounds and 240 pounds. This is to be based on 400 pounds to the crop acres in the farm up to 75 crop acres or 30,000 pounds as a limit to any one regular farmer producer.

Do the same for the cattle feeder. Pay him a subsidy between the market price and $32 for prime cattle market price; $30 for choice, market price; and $28 for good grade. The same to be paid on 400 pounds to the acre times the crop acres in the farm up to 75 acres and 30,000 pounds limit. No subsidy paid on cattle weighing over 1,250 pounds.

Education—Investment in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN BRADEMAS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD the text of an address I was privileged to deliver at the seventh annual National Conference on Federal Legislation of the National Education Association in Washington, D.C., on December 11, 1959.

The text of the address follows:

EDUCATION—INVESTMENT IN AMERICA

I am delighted to have the opportunity to take part in the seventh annual National Conference on Federal Legislation of the National Education Association.

ROBERT WYATT OF INDIANA STATE TEACHERS ASSOCIATION PRAISED

It is a particular pleasure for me to be introduced by Robert Wyatt, executive secretary of the Indiana State Teachers Association. I think it is fair to say that Bob Wyatt has done more than any other man in recent years to win greater public support for education in Indiana.

I am glad, too, to be able to talk with leaders of the NEA. I come from a family of teachers, and my mother, who started teaching in a one-room country schoolhouse in Indiana and is still teaching school today, is a life member of the NEA as was my late grandfather, who was a teacher for many years in central Indiana.

During my first year in Congress, I have been deeply impressed by the splendid leadership which the NEA as a national organization and your representatives here in Washington have given to the cause of education. This conference is a first-class example of the continuing dedication of the NEA to lifting the level of education in America.

One of the reasons I have so much enjoyed my first year in Congress was my good fortune in being named to the General Education Subcommittee of the House Education and Labor Committee and thereby having the high privilege of serving with men like CLEVELAND BAILEY, FRANK THOMPSON, and STEWART UDALL and coming to know a person like LEE METCALF—all men who are deeply devoted to education and all unquestionably among the ablest Members of Congress.

My brief experience on the committee has only reaffirmed my conviction that, as Adlai Stevenson once said, "Our children's needs—the needs of education—have first priority over all other civilian needs."

Today we have more discussion of education, its purposes, its methods, and its facilities than we have seen for many years in this country.

SOVIET GAINS SPARK NEW LOOK AT U.S. EDUCATION

It is unfortunately true that the American people have been jarred into this reassessment not by any apocalyptic vision but by the sudden impact of the technological achievements of the Soviet Union.

We had until recent months been living under what Prof. Denis Brogan of Cambridge University describes as "the illusion of American omnipotence." Our reaction to the symbol of sputnik is represented by the fact that in order to pass an education bill, we had to call it the National Defense Education Act.

Yet Soviet competition should not be the only, nor indeed, the most important cause for our taking a new look at American education. It was Chet Huntley who said last year, "If tomorrow Russia became a pro-Western, two-party democracy, and international communism disappeared from the face of the earth, we should still need more engineers than we have, and many more poets."

STUDENTS MUST LEARN IMPORTANCE OF HARD WORK

Let me suggest that there are two major areas in education today to which we should give our concern.

First is the problem of quality. What are we turning out in our schools and universities?

A late president of Princeton once remarked, "Madame, we guarantee results or we return the boy."

For those of you whose chief responsibility is public education, there is no such simple solution to the problem of the student from whom no results can be guaranteed.

With respect to this first problem in education, I should like to say only this: in our pursuit of equality of opportunity for education, we must give far more attention to the element of quality of education. We must insist in the education of our young people on the central importance of hard work, on the futility of the search for shortcuts.

Let me give you the answer that Soren Kierkegaard, the 19th century Danish theologian, gave to the question, "What is education?"

He said, "I should suppose that education was the curriculum one had to run through in order to catch up with oneself, and he who will not pass through this curriculum is helped very little by the fact that he was born in the most enlightened age."

AMERICA HAS SHORTAGE OF CLASSROOMS AND TEACHERS

My chief concern this evening, however, is not with the problem of quality but rather with a problem with which Members of Congress can deal more directly—the resources education has for doing its job.

The simple facts are these:

We have in America a continuing shortage of buildings.

We have in America a continuing shortage of qualified teachers.

The result of these shortages is a serious crisis in meeting the Nation's needs in education. And if the crisis is with us today, consider the fact that within the next 20 years the present school-age population of this country will have increased by 60 percent.

Last August, Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Arthur Flemming declared that "the number of pupils whose education is being impaired by the classroom shortage is about 10 million."

On October 14 of this year, the Secretary spoke of a shortage of between 130,000 and 140,000 classrooms. Yet he warned that the latest figures on school-bond sales—which showed a drop of fully 20 percent during the most recent 12-month period from the preceding 12 months—indicated that "marked declines in school construction are to be expected."

The State superintendent of public instruction in Indiana said this year that my State was short 3,000 classrooms.

There is widespread agreement then, that we need more school buildings in this country.

There is, however, another serious deficiency in our resources for education. We do not have enough qualified teachers. At the beginning of the 1958 fall term, our school systems were employing 92,300 full-time teachers with substandard qualifications.

INADEQUATE SALARIES A MAJOR CAUSE OF TEACHER SHORTAGE

Study after study has provided evidence of this shortfall, and study after study has pointed to inadequate teachers' salaries as a major cause of the trouble.

President Eisenhower himself, in speaking of "the importance of raising the standing of our teachers in their communities," said, "Higher salaries are a first requirement."

The president of the National Science Teachers Association blames low pay as a key reason for the lack of qualified science teachers.

The Rockefeller Bros. Fund Report on U.S. Educational Needs declares, "the root problem of the teaching profession remains financial. Salaries must be raised immediately and substantially."

And I am sure you are all familiar with Secretary Flemming's contention that doubling teachers' salaries in the next decade is a reasonable national goal.

It is clear then that we are not investing enough money in education, either in my home State of Indiana or in the Nation, either in classrooms or in teachers' salaries.

I use the phrase "investing in education" advisedly. In the American language, to "spend" suggests using up scarce resources—a wasteful and profligate notion. To "invest" however, suggests that dividends will be forthcoming—a wise and prudent course to follow.

INVESTMENT IN EDUCATION PAYS DIVIDENDS

Of perhaps no other area in our national life can the concept of "investment" more accurately be used than education. Some 10 years ago, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce published a book entitled, "Education, an Investment in People." The study showed dramatically that those States and communities in America which had the best educational systems had the highest levels of real income as well. The chamber of commerce survey showed that it paid, in dollars and cents, to invest in education. It was good business to put money into schoolrooms and teachers' salaries.

Again, let's look at my State of Indiana. Are we investing enough money in education there? The apostles of States rights piously tell us that there is no need for Federal support for education, because, they blandly assure us, the States can do the job.

The State of Indiana ranks 15th in the Nation in per capita income. If the States-righters were doing their job, Indiana would logically be 15th in the Nation in per pupil expenditures for public education. But we are 31st.

Indiana provides from State sources some 30 percent of public school expenditures as against a national average of 40 percent—so that we rank 32d in the Nation in this respect.

HOOSIER GOP POLITICIANS SHORTCHANGE EDUCATION

These facts are telling evidence of the intellectual dishonesty of those who argue that the States are meeting their responsibilities, and I remind you that there are few politicians in America who preach the States rights doctrine more but practice it less than Gov. Harold Handley and his political godfather, ex-Senator William E. Jenner.

At a recent subcommittee hearing, I asked the legislative representativee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which opposed the Murray-Metcalf bill on grounds that education was a job for the States and local communities, to provide me with a summary showing how State chambers of commerce across the Nation were leading the fight in their respective States for more money for education.

I am still waiting for that summary, not, I may say, breathlessly.

In Indiana, moreover, our State constitution limits the bonding power of school districts to 2 percent of their assessed valuation, a limitation which has forced schools to turn from general obligation bonds, ranging from 1½ to 2½ percent interest, to the transparent device of setting up holding corporations and issuing revenue bonds at 4 to 5 percent interest. How do you like that for sound, businesslike fiscal responsibility? How's that as an example of deep concern for the taxpayer's dollar?

PROPERTY TAX INCREASE NOT THE ANSWER

There may still be a few persons who contend that the way to raise more money for education is to raise the property tax. To understate the case, this is not an exceedingly popular approach in my part of the country, and any Republican who wants to run against me on a "let's raise the property tax" platform will be a more than welcome opponent.

We simply cannot get much more blood out of the property tax turnip.

The several considerations I have suggested with respect to financing education in Indiana and the Nation were among those which led the House Education and Labor Committee this year to report favorably H.R. 22, the Murray-Metcalf bill, a bill which now languishes in the House Rules Committee, another victim of the continuing Republican-Dixiecrat effort to starve America of vital resources at a time of great peril to our country.

MURRAY-METCALF BILL DESCRIBED

Because the NEA played a most significant role in the shaping of the Murray-Metcalf bill, most of you already know that this legislation would provide financial assistance for the support of public schools by appropriating Federal funds to the States to be used for constructing classrooms and/or improving teachers' salaries.

The bill provides a program of $1.1 billion a year for 4 years. Each State would receive $25 per school-age child.

Each State would be free to divide its allotment between classrooms and salaries, as it saw fit. Any portion of the funds expended for salaries would be distributed within the following guidelines: one-half to school districts on a per teacher basis and one-half on an equalization basis.

BRADEMAS STRONGLY OPPOSES FEDERAL CONTROL OF EDUCATION

We are all aware that one of the chief obstacles to the passage of the Murray-Metcalf bill is the issue of Federal control. As a former teacher, I certainly want no Federal control of what is taught in our schools. I am, therefore, very glad to say that this bill contains very effective safeguards against such control.

First, the procedures for the administration of the program by the U.S. Office of Education are so simple that the Office will have no opportunity to coerce the States.

Second, the bill provides that once Federal funds reach the State, they are thereafter deemed to be State funds.

Third, the bill explicitly provides that in the administration of the law, the Federal Government shall exercise no direction, supervision, or control over policy determination, personnel, curriculum, program of instruction, or the administration of any school or school system—which is about as clear a declaration of purpose as the English language can supply.

Fourth, each State education agency is required only to certify that funds granted under the act have been expended in accordance with the provisions of the act, the same procedure for Federal fiscal control which has been followed historically under the land-grant college program.

FEDERAL FUNDS NOW USED FOR EDUCATION WITHOUT FEDERAL CONTROL

I think finally that the best evidence that Federal funds can be used for classroom construction and teachers' salaries without Federal control is the fact that we have been using them for both these purposes for some years now.

It has been a source of constant surprise to me to learn that very few citizens in my district—indeed, very few schoolteachers—know that under Public Laws 815 and 874, the impacted area programs for school districts near defense plants or military bases, for example, Federal funds are now being used not only to build classrooms but to pay teachers' salaries and even to buy textbooks.

As a member of the General Education Subcommittee, I asked several witnesses, including Members of Congress and the U.S. Commissioner of Education, the following question this year during hearings on the administration's ill-advised proposal to cut funds for education under the impacted area programs: Have you any evidence that the use of Federal funds for classrooms and teachers' salaries has led to any Federal control of education in these districts?

Here is a typical answer:

One Republican Congressman whose views are normally very conservative but whose conservatism was apparently greatly tempered by the fact that his district receives substantial amounts of such Federal aid to education replied, "I have not, sir. I think that has been one of the outstanding virtues of Public Laws 815 and 874. There has been no Federal control curriculumwise."

EISENHOWER EDUCATION COMMISSIONER ADMITS NO EVIDENCE OF CONTROL

Here is Commissioner Derthick's reply: "I am glad to say, Mr. BRADEMAS, that the question has not come up. On the contrary, there was a doctorate study done up at Teachers College, Columbia University, investigating to determine whether there had been any semblance of Federal control in the administration of these laws throughout the United States; and the conclusion was impressive and complete, that there has not been any indication in any of these approximately 4,000 school districts."

And the Commissioner went on to assure the committee that his statement applied to the use of Federal funds both for school construction and for teachers' salaries.

For those persons, therefore, who are sincerely troubled about the issue of Federal control but who base their conclusions on facts, I urge a look not only at the safeguards built into H.R. 22, but at the actual record of the administration of Federal funds under present law.

I have tried to suggest why we must invest more in education. I have tried to suggest why it is imperative that we make use of Federal funds for building more classrooms and raising teachers' salaries.

I have tried to suggest why the Murray-Metcalf bill is the most effective avenue for achieving these goals.

And finally, I have tried to suggest that Federal funds can be used to support State and local efforts in education without infringing on their control of school systems.

INCREASED U.S. INVESTMENT IN EDUCATION ESSENTIAL TO SURVIVAL OF FREEDOM

Let me now attempt, briefly, to put the problem of increasing our national investment in education in a somewhat different perspective.

No one who watched television or heard the radio or read the newspapers during the time that Mr. Khrushchev moved across the face of this land can fail now to understand that in him we are confronted with an alert, intelligent, aggressive, and articulate leader and by a people in the Soviet Union who can be described in similar adjectives.

In the decade of the 1960's to begin in just a few days now, the American people will be faced with the most powerful challenge to our survival as a free society that we have known in all the history of this Republic.

It may well prove to be true that in the struggle between ourselves and the Communist world—a struggle both economic and moral as well as political and military—that side will prove triumphant which more effectively marshals its brainpower.

Whether we are able to maintain a free and vigorous and civilized society here at home and to encourage such societies abroad will, in large measure, depend on the quality and resources of our education.

OUR MOST VALUABLE NATURAL RESOURCE: EDUCATED MEN AND WOMEN

It seems to me, therefore, that we in America must invest far more of our national resources in the most valuable natural resource we have: educated young men and women.

I salute you of the National Education Association for your dedication to the purposes of education. We share a common conviction that, as Adlai Stevenson has said, "The goal of education is to teach Western man not just to survive but to triumph, not just to defend himself, but to make man and the world what God intended them to be."

Washington Report by Hon. Bruce Alger, of Texas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 18, 1960

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the REC-

ORD, I include my newsletter of January 16, 1960:

WASHINGTON REPORT BY CONGRESSMAN BRUCE ALGER, FIFTH DISTRICT, TEXAS, JANUARY 16, 1960

The machinery of congressional legislation is picking up speed. Committees are meeting to evaluate their pending bills, Members are preparing speeches, political motivations of candidates and parties are becoming more evident.

The ingredients of this legislative year are these: (1) An election year for Representatives (2 years), the President (4 years), and some Senators (6 years); (2) split government—the legislative body, Congress, under Democrat leadership, and the administration, Republican; only Congress makes the law; (3) various problems or trouble areas, highly controversial, which are, (a) the military and economic cold war with Russia; (b) the monopoly power of unions and dictatorial power of labor leaders; (c) the fiscal situation—a national debt of $290 billion; plus already incurred c.o.d. bills of $440 billion or more ($90 billion now owing and $350 billion committed as future obligations); plus a $2 billion built-in budget increase; plus hundreds of billions of legislative proposals for additional spending now pending; (d) a financing problem—Congress expects the Treasury Department to borrow money without a flexible interest ceiling, thus forcing the Government to borrow in the short-term market competing with individuals and businesses; (e) a heavy tax burden with progressive rates that kill incentive; (f) civil rights, welfare programs, and other controversial bills, all politically explosive, are pending.

What will Congress do? The answer will result from the people's demands, of course. (1) The election year issues and solutions can be politically expedient or statesmanlike as to motivation and outcome. (2) There could be a rash of new spending proposals adopted or a balanced budget with debt repayment and an aim toward tax adjustment and reduction. (3) There will be blaming of the administration for congressional shortcomings or responsible acceptance of the legislative role by Congress. (4) There can be more regimented planned economy or an emphasis on free competitive enterprise. (5) There will be more labor domination by law or placement of unions under antitrust law. My recommendation is the acceptance of the second of each of these alternatives.

The citizens of this great Nation and the Congressmen have reached the place, as I see it, where we must either restate and practice our belief in free competitive enterprise or abandon it, as we continue to legislate ourselves into the planned, regimented society. We don't need more law; we need to examine, evaluate and eliminate stifling, antiquated policies. Balancing the budget, reducing the debt, and lessening the tax burden are what this Nation needs most, not more welfare spending. The basic choice is between siphoning off money into Federal programs or leaving the money in the hands of the people to reinvest as they see fit. The latter course is the only one possible for sound economic growth and prosperity for all. Only in producing more can we all have more.

The purge of 56 Congressmen threatened by Jimmy Hoffa, head of the Teamsters (including myself) will be met by a counter-offensive by those Members who are now uniting for this effort.

The Ways and Means Committee (of which I'm a member) will: (1) Hold hearings February 1 on the taxation of cooperatives; (2) Bring out a social security revision, possibly including the Forand, allegedly "socialized medicine", provision, as an amendment; (3) Possibly permit a revision of the interest rate ceiling. Some of the language used in the Ways and Means Committee illustrates the special world of taxation (not all are self-explanatory, either)—multiple trust, retroactive correction, conduit, throwback rule, partial distribution, corpus, aggregating, spin-off, collapsible corporation, traps, loopholes, pitfalls, blind alleys, distribution in kind, election of choice, etc.

The weekly newsletter is available to anyone in Dallas by request.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1960

Dr. James T. Cleland, dean of the chapel, Duke University, Durham, N.C., offered the following prayer:

Holy, holy, holy art Thou, O Lord God of hosts. Heaven and earth are full of Thy glory. Glory be to Thee, O God most high.

Almighty God, through whose will we live, under whose judgment we stand, in whose mercy we are redeemed, we commend unto Thee those whom we have entrusted to make just laws for our good land. Grant unto them insight to know the truth, courage to face the truth, and consideration to speak the truth in love. Among angry voices that deafen and deaden the ear, before problems that beset and vex the mind, amid rumors of war that frighten the heart, in the multitude of choices that puzzle the will to act, give them peace and poise and the assurance that all things can work together for good, under Thee; to the end that these Thy children may live with integrity and charity, worthy to hear Thy "Well done, good and faithful servants."

And unto Thee, and to Thee only, we shall ascribe, as is most due, honor and majesty and dominion and power, forever and ever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 18, 1960, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R. 9385) to provide for the exclusion or deportation of any alien convicted for violation of any law relating to illicit possession of marihuana, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H.R. 9385) to provide for the exclusion or deportation of any alien convicted for violation of any law relating to illicit possession of marihuana, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour; and I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

APPROPRIATIONS TO NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION

A letter from the Administrator, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, Washington, D.C., transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences.

REPORT ON FLIGHT PAY, DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Army, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on flight pay, Department of the Army, for the period July 1, 1959, through December 31, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services

REPORT OF FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES BOARD

A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of the Foreign-Trade Zones Board, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959, together with reports covering the operations during the same period of Foreign-Trade Zones Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5, located at New York City, New Orleans, San Francisco, and Seattle, respectively (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Finance.

REGULATION OF USE OF THE RED CROSS AND OTHER EMBLEMS

A letter from the Acting Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to give effect to certain obligations of the United States under the Geneva Convention for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949, by regulating use of the Red Cross and other emblems, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AUDIT REPORTS

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the Federal home loan banks supervised by Federal Home Loan Bank Board, fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, Department of Agriculture, fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the Federal Prison Industries, Inc., Department of Justice, fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the Virgin Islands Corporation, fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the Farm Credit Administration, fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the Federal Facilities Corporation, General Services Administration, fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the Secretary of Commerce, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

STATUS OF PERMANENT RESIDENCE FOR CERTAIN ALIENS

A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of orders granting the applications for permanent residence filed by certain aliens, together with a statement of the facts and pertinent provisions of law as to each alien, and the reasons for granting such applications (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS ON POSITIONS IN GRADES GS–16, 17, AND 18

A letter from the Chairman, Civil Service Commission, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report covering a Civil Service Commission position in grade GS–18 (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report covering supergrade positions under the control of that Board (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

RESOLUTIONS OF WYOMING RURAL ELECTRIC COOPERATIVES

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two resolutions adopted by a convention of the Wyoming Rural Electric Cooperatives, relating to water and power resources in the State of Wyoming.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 3

Whereas the future growth and development of the State of Wyoming is inseparable from the full development of its natural resources; and

Whereas such resource development hinges on multipurpose water projects which will effectuate the maximum utilization of Wyoming water resources including the power potential; and

Whereas the 15 Rural Electric Cooperatives of Wyoming have been and are now projecting plans to serve now underdeveloped but potentially productive areas of Wyoming with electric power: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Wyoming Rural Electric Cooperatives in convention assembled do go on record as supporting the full multipurpose river development of Wyoming, and to this end dedicate themselves severally and individually to the promotion of multipurpose programs which will provide water and power to open the storehouse of natural resources which is Wyoming; and be it further

Resolved, That the Wyoming Rural Electric Cooperatives urge upon the Federal Government a soundly conceived long-range resource program which will insure the orderly and progressive development of the natural resources not only of Wyoming but throughout the Nation, and to this end urges an increase in planning funds for such resource agencies as the Bureau of Reclamation and a resource budget predicated upon a growing economy and a resource base equal to the full potential of America; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Wyoming congressional delegation and to the President of the United States, the Department of Interior, and other applicable resources agencies, both State and National.

RESOLUTION 4

Whereas the long struggle for the development of the Upper Basin of the Colorado River system came to fruition in the enactment of the Upper Colorado River Storage and Development Act (Public Law 485); and

Whereas the construction of the main features of the upper Colorado project is now under way; and

Whereas the construction of the participating water-use projects of this act are dependent upon the power revenue of the holdover and power units now under way; and

Whereas Public Law 485 specifically authorized such transmission lines as are necessary to effectuate interconnection of the project powerplants and other existing and potential Federal and private power systems of the area; and

Whereas the rural electric cooperatives and municipal power users of the upper basins States have organized the upper basin preference users committee to coordinate and spearhead the interests of preference users and the activities of existing preference user organizations of the basin; and

Whereas this committee has compiled and presented to the Department of Interior and to the Congress data showing a preference demand in the upper basin capable of absorbing the capacity of the project powerplants within a reasonable period of time; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Rural Electric Cooperatives of Wyoming go on record in support of an extra-high voltage transmission system which can make power available to all States of the upper basin as contemplated in Public Law 485; and be it further

Resolved, That the cooperatives go on record in support of the Upper Colorado Preference Users Committee and hereby authorized and directs the Wyoming State Rural Electric Association to give its full support to such committee and to other interested groups active in the field; and be it finally

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Wyoming congressional delegation, the Governor of the State of Wyoming, the Wyoming Resources Board, the Secretary of the Department of Interior and such other State, interstate, Federal, or other agencies having jurisdiction in this matter.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia, from the Committee on Finance, with an amendment:

H.R. 135. An act to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to exclude from gross income amounts paid by the United States to certain nonresident alien employees or their beneficiaries; (Rept. No. 1028).

By Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, without amendment:

S. Res. 210. Resolution providing additional funds for the Select Committee on National Water Resources (S. Rept. No. 1029); and, under the rule, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

By Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, without amendment:

S. Res. 230. Resolution authorizing the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to investigate certain matters within its jurisdiction; and, under the rule, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Douglas Dillon, of New Jersey, to be an alternate governor of the Inter-American Development Bank;

Robert Bernerd Anderson, of New York, to be a governor of the Inter-American Development Bank;

Raymond A. Hare, of West Virginia, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be a Deputy Under Secretary of State;

Walter C. Dowling, of Georgia, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Federal Republic of Germany.

John D. Hickerson, of Texas, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the Philippines.

Walter P. McConaughy, of Alabama, a Foreign Service officer of class 1, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Republic of Korea.

Edson O. Sessions, of Illinois, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Finland.

William P. Snow, of Maine, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Union of Burma.

John J. Muccio, of Rhode Island, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Guatemala.

Edward Page, Jr., of the District of Columbia, a Foreign Service officer of class 1, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Bulgaria.

John Ewart Wallace Sterling, of California, to be a member of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Educational Exchange.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DIRKSEN (for himself, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. HRUSKA):

S. 2849. A bill to prescribe a Federal Code of Administrative Practice to govern administrative proceedings of departments and agencies of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the remarks of Mr. DIRKSEN when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. DIRKSEN (for himself, Mr. CAPEHART, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. HARTKE):

S. 2850. A bill to provide for the appointment of one circuit judge for the seventh judicial circuit; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the remarks of Mr. DIRKSEN when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. McCARTHY:

S. 2851. A bill to continue until the close of June 30, 1961, the suspension of duties on metal scrap, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. TALMADGE:

S. 2852. A bill to encourage the creation of original ornamental designs of useful articles by protecting the authors of such designs for a limited time against unauthorized copying and to preserve copyright protection for creators of artistic works in which copyright subsists; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the remarks of Mr. TALMADGE when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota:

S. 2853. A bill to provide for removal of restrictions on the number of days of service for which members of county and local Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Committees may be compensated; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

S. 2854. A bill to authorize the transfer of certain property of the Public Health Service to the New Town Health Center Corp., New Town, N. Dak.; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. KEFAUVER:

S. 2855. A bill for the relief of Brenda Nicholson Miller; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CLARK:

S. 2856. A bill to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act so as to grant Members of Congress and employees eligibility for benefits under the act after the performance of 5 years of any combination of creditable civilian service; and

S. 2857. A bill to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act so as to provide for refunds of contributions in the case of annuitants whose length of service exceeds the amount necessary to provide the maximum annuity allowable under such Act; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. MURRAY:

S. 2858. A bill to secure the United States from losing essential mineral reserves and to preserve an adequate mineral reserve stabilization base for emergencies; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. MURRAY (by request):

S. 2859. A bill to impose certain requirements upon persons engaging in certain activities with respect to the public lands, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. CASE of South Dakota:

S. 2860. A bill to provide for a highway bridge over the Missouri River west or southwest of Platte, S. Dak.; to the Committee on Public Works.

RESOLUTIONS

Mr. KEATING submitted a resolution (S. Res. 253) creating a select committee to study the question of jurisdiction of U.S. courts over employees of the Armed Forces outside the territorial limits of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the above resolution printed in full when submitted by Mr. KEATING, which appears under a separate heading.)

Mr. GOLDWATER submitted a resolution (S. Res. 254) establishing a select committee to investigate the impact of labor-management disputes and of collective bargaining on the national economy and their effect on the American public, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(See the above resolution printed in full when submitted by Mr. GOLDWATER, which appears under a separate heading.)

CODE OF ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a great deal of work has gone into the development of a code of administrative practice. It stems in part from the hearings held by a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, which subcommittee was created for the first time in the first session of the present Congress. The subcommittee is under the very able leadership of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL].

I should pay special testimony, I believe, to the minority staff member, Mr. Cornelius Kennedy, a very able lawyer, who has had much to do with the drafting of this code. It serves the same purpose in administrative law as do the rules of civil procedure which today are applicable to our Federal courts.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a statement on this matter. I prefer not to burden the Senate by reading the statement during the morning hour; therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed in its entirety in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks; and I introduce the bill for appropriate reference, and request that it remain at the desk today and tomorrow, in case other Members may wish to join in sponsoring it.

I am introducing the bill on behalf of myself, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA], all members of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be held at the desk as requested, and the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2849) to prescribe a Federal Code of Administrative Practice to govern administrative proceedings of departments and agencies of the United States and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN (for himself, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. HRUSKA), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The statement presented by Mr. DIRKSEN is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DIRKSEN—CODE OF ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICE

On behalf of myself, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. HRUSKA, I am introducing, for appropriate reference, a bill to prescribe a Federal Code of Administrative Practice to govern the administrative proceedings of all the departments and agencies of the United States.

At present, there are more than 100 such agencies of the Federal Government which conduct administrative proceedings. They include the principal regulatory agencies such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Federal Power Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, and the Securities and Exchange Commission. They also include the National Labor Relations Board, the departments such as Agriculture and Interior, the Food and Drug Administration, the Veterans' Administration, and the myriad of other agencies, boards, and commissions of this Federal Government.

By their very numbers, these departments and agencies constitute an administrative maze. When it is also considered that each of these departments and agencies conducts its administrative proceedings by its own set of rules, the maze becomes a bewildering labyrinth governed by many conflicting procedures.

The need for a better guide to govern industry, practitioners, and the agencies themselves has long been recognized, and on February 2, 1959, the Senate authorized the establishment of a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee on Administrative Practice and Procedure, of which I have the honor to be a member, to study the problems of administrative proceedings.

The code of practice prescribed by this bill for administrative proceedings will make it no longer necessary for those dealing with departments and agencies to learn a special set of rules for the conduct of administrative proceedings by each department or agency. This code will establish one set of rules for administrative proceedings before all departments and agencies.

However, I want to make clear at the outset that though this code of practice applies across the board to departments and agencies of this Federal Government, it deals only with the mechanics of administrative proceedings. Except as it governs the practice by which such proceedings are conducted, this code does not affect the basic statutes creating the departments and agencies, defining their duties and giving them their power and authority.

It does not apply to any of the steps in an administrative matter prior to the filing of a petition for relief. In other words, it does not apply to agency investigations or to agency decisions as to whether or not to take action as a result of a complaint or an investigation. To make this crystal clear, let me give two specific examples. This code would not apply to complaints such as are made to the FTC about unfair competitive practices or complaints to the NLRB about unfair labor practices until the agency has decided to file formal proceedings against the person about whom the complaint was made. The reason for this is that Congress, in the basic statutes relating to those agencies, gave the power to prosecute to the agency and not to the complainant. No attempt has been made in this code to change this basic agency power. If the Congress desires to give the power to prosecute a complaint to the person making the complaint rather than to the agency, it should change the basic statute pertaining to the agency. If that is done, this code would then automatically apply to the proceeding. This code also does not apply to what is often called general rulemaking by departments or agencies. The time when this code begins to apply to an agency matter is when an agency or department, based upon its investigation or upon a complaint made to it, starts a proceeding seeking to direct someone to do or not to do something. The function of this code is to establish the rules for the conduct of such a proceeding.

It also governs any situation in which a private citizen seeks relief from an order, determination, or rule of general applicability issued by a department or agency. This would include an individual who asks the FCC for an additional TV station, or one who asks the CAB for a new air route. It also includes anyone who may protest the refusal of the Veterans' Administration to grant a pension, or a contractor who has a case pending before the Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals, as well as the farmer who wishes to protest an order by the Department of Agriculture. This code will apply regardless of the department or agency before which such a proceeding is pending. It will make the practice before all of them fair and uniform.

This code is a counterpart of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure used in the Federal courts, and it has a similar purpose. Just as the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure brought certainty and uniformity to the different types of proceedings in the various Federal courts, this code will bring certainty and uniformity to the proceedings before the various departments and agencies of the United States.

There was substantial opposition to the adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on the ground that cases are law and cases in equity could not be tried under the same rules, and that the great variety of civil cases including breach of contract, personal injury, and antitrust actions, as well as specific performance and injunctions, could not be governed by one set of rules. Time and experience have shown that they can be.

Even prior to the time that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were adopted—in fact for over 30 years—there have been efforts to bring the same type of unity and uniformity to agency procedures. Many of the departments and agencies, particularly the larger and older ones, have adopted their own rules of practice, often modeled on the same precedents which were used in formulating the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

However, there has been resistance to attempts to formulate uniform rules for all departments and agencies on the ground that the particular problems with which each deals are different from the problems dealt with by the others. Some have maintained that a special set of rules is necessary to govern the proceedings before different agencies. These proceedings cover a wide range including the granting of air routes or the licensing of aircraft, assigning radio wavelengths or licenses to operate radios, veterans' benefits, agricultural acreage allotments, marketing quotas, grazing permits, unfair competitive practices, granting of research and development contracts, applications for patents, as well as charges of unfair labor practices, violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act.

Let us look at the argument which has been and no doubt will be made again that the practice in such proceedings cannot be governed by a single code. There is no mystery to the conduct of such a proceeding. A claim and the relief sought must be stated. The claim must be answered to determine which points are admitted and which points are actually in dispute. There must be provisions for the other steps which can be taken in the proceeding and a time schedule for the steps. There must be provisions relating to the form of the decision and for an appeal.

These are the basic matters covered by this code of practice. This code is meant to supplement the Administrative Procedure Act in those areas touched only lightly by that act and not to replace it.

Much of the language of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure has been incorporated into this proposed Code of Administrative Practice. This has a great advantage. In the more than 20 years during which the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure have been in use, the language of the rules has been interpreted by the courts where it has been necessary. By using the same language in this code, many questions of interpretation should be eliminated.

This Code of Administrative Practice is flexible too. Time has shown that much of the success and versatility of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure has been due to the fact that in drafting the rules, considerable freedom was left to the individual courts and to the parties to adopt the general procedures set forth in the rules to the requirements of a particular proceeding. That concept has been adopted in the drafting of this code.

In another and extremely important aspect, this code is the counterpart of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The rules are the tools which a judge uses to conduct the court's proceedings. No matter how well qualified in the law a judge may be, he cannot effectively dispense justice without such tools. The same reasoning applies to agencies and departments.

The Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure has been concerned with criticisms leveled at the conduct of proceedings by departments and agencies, which have received widespread notice. However, these matters represent a minute portion of the countless cases which have been disposed of to the satisfaction of everyone concerned with due regard to the public interest. These agencies during the past 50 years have played a vital role, as administrative law has become more important in our complex economy.

It appears that many of the difficulties which have surrounded the administrative agencies may be remedied by insuring a uniformity in their proceedings which will develop better rules of practice, not only by the agencies concerned, but by those who are subject to regulatory proceedings.

Our difficulties arise from a lack of uniform rules to govern everyone concerned, rather than from a lack of character or integrity by the individuals who serve as public officials in these important posts. Many times blame has been directed at the members of commissions when a matter before them was not handled satisfactorily. Yet, these men are selected by the same process as applies to the appointment of Federal judges. Their nominations are subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. Before confirmation, they are subject to the scrutiny of the Senate and its appropriate committees. As a matter of fact, Cabinet officers and their principal assistants normally serve only during the tenure of a President, which under the 22d amendment is now limited to 8 years.

The regulatory agencies have been established by statute so that their membership shall always be bipartisan. In many instances, an individual accepts an appointment with the belief that if a satisfactory record is made, reappointment may be expected. Such service then becomes a professional career in a true sense. However, this implies a maintenance of an outstanding record of public service.

Hence, the members of agencies and commissions, as well as Cabinet members heading departments appointed by the President, are subject to even closer Senate scrutiny than are judges because their qualifications must be reviewed by this body whenever they are nominated for a new term.

This requires that each nominee demonstrate the capacity for exceptional public service and an unassailable integrity. The Senate has no such opportunity with respect to Federal judges who have a lifetime tenure. There is, then, every reason for us to expect that the men directing agencies and departments are outstanding citizens as are Federal judges. Unfortunately, up to now these officials have been charged by the Congress with exercising great power and authority, but they have not had the proper tools with which to work. By adopting this code, the Congress can give the departments and agencies a set of uniform ground rules for their conduct of all administrative proceedings.

The benefits which can be obtained from this uniformity of practice are so great, and the application of this code so widespread, that I invite the most careful consideration, analysis, and discussion of this bill by all interested persons. I hope it will serve to crystallize the ideas of informed people which will enable the Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure to offer sound legislation acceptable to both the agencies concerned and those members of the public who must deal with them. It should simplify the problems of the agencies concerned and insure more expeditious disposition of cases which should always be decided in the public interest. I have no pride of authorship and I believe that this original draft can be improved by the combined experience of many.

I am introducing this bill at this time because I am convinced that its enactment would be the most important single action which this Congress could undertake to assist the various departments, agencies, boards, and commissions which it has created to discharge the responsibilities we have delegated to them. It is essential that we eliminate the bewildering labyrinth of unnecessary variations which have grown up in the practice before the departments and agencies.

I have asked unanimous consent that the bill lie on the desk for 2 days, so that any of my colleagues who may wish to join with me as cosponsors may have an opportunity to do so. The enactment of this proposed legislation will affect the practices of these agencies in future generations long after our terms of service have expired.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR THE SEVENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I think Members may have taken account of the fact that Judge Parkinson, a circuit judge for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, disappeared a good many months ago. There have been no clues as to his whereabouts; and that situation presents somewhat of a problem, because of the fact that he enjoyed a lifetime appointment and, under the law of Illinois and under the law of Indiana, actual death cannot be established until, in one case, 5 years have elapsed or, under the law of the other State, until 7 years have elapsed.

The administrative officers of the Supreme Court have taken account of these facts; and they believe that, in view of the overburdened docket, an additional judge should be appointed.

Therefore, Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY]. and the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to meet that situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2850) to provide for the appointment of one circuit judge for the seventh judicial circuit, introduced by

Mr. DIRKSEN (for himself, Mr. CAPEHART, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. HARTKE), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COPYRIGHT PROTECTION FOR CREATORS OF ARTISTIC WORKS

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to encourage the creation of original ornamental designs of useful articles by protecting the authors of such designs for a limited time against unauthorized copying and to preserve copyright protection for creators of artistic works in which copyright subsists. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with an explanatory statement, prepared by me, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and explanatory statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2852) to encourage the creation of original ornamental designs of useful articles by protecting the authors of such designs for a limited time against unauthorized copying and to preserve copyright protection for creators of artistic works in which copyright subsists, introduced by Mr. TALMADGE, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

DESIGNS PROTECTED

SECTION 1. (a) The author of an original design, or his legal representatives or assigns, may secure the protection provided by this Act upon complying with and subject to the provisions hereof.

(b) (1) For the purposes of this Act, an original "design" consists of those original elements of a useful article that are intended to give the article an ornamental appearance. Such elements may be two-dimensional or three-dimensional.

(2) A useful article, hereinafter referred to as an "article", is an article normally having an intrinsic function other than merely to portray its own appearance or to convey information. An article which is normally a part of a useful article shall be deemed to be a useful article.

DESIGNS NOT SUBJECT TO PROTECTION

SEC. 2. Protection under this Act shall not be available for—

(a) a design that is staple or commonly known, including standard geometric figures, familiar symbols, emblems, and motifs, and other shapes, patterns, configurations, or ornamentation which by general use over long periods of time have become common, prevalent, or ordinary; or

(b) any other design that is in the public domain: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall affect the availability of protection under this Act for any design, notwithstanding its similarity to subject matter in the public domain, if the design was created without actual knowledge of the subject matter in the public domain; or

(c) a design that is dictated solely by the function or purpose of the article embodying the design.

REVISIONS, ADAPTATIONS, AND REARRANGEMENTS

SEC. 3. Protection for a design under this Act shall be available notwithstanding the employment of subject matter in the public domain, or subject matter protected under this Act or under titles 17 or 35 of the United States Code, if the design is a substantial and lawful revision, adaptation, or rearrangement of said subject matter. Such protection shall be independent of any subsisting protection in subject matter employed in the design, and shall not be construed as securing any right to subject matter in the public domain or as extending any subsisting protection.

COMMENCEMENT OF PROTECTION

SEC. 4. (a) The protection provided for a design under this Act shall commence upon the date when the design is first made known.

(b) A design is made known when, by the proprietor of the design or with his consent, an article embodying the design is anywhere publicly exhibited, publicly distributed, or offered for sale, or sold.

TERM OF PROTECTION

SEC. 5. (a) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the protection herein provided for a design shall continue for a term of five years from the date of the commencement of protection as provided in section 4(a).

(b) If the design notice actually applied shows a date earlier than the date of the commencement of protection as provided in section 4(a), protection shall terminate as though the term had commenced at the earlier date.

(c) The term of protection provided by subsections (a) or (b) above shall be extended for a second period of five years from the expiration of the original period and for a third period of five years from the expiration of the second period if an application for extension of the term of protection for the second or third period is made in the form prescribed in accordance with rules established pursuant to section 16 of this Act before the expiration of the original period or the second period, as the case may be, and if the prescribed application is accompanied by the prescribed fee.

(d) A design utilized in substantially identical form in a number of different articles shall be protected as to all such articles when protected as to one of them, but no more than one registration shall be required. Upon expiration or termination of protection in a particular design as provided in this Act all rights under this Act in said design shall terminate, regardless of the number of different articles in which the design may have been utilized during the term of its protection.

THE DESIGN NOTICE

SEC. 6. (a) Whenever any design for which protection is sought under this act is made known as provided in section 4(b), the proprietor shall, subject to the provisions of section 7, mark it or have it marked legibly with a design notice consisting of the following three elements:

(1) The words "Protected Design", the abbreviation "Prot'd Des." or the letter "D" within a circle, thus (D);

(2) The year of the date on which the design was first known; and

(3) The name of the proprietor, an abbreviation by which the name can be recognized, or a generally accepted alternative designation of the proprietor; any distinctive identification of the proprietor may be used if it has been approved and recorded by the Administrator before the design marked with such identification is made known.

After registration the registration number may be used instead of the elements specified in (2) and (3) hereof.

(b) The notice shall be so located and applied as to give reasonable notice of design protection while the article is passing through its normal channels of commerce. This requirement may be fulfilled, in the case of sheetlike or strip materials bearing repetitive or continuous designs, by application of the notice to each repetition, or to the margin, selvage, or reverse side of the material at regular intervals, or to tags or labels affixed to the material at regular intervals.

(c) When the proprietor of a design has complied with the provisions of this section, protection under this Act shall not be affected by the removal, destruction, or obliteration of the design notice on an article by others.

EFFECT OF OMISSION OF NOTICE AFTER REGISTRATION

SEC. 7. The omission of the notice as provided in section 6 shall not cause loss of the protection or prevent recovery for infringement against any person who, after written notice of the design protection, begins an undertaking leading to infringement; Provided, That such omission shall prevent any recovery under section 22 against a person who began an undertaking leading to infringement before receiving written notice of the design protection, and no injunction shall be had unless the proprietor of the design shall reimburse said person for any reasonable expenditure or contractual obligation in connection with such undertaking incurred before written notice of design protection, as the court in its discretion shall direct. The burden of proving written notice shall be on the proprietor.

INFRINGEMENT

SEC. 8. (a) It shall be infringement of a design protected under this Act for any person, without the consent of the proprietor of the design, within the United States or its territories or possessions and during the term of such protection, to—

(1) make, have made, or import, for sale or for use in trade, any infringing article as defined in subsection (d) hereof; or

(2) sell any such infringing article: Provided, however, That a seller or distributor of any such article who did not make or import the same shall be deemed to be an infringer only if,

(i) he induced or acted in collusion with a manufacturer to make, or an importer to import such article (merely purchasing or giving an order to purchase in the ordinary course of business shall not of itself constitute such inducement or collusion), or

(ii) he refuses or fails upon the request of the proprietor of the design to make a prompt and full disclosure of his source of such article, and he orders or reorders such article after having received a personal written notice of the protection subsisting in the design.

(b) It shall not be infringement to make, have made, sell, or import any article embodying a design created without actual knowledge of the protected design.

(c) A manufacturer who incorporates into his own product an infringing article acquired from others in the ordinary course of business shall not be deemed an infringer except under the conditions of clauses (i) and (ii) of paragraph (a) (2) of this section.

(d) An "infringing article" as used herein is any article, the design of which has been copied from the protected design, without the consent of the proprietor. An article embodying only a feature of the protected design which is solely dictated by the function or purpose of the article, or which is in the public domain is not an infringing article. The presence of an illustration or picture of a protected design in a book, periodical, newspaper, photograph, broadcast, or motion picture does not make it an infringing article.

APPLICATION FOR REGISTRATION

SEC. 9. (a) Protection under this Act shall be lost if application for registration of the design is not made within 6 months after the date on which the design was first made known as provided in section 4(b).

(b) Application for registration may be made by the author of the design, the legal representative of a deceased author or of one under legal incapacity, or the proprietor of the design in the event the rights thereto have been acquired by such proprietor.

(c) The application for registration shall be made to the Administrator and shall state: (1) the name and address of the author of the design; (2) the name and address of the proprietor if different from the author; (3) the specific name of the article, indicating its utility; (4) the date when the design was first made known as provided in section 4(b); and (5) such other information as may be required by the Administrator.

(d) The application shall be accompanied by a statement under oath by the applicant or his duly authorized agent or representative, setting forth that, to the best of his knowledge and belief: (1) the design was created by the author named in the application; (2) the design is original, and has not previously been registered on behalf of the applicant or his predecessor in title; (3) the design has been made known as provided in section 4(b); and (4) the applicant is the person entitled to protection and to registration under this Act. If the design has been made known with the design notice provided in section 6, the statement shall also describe the exact form and position of the design notice.

(e) Error in any statement or assertion as to the utility of the article named in the application, the design of which is sought to be registered, shall not affect the protection secured under this Act.

(f) Errors in omitting a joint author or in naming an alleged joint author shall not affect the validity of the registration, or the actual ownership or the protection of the design: Provided, That the name of one individual who was in fact an author is stated in the application. Where the design was made for hire and individual authorship of the design is difficult or impossible to ascribe and the application so states, the name and address of the employer for whom the design was made may be stated instead of that of the individual author.

(g) The application shall be accompanied by two copies of a drawing or other pictorial representation of the article having one or more views adequate to show the design, in a prescribed form and style and suitable for reproduction, which shall be deemed a part of the application.

(h) Related articles having common design features may be included in the same application under such conditions as may be prescribed by the Administrator.

BENEFIT OF EARLIER FILING DATE IN FOREIGN COUNTRY

SEC. 10. An application for registration of a design filed in this country by any person who has, or whose legal representative or predecessor or successor in title has previously regularly filed an application for registration of the same design in a foreign country which affords similar privileges in the case of applications filed in the United States or to citizens of the United States shall have the same effect as if filed in this country on the date on which the application was first filed in any such foreign country, if the application in this country is filed within six months from the earliest date on which any such foreign application was filed.

OATHS AND ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

SEC. 11. Oaths and acknowledgments required by this Act may be made before any person in the United States authorized by law to administer oaths, or, when made in a foreign country, before any diplomatic or consular officer of the United States authorized to administer oaths, or before any official authorized to administer oaths in the foreign country concerned whose authority shall be proved by a certificate of a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States, and shall be valid if they comply with the laws of the state or country where made.

EXAMINATION OF APPLICATION AND ISSUE OR REFUSAL OF REGISTRATION

SEC. 12. (a) Upon the filing of an application in proper form as provided in section 9, and upon payment of the fee provided in section 15, the Administrator shall determine whether, on its face, the application relates to a design subject to protection under this Act.

(b) If, in his judgment, the application on its face relates to a design not subject to protection under this Act, the Administrator shall send the applicant a notice of his refusal to register and the grounds therefor. Within three months from the date the notice of refusal is sent, the applicant may request, in writing, reconsideration of his application. Upon receipt of such a request the Administrator shall either proceed as provided in subsection (c) of this section, or shall send the applicant a notice of his final refusal to register.

(c) If, in his judgment, the design appears on its face to be subject to protection under this Act, the Administrator shall publish an announcement of his intention to register the design, together with a pictorial representation of the design. Within thirty days after publication of the announcement any person may file with the Administrator a verified objection to registration, on the ground that the design is staple or commonly known. At the end of the period for filing objections, the Administrator shall determine whether, in his judgment, the design is subject to protection under this Act, and shall either register the design or send the applicant a notice of his refusal to register and the grounds therefor. Within three months from the date the notice of refusal is sent, the applicant may request, in writing, reconsideration of his application. Upon receipt of such a request, the Administrator shall either register the design or send the applicant a notice of his final refusal to register. Registration or refusal to register under this subsection shall be announced by publication.

CERTIFICATE OF REGISTRATION

SEC. 13. Certificates of registration shall be issued in the name of the United States under the seal of the Office of the Administrator and shall be recorded in the official records of that Office. The certificate shall state the name of the article, the date on which the design was first made known as provided in section 4(b), the date of filing of the application, and shall contain a reproduction of the drawing or other pictorial representation showing the design. A certificate shall be admitted in any court as prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein.

PUBLICATION OF ANNOUNCEMENTS AND INDEXES

SEC. 14. (a) The Administrator shall periodically publish announcement of his intention or refusal to register designs as provided in section 12(c), and lists and indexes of registered designs. He may also publish the drawings or other pictorial representations of registered designs for sale or other distribution.

(b) The Administrator shall establish and maintain a file of the drawings or other pictorial representations of registered designs, which file shall be available for use by the public under such conditions as the Administrator may prescribe.

FEES

SEC. 15. (a) There shall be paid to the Administrator the following fees:

(1) On filing each application for registration of a design, $——;

(2) For each additional related article included in one application, $——;

(3) For recording assignments, $——;

(4) For a certificate of correction of an error not the fault of the Office, $——;

(5) For certification of copies of records, $——;

(6) For each application for extending term of protection, $——.

(b) The Administrator may establish charges for materials or services furnished by the Office, not specified above, reasonably related to the cost thereof.

REGULATIONS

SEC. 16. The Administrator may establish regulations not inconsistent with the law for the administration of this Act.

COPIES OF RECORDS

SEC. 17. Upon payment of the prescribed fee, any person may obtain a certified copy of any official record of the Office of the Administrator, which copy shall be admissible in evidence with the same effect as the original.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN CERTIFICATES

SEC. 18. The Administrator may correct any error in a registration incurred through the fault of the Office, or, upon payment of the required fee, any error of a clerical or typographical nature not the fault of the Office occuring in good faith, by a certificate of correction under seal. Such registration, together with the certificate, shall thereafter have the same effect as if the same had been originally issued in such corrected form.

TRANSFER OF OWNERSHIP

SEC. 19. (a) The property right in a registered design, or a design for which an application for registration has been or may be filed, may be assigned, granted, or mortgaged by an instrument in writing, signed by the proprietor, or may be bequeathed by will.

(b) An acknowledgment as provided in section 11 shall be prima facie evidence of the execution of an assignment, grant, or conveyance.

(c) An assignment, grant, or conveyance shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for a valuable consideration without notice, unless it is recorded in the Office of the Administrator within three months from its date of execution or prior to the date of such subsequent purchase or mortgage.

REMEDY FOR INFRINGEMENT

SEC. 20. The proprietor of a protected design shall have remedy for infringement by civil action instituted after the issuance of a certificate of registration of the design.

INJUNCTION

SEC. 21. The several courts having jurisdiction of actions under this Act may grant injunctions in accordance with the principles of equity to prevent infringement, including in their discretion, prompt relief by temporary restraining orders and preliminary injunction.

RECOVERY FOR INFRINGEMENT, AND SO FORTH

SEC. 22. (a) Upon finding for the claimant the court shall award him damages adequate to compensate for the infringement, but in no event less than the reasonable value of the use made of the design by the infringer, and the costs of the action. When the damages are not found by a jury, the court shall assess them. In either event the court may increase the damages up to three times the amount found or assessed. Such sum in any of the above circumstances shall constitute compensation and not a penalty. The court may receive expert testimony as an aid to the determination of damages.

(b) No recovery under paragraph (a) shall be had for any infringement committed more than three years prior to the filing of the complaint.

(c) In exceptional cases the court may award reasonable attorney fees to the prevailing party.

(d) The court may order that all infringing articles, and any plates, molds, patterns, models, or other means specifically adapted for making the same be delivered up for destruction or other disposition as the court may direct.

POWER OF COURT OVER REGISTRATION

SEC. 23. In any action involving a registered design the court when appropriate may order the cancellation of the registration. Any such order shall be certified by the court to the Administrator, who shall make appropriate entry upon the records of his Office.

LIABILITY FOR ACTION ON REGISTRATION FRAUDULENTLY OBTAINED

SEC. 24. Any person who shall bring an action for infringement knowing that registration of the design was obtained by a false or fraudulent representation materially affecting the rights under this Act, shall be liable in the sum of $1,000, or such part thereof as the court may determine, as compensation to the defendant, to be charged against the plaintiff and paid to the defendant, in addition to such costs and attorney fees of the defendant as may be assessed by the court.

PENALTY FOR FALSE MARKING

SEC. 25. (a) Whoever, for the purpose of deceiving the public, marks upon, or applies to, or uses in advertising in connection with any article made, used, distributed, or sold by him, the design of which is not protected under this Act, a design notice as specified in section 6 or any other words or symbols importing that the design is protected under this Act, knowing that the design is not so protected, shall be fined not more than $500 for every such offense.

(b) Any person may sue for the penalty, in which event one-half shall go to the person suing and the other to the use of the United States.

PENALTY FOR FALSE REPRESENTATION

SEC. 26. Whoever knowingly makes a false representation materially affecting the rights obtainable under this Act for the purpose of obtaining or preventing registration of a design under this Act shall be fined not less than $500 and not more than $1,000, and any rights or privileges he may have in the design under this Act shall be forfeited.

RELATION TO COPYRIGHT LAW

SEC. 27. (a) Subject to the provisions of subsection (b) of this section, nothing in this Act shall affect any right or remedy now or hereafter held by any person under title 17 of the United States Code.

(b) If the proprietor of the copyright in a pictorial, graphic, or sculptural work in which copyright subsists under title 17 of the United States Code utilizes such work in the design of a useful article and either—

(i) marks the design or article embodying such design with the notice provided for in section 6 of this Act, or

(ii) makes application for registration of such design pursuant to section 9 of this Act for the purpose of securing the protection afforded by this Act, the design resulting from such utilization shall be, from the date such notice referred to in (i) above is placed on the design or article or from the date such application referred to in (ii) above is made, regarded as an original ornamental design of a useful article, which shall be subject to, and the protection of which shall depend upon compliance with, the provisions of this Act.

RELATION TO PATENT LAW

SEC. 28. (a) Nothing in this Act shall affect any right or remedy available to or held by any person under title 35 of the United States Code.

(b) The issuance of a design patent for an ornamental design under said title 35 shall terminate any protection of the design under this Act.

COMMON LAW AND OTHER RIGHTS UNAFFECTED

SEC. 29. Nothing in this Act shall annul or limit (1) common law or other rights or remedies, if any, available to or held by any person with respect to a design which has not been made known as provided in section 4(b), or (2) any trademark right or right to be protected against unfair competition.

ADMINISTRATOR

SEC. 30. The Administrator and Office of the Administrator referred to in this Act shall be such officer and office as the President may designate.

SEVERABILITY CLAUSE

SEC. 31. If any provision of this Act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of the Act or the application to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

AMENDMENT OF COPYRIGHT LAW

SEC. 32. Chapter I of title 17, United States Code, is amended by adding the following:

"§ 33. Effect of utilization of copyrighted work in design of useful article.

"(a) When a pictorial graphic or sculptural work in which copyright subsists under this title is utilized in the design of a useful article and the proprietor of such copyright has either—

"(i) marked such design or article embodying such design with the notice provided for in section 6 of the Design Protection and Copyright Preservation Act, or

"(ii) made application to register such design in accordance with the provisions of section 9 of that Act for the purpose of obtaining the protection of the Design Protection and Copyright Preservation Act, the resulting ornamental design of a useful article shall be, from the date of marking the design or article as referred to in (i) above or from making the application referred to in (ii) above subject to the provisions of that Act and protection of the work as embodied in useful articles shall be governed by the provisions of that Act and not by this title. Nothing in this subsection shall affect any right or remedy held by any person under this title in a work in which copyright was subsisting on the effective date of the Design Protection and Copyright Preservation Act, or in a copyrighted work which has not been utilized in the design or a useful article by the copyright proprietor, or in a work in which copyright now subsists or hereafter is obtained which has been, or which may thereafter be, utilized in the design of a useful article by the copyright proprietor but which has not had the notice referred to in (i) above marked thereon or for which no application as referred to in (ii) above has been made for the purpose of securing the protection afforded by the Design Protection and Copyright Preservation Act or with respect to any utilization of a copyrighted work in the design of an article other than a useful article.

"(b) A 'useful article' as used in this section is an article normally having an intrinsic function other than merely to portray its own appearance or to convey information. An article which is normally a part of a useful article shall be deemed to be a useful article."

AMENDMENT OF OTHER STATUTES

SEC. 33. (a) Subdivision a (2) of section 70 of the Bankruptcy Act of July 1, 1898 (11 U.S.C. 110(a)) is amended by inserting "designs," after "patents," and "design registration," after "application for patent,".

(b) Title 28 of the United States Code is amended—

(1) by inserting "designs," after "patents," in the first sentence of section 1338(a);

(2) by inserting ", design," after "patent" in the second sentence of section 1338(a);

(3) by inserting "design," after "copyright," in section 1338(b);

(4) by inserting "and registered designs" after "copyrights" in section 1400; and

(5) by adding at the end of section 1498 a new paragraph as follows:

"This section shall also apply to the case of designs registered under the laws of the United States."

TIME OF TAKING EFFECT

SEC. 34. This Act shall take effect one year after its enactment.

NO RETROACTIVE EFFECT

SEC. 35. Protection under this Act shall not be available for any design that has been made known as provided in section 4(b) prior to the effective date of this Act.

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 36. This Act may be cited as "The Design Protection and Copyright Preservation Act of 1960."

The statement presented by Mr. TALMADGE is as follows:

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT

Under the present law of the United States, copyright in newspaper features, pictures, strip cartoons, drawings, television and motion picture films, and other works is fully protected for a term of 28 years plus a renewable term of 28 years for a total of 56 years.

At the present time if a copyright owner uses his protected work industrially, commercially, or on useful articles (whether two- or three-dimensional), his copyright is not lost, diminished, or adversely affected (Mazer v. Stein (1954), 347 U.S. 201, 98 L. Ed. 630, 74 S. Ct. 460). The copyright owner has full and complete copyright protection irrespective of the use to which he puts his copyright work. Under the provisions of legislation pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee (S. 2075), if a copyright owner uses his work industrially, commercially, or on useful articles, he would lose his protection in that field unless he obtained design registration under the proposed act. If he obtained design registration under that act, he would be afforded only a 5-year period of protection on the registered design and his totality of basic copyright protection would be seriously impaired.

If Congress should determine to enact legislation providing for the protection of ornamental and commercial designs, legitimate copyright interests should not be unfairly penalized. The protection now afforded under present copyright law ought not to be lost, impaired, restricted, or diminished.

The measure which I am introducing in the Senate has for its primary purpose the continued protecton of copyright to the full extent now provided under the law of the United States in event registered commercial design legislation should be enacted.

My proposal provides for (1) a 5-year term of protection plus the right to two renewable terms of 5 years each for registered designs and (2) further provides that a copyright owner has the right to choose to come under the proposed Registered Designs Act if he wishes; but his full copyright protection remains intact and inviolate unless he should elect to diminish the protection and term afforded by it by voluntarily registering under the provisions of the Registered Designs Act.

Under design registration laws of some other countries, protection is afforded for a 5-year term plus two renewable terms of 5 years each. I do not think that American nationals should be placed in a less advantageous position than foreign nationals if Congress enacts registered design legislation.

In other words, my proposal undertakes to provide protection for commercial interests concerned only in short-term and limited protection for ornamental designs without unfairly or unjustly injuring or adversely affecting copyright interests which are satisfied with the full protection and term now afforded copyrights under the existing law of our country.

I do not believe that Congress should upset or diminish the present protection afforded by our copyright laws to legitimate copyright interests. Provision can be made for registered commercial designs without prejudice, injury, or hurt to copyright owners. The bill I am introducing makes provision for that just and fair result.

SELECT COMMITTEE TO RECOMMEND LEGISLATION RELATING TO THE JURISDICTION OVER AMERICANS EMPLOYED BY, OR ACCOMPANYING, OUR ARMED FORCES OVERSEAS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, in four cases yesterday, the Supreme Court freed Americans convicted of baby murder in Germany, wife murder in France, larceny in Morocco, and sodomy in Berlin. Earlier, the Supreme Court ordered the release of two ladies, if they deserve that appellation, who killed their husbands while the latter were serving with the U.S. military forces abroad.

The basis for the Court's ruling in every case was that civilians accompanying the Armed Forces overseas are not subject to trial under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. This means that unless such defendants are turned over to the French, the Germans, and the Moroccans, as Private Girard was turned over to the Japanese, they will go completely unpunished for their crimes.

There is no law in the books now which gives the U.S. Federal courts jurisdiction over Americans who commit such offenses overseas. With the ruling that these people cannot be tried by court martial, our Government is powerless to act against them unless we turn them over to local authorities, even where no foreign nationals are involved, which would obviously be distasteful to all concerned.

This decision directly affects the safety of almost half a million Americans accompanying our Armed Forces overseas and could lead to many potentially very serious international incidents. In addition, it offends our whole concept of justice to permit such offenders to go scot free.

Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference, a resolution creating a select committee of the Senate empowered to explore the desirability of amending laws and treaties relating to the jurisdiction of Federal courts over Americans employed by or accompanying our Armed Forces overseas.

The select committee I am proposing would consist of seven members, at least two of whom would be selected from each of the following Senate Committees: Judiciary, Armed Services, and Foreign Affairs. The select committee would be directed to make a final report to the Senate no later than June 1 of this session, which should still leave time for final action on any new legislation required prior to adjournment.

Mr. President, I hope that this matter can be acted upon by the Senate before any more of these offenses occur.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 253) was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Whereas the United States Government now maintains, and can be expected to continue to maintain, military and civilian installations throughout the world, at which United States personnel must serve as members of the Armed Forces and at which civilians, both United States and foreign, must be employed by the United States, and to which installations and outposts such persons will be accompanied by dependents; and

Whereas the presence of such personnel at such installations has raised questions as to the jurisdiction of military and civilian courts of the United States, and of courts of foreign nations, over such personnel, which affect the constitutional rights of such personnel and the security of the United States; and

Whereas Congress has enacted legislation, and the United States has entered into treaties, defining the jurisdiction of courts over such personnel; and

Whereas recent events have revealed such inadequacies in these statutes and treaties that the rights of individuals, the public interest and the security of the United States have been seriously threatened; and

Whereas existing statutes and treaties affect the Department of Defense, the Department of State, and the Judiciary: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That a select committee of the Senate be appointed by the President of the Senate, which is authorized and directed to conduct an inquiry, to take evidence, to review existing statutes and treaties, to make findings and recommendations, legislative or otherwise, and to report to the Senate not later than June 1, 1960, with reference to the desirability of amending existing statutes and treaties and of enacting new legislation relating to the jurisdiction of courts of the United States over persons employed by, or accompanying the Armed Forces of the United States outside the territorial limits of the United States, with particular reference to (1) the Uniform Code of Military Justice, and (2) existing statutes relating to crimes committed outside the territorial limits of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That such select committee shall be composed of seven members, at least two of whom shall be selected from the membership of each of the following Senate committees: Committee on Armed Services, Committee on Foreign Relations, and Committee on the Judiciary.

STUDY OF IMPACT ON NATIONAL ECONOMY OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT DISPUTES AND OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING GENERALLY

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I submit, for appropriate reference, a resolution which would create a bipartisan select committee composed of eight members chosen in equal number from the Committees on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and Labor and Public Welfare, who would be charged with the duty of conducting an investigation and study of the impact of labor-management disputes and of collective bargaining generally on the national economy, the effects thereof on the well-being of the American public as a whole, and to determine whether any changes are required in our Federal laws in order to protect the national economy and to safeguard the interests of the public.

In 1935, with the adoption of the Wagner Act, it became the national policy to encourage the practice and procedure of collective bargaining. In establishing this policy, it was the primary concern of the Congress, by granting specific benefits to labor unions, to equalize the strength of employees in their economic relations with their employers. In 1947, believing that the scales had tilted too far in the opposite direction, Congress enacted the Taft-Hartley law to provide certain protections for employers against the enormously increased strength of the unions. And finally, in 1959, Congress, in adopting the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, commonly known as the Landrum-Griffin Act, established certain specific safeguards for rank-and-file union members against abuses by their unions and union leaders.

In enacting this legislation over the last quarter of a century, the basic policy of encouraging collective bargaining was always left intact, and the Congress assumed that the reforms provided in the law for the benefit of specific categories of the American public were necessarily in the interest of the public as a whole.

But the recent steel strike has caused considerable uneasiness among large numbers of the citizenry. In the face of the unending inflation which has persisted since the end of World War II, many are asking whether our public policy and legislation dealing with labor-management relations are really adequate to safeguard the public interest. Some are wondering, whether in its zeal to encourage collective bargaining, Congress has not created a condition in which the public interest is forgotten and only the interests of the parties to the negotiations receive any legislative protection, or even attention.

I myself have experienced these doubts. So in an effort to learn more about this problem, I requested several Government agencies for information and data concerning the impact of work stoppages and labor-management contract settlements on the national economy and their effect on the public interest. I was shocked to discover that not a single Government agency is engaged in conducting studies along these lines. A significant aspect of one of the most important domestic problems facing our country is being completely ignored. I therefore came to the inescapable conclusion, that unless the Congress itself engages in such an investigation and study, none will be made.

In my opinion, the basic question is this: How is the public interest to be effectively protected, not only in those labor-management controversies which result in interruptions of production, but in the settlements and agreements which result from the normal and peaceful procedures of collective bargaining?

Mr. President, if we do not presently devote some thought and study to finding a solution to this problem, we may, in the next national emergency resulting from a labor dispute, find ourselves confronted with an overwhelming and uninformed demand for extensive and permanent intervention and participation by the Federal Government in the settling of labor disputes and the writing of collective bargaining agreements. That would mean the end of our free enterprise system. But I am confident that an answer can be found which will be consistent with our political and economic tradition. It is for that reason I propose that the Congress investigate and study the situation.

The problem is fundamentally an economic one. That is why I ask that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce participate. But it also involves the relations between labor and management, and hence requires the attention of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare as well. It affects all of us beyond all partisan considerations, and therefore, as I have provided, it should be approached on a bipartisan basis.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 254) submitted by Mr. GOLDWATER was received and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as follows:

Resolved, That there is hereby established a select committee which is authorized and directed to conduct an investigation and study of the impact of labor-management disputes and of collective bargaining generally on the national economy, and the effects thereof on the well-being of the American public as a whole, and to determine whether any changes are required in the laws of the United States in order to protect the national economy and to safeguard the interests of the public.

SEC. 2. (a) The select committee shall consist of eight members to be appointed by the Vice President, selected in equal numbers from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and two members from each committee shall be Members of the majority and two of the minority of the Senate. At its first meeting, to be called by the Vice President, the select committee shall select a chairman and vice chairman, and adopt rules of procedures not inconsistent with the rules of the Senate.

(b) Any vacancy shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments.

SEC. 3. (a) The select committee shall report to the Senate by January 31, 1961, inclusive, and shall, if deemed appropriate, include in its report specific legislative recommendations.

(b) Upon the filing of its final report the select committee shall cease to exist.

SEC. 4. For the purposes of this resolution the select committee is authorized to (1) make such expenditures from the contingent fund of the Senate; (2) hold such hearings; (3) sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjournment periods of the Senate; (4) take such testimony; (5) employ on a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants, and (6) with the prior consent of the executive department or agency concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, employ on a reimbursable basis such executive branch personnel, as it may deem necessary and appropriate; and further, with the consent of other committees or subcommittees, work in conjunction with and utilize their staffs, as it shall be deemed necessary and appropriate in the judgment of the chairman of the select committee.

SEC. 5. The expenditures authorized by this resolution shall not exceed $———, and shall be paid upon vouchers by the chairman of the select committee.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. YARBOROUGH submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 2436, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. BEALL (for himself, Mr. BYRD of Virginia, and Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to Senate bill 2436, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 2436, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. THURMOND submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 2436, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CONSERVATION OF ANADROMOUS FISH SPAWNING AREAS IN SALMON RIVER, IDAHO—AMENDMENT

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], I submit an amendment to be proposed to Senate bill 2586, which I call the Salmon River preservation bill.

This bill is now pending before the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. When I introduced it last year, it was drafted by its terms to prohibit the Federal Power Commission from licensing any dam on the Salmon River in Idaho which would have a more restrictive effect upon the passage of anadromous fish than any existing dam already constructed on the Columbia River downstream from the mouth of the Salmon River. It also provided protection for the reproduction of the salmon in the upper reaches of the Salmon River and its tributaries, by prohibiting the construction, under FPC license, of any dam, regardless of its height, which would flood the established spawning grounds of these fish. The bill also required the Secretary of the Interior to report to the Congress any developments in fish passage facilities or techniques, which, in his judgment, would justify changing or lifting the restrictions contained in the proposed law.

The amendment I am submitting today is intended to further strengthen the original bill. The language is changed to prohibit the licensing of any dam on the Salmon River, whether high or low, and whether or not such dam would prove more or less restrictive to the passage of salmon than existing downstream structures. As amended, the bill would keep this famed wilderness river open and unobstructed until such time as the fish passage problem has been satisfactorily solved.

The nursery areas for Chinook salmon in Idaho are found in the high mountain valleys of the central part of the State. The Middle Fork of the Salmon, widely known as "the river of no return," runs almost entirely through primitive areas from its headwaters in Bear Valley, including its tributaries, Sulphur Creek, Marsh Creek, Loon Creek, and Big Creek. The main Salmon, which rises in the uplands of the Sawtooth Mountains, and its tributaries like Yankee Fork Creek, the Pahsimeroi, and the Lemhi, also have retained their natural character.

This vast nursery area is of immense significance to the great anadromous fish resource of the Northwest. No other river system contributes so greatly to the Chinook runs. No other river system has so long escaped the works of man.

No amount of protection in the spawning areas avails us if the fish cannot get to them. The people of the region appreciate this fact. They want the Salmon River preserved. The support for the basic objective of my bill expressed at the hearing which the distinguished Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT], held at Lewiston, Idaho, last November, was overwhelming. More than 50 witnesses testified, and their testimony was eloquent. But a number of these witnesses expressed concern that the original bill did not go far enough to accomplish its objective.

While the low dams now in existence downstream from the mouth of the Salmon do not prevent the passage of the parent fish or of the fingerlings, the evidence was that they do exact a toll. In its cumulative effect, this toll may become very damaging. The attrition of a series of low dams, were they to be built on the Salmon River, would, in this same cumulative effect, seriously endanger the anadromous fish runs, the experts said.

This amendment would meet the objection by prohibiting the construction of any dam on the Salmon River, whether high or low, until such time as the fish problem has been solved.

Solutions to the fish problem are being sought vigorously, for it is now widely appreciated that the anadromous fishery resource in the Columbia River Basin is a major natural resource. Gen. E. C. Itschner, Chief of Engineers, gives as his opinion that 15 years may be required to find solutions. If this bill is enacted, the Congress will express its will that the solution to the fish problem be in hand before any structures are built on the Salmon River, whether for power, flood control, or otherwise.

Fortunately, such a prohibition against dam construction on the Salmon River will have no detrimental effect on the economy or the growth of Idaho or the Northwest. For many years to come, we have sufficient damsites available on our other major rivers to provide all of the water storage, the power, the flood control, and the navigational benefits that the growing needs of the Northwest may require. By the time that these damsites, located mainly on rivers that have already been obstructed by dams, are fully developed, it is to be hoped that the fish passage problem will have been satisfactorily solved. In the meantime, if this bill is enacted into law, the Salmon River will have been kept open and its salmon run will have been saved.

The Clearwater River in Idaho was once a major Chinook stream, but in 1923, a small dam without facilities for the passage of the migrating fish was built at Lewiston. The Chinook no longer use the Clearwater in significant numbers, notwithstanding that a fish ladder has since been installed.

The lesson is obvious. When nature's inexplicable cycle in these fish is interrupted, it may well be beyond the power of man to undo the damage.

Mr. President, I shall exert every effort to secure favorable action on the Salmon River preservation bill—to save the river in its pristine state, while there is still time, and to keep the spawning beds in the vast wild areas of central Idaho unspoiled, until man's ingenuity learns the way to move the adult salmon upstream and the fingerlings downstream, through and around the barriers which he may install in the future.

Mr. President, I submit the amendment, and ask that it be appropriately referred. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill as it will read with the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from Idaho.

The bill (S. 2586) to provide for the conservation of anadromous fish spawning areas in the Salmon River, Idaho, as proposed to be amended, is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in recognition of the fact that the Salmon River and its tributaries constitute one of the principal spawning areas of anadromous fish from the Pacific Ocean, it is the purpose of this Act to prohibit, unless or until future developments justify a change in this policy, the authorization of dams and reservoirs or structures on the Salmon River that would restrict the passage of such fish to reach spawning areas or which would flood established spawning grounds.

SEC. 2. The Federal Power Commission shall not issue any permit, license, lease, or other authorization under the provisions of the Federal Power Act for any dam, reservoir, conduit, powerhouse, or other works for the storage or collection of water or the development of power on the Salmon River in Idaho in any case in which any such proposed works would restrict the passage of anadromous fish, or which would flood established spawning grounds.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Interior shall report to the Congress any developments in fish conservation or in the construction of dams and reservoirs that in his opinion justify amending the provisions of this Act.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY LABOR DISPUTES ACT OF 1960—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] may be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 2810) amending the National Labor Relations Act with respect to emergency labor disputes, introduced by me for myself and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] on January 14, 1960.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF LIBRARY SERVICES ACT—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], and the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] may be added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 2830) to amend the Library Services Act in order to extend for 5 years the authorization for appropriations, and for other purposes, introduced by me, on behalf of myself and other Senators, on January 14, 1960.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL FISHERIES CENTER, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 2840) to create a Federal planning commission to conduct a study of the possible establishment in the District of Columbia of a national fisheries center, introduced by me on January 18, 1960.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ISSUANCE OF GOLD MEDAL IN RECOGNITION OF SERVICES OF DR. THOMAS A. DOOLEY—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF JOINT RESOLUTION

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 13, 1960, the names of Senators HENNINGS, SYMINGTON, MANSFIELD, BIBLE, BEALL, PROUTY, FONG, SCOTT, CASE of South Dakota, HUMPHREY, ROBERTSON, HRUSKA, PROXMIRE, MURRAY, DODD, SPARKMAN, SCHOEPPEL, WILLIAMS of New Jersey, GRUENING, JACKSON, MCGEE, ALLOTT, BYRD of Virginia, KUCHEL, THURMOND, YOUNG of North Dakota, MOSS, NEUBERGER, CURTIS, BENNETT, COOPER, CASE of New Jersey, SALTONSTALL, RANDOLPH, CANNON, CLARK, KEATING, LONG of Hawaii, KEFAUVER, and YARBOROUGH were added as additional cosponsors of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 148) to authorize the President of the United States to confer a medal on Dr. Thomas Anthony Dooley III, introduced by Mr. BUSH (for himself and Mr. JAVITS) on January 13, 1960.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. JORDAN:

Address on the subject "The Challenge of Citizenship," by Senator RANDOLPH, delivered before the 14th National Conference on Citizenship, at the Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D.C., September 19, 1959.

By Mr. CASE of South Dakota:

Address entitled "State, School, and Child in Today's World," delivered by him at South Dakota Educational Association Convention, Aberdeen, S. Dak., November 4, 1959, and Spearfish, S. Dak., November 5, 1959.

By Mr. FULBRIGHT:

Telegram dated January 14, 1960, from the Soviet news agency Tass, addressed to Senator FULBRIGHT; and his reply to the aforementioned telegram, dated January 18, 1960, relating to Premier Khrushchev's address to Supreme Soviet.

By Mr. WILEY:

Article entitled "The Real Cost of Milk," published in the Dairy Record of January 13, 1960.

IS THE UNITED STATES TO BE SECOND BEST?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, this morning's Washington Post carries an article, written by the distinguished journalist, Walter Lippmann, which is a thoughtful and provocative analysis of this administration's national policies.

Mr. Lippmann observes, under a general heading of "The Second Best," that while our country is still much richer than the Soviet Union "we have fallen behind and are not holding our own in terms of national power, in overall military capacity, in the competition to pioneer in outer space, in the comparative rate of economic growth, and in education, which is the lifegiving principle of national power."

I commend this article to each Member of Congress, but even more do I commend it to the careful attention of each responsible member of this administration.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 19, 1960]

THE SECOND BEST

(By Walter Lippmann)

The President has been true to the principle he laid down in his first budget, which was submitted on January 21, 1954. "We will reduce" he said 6 years ago, "the share of the national income which is spent by the Government."

He has done that. Although the Federal Government is spending on the purchase of goods and services more than it did 6 years ago, this is a smaller share of the much increased national income. Even when we add the very considerable increased amount spent by local and State governments, the total is still a smaller share than it was in 1953, when the President was preparing his first budget.

So the President is entitled to say that he has been faithful to the principle he laid down when he began. During his term of office, the American people have been enjoying a larger share of a greatly enlarged national income. Never before in all history have so many people in any country had so much money to spend privately and as they saw fit.

This would be an unalloyed delight were it not for the disturbing fact that during these years of private prosperity the President has been presiding over the loss of American primacy among the great powers of the world.

There is no doubt that this country is still much richer than the Soviet Union. It may be, although no one knows, not any weaker than the Soviet Union. But we have fallen behind and are not holding our own in terms of national power, in overall military capacity, in the competition to pioneer in outer space, in the comparative rate of economic growth, and in education, which is the lifegiving principle of national power.

Why has this happened? Why are we challenged in this way when, in fact, the Soviet Union has a gross national product which is less than half of ours and a standard of living about a third as high as our own? Why is this richer country being pressed by a poorer country?

The reason, at bottom, is that in this period of cold war the President has adhered to a principle which would probably no longer be suitable even in a time of total peace. He has adhered to a principle which puts private comfort and private consumption ahead of national need. The President has spent his 7 years in office reducing the share of the national income devoted to public purposes. The challenge of the Soviet Union has been demanding an increase, not a reduction, of the share of the national income devoted to public purposes. We are falling behind in the race because we are not allowed to run.

The Soviet economy is growing at a rate which, estimated conservatively, is 6 percent per annum. Our economy has been growing at a rate of less than 3 percent. The Soviet economy is half as big as ours but it is growing twice as fast. This means that this year's increment of increase is about $12 billion in the U.S.S.R. and about $15 billion in the United States.

But, and this is the crux of the matter, the U.S.S.R. will use most, not all, of the $12 billion increase for national purposes, for armaments, for productive investments, for foreign aid, and for national education. We on the other hand, are acting on the Eisenhower principle, and are spending a greater share of our $15 billion increase for private purposes, for the making of consumer goods and of the factories and facilities connected with the making and use of consumer goods.

That is why the national power of the Soviet Union is forging ahead of the national power of the United States.

I have taken this analysis of the figures from several sources but chiefly from the brilliant and notable testimony before the joint committee of Congress given last autumn by Prof. W. W. Rostow, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The analysis is confirmed by the testimony of Mr. Allen W. Dulles based on the findings of the Central Intelligence Agency.

The concluding paragraph of Mr. Dulles' statement is one that we must all ponder and take to heart. It says "the major thrust of Soviet economic development and its high technological skills and resources are directed toward specialized industrial, military, and national power goals. A major thrust of our economy is directed into the production of the consumer type goods and services which add little to the sinews of our national strength. Hence, neither the size of our respective gross national products nor of our respective industrial productions is a true yardstick of our relative national power positions.

"The uses to which economic resources are directed largely determine the measure of national power."

I have quoted the last sentence of Mr. Dulles' statement because it states, so it seems to me, the fundamental issue which the country must meet. The President's controlling principle—that the Government should spend a smaller share of a growing national income—has as its consequence, in this age of cold war and national rivalry, that the country will have a smaller position of influence and power in the world. While it may be that the days of our primacy, which were brief, are ending, what must not be allowed to come to an end is our parity with the greatest powers. For on it depend many of the dearest hopes of mankind.

Nobody can say as yet when the Nation will become aroused to the realization that national duty must take precedence over private indulgence, that it is not possible to preserve our society by private affluence and public complacency.

The voices that will serve this country, and indeed save it, will be those of stern men demanding hard things. They may not as yet do well in the Gallup polls. They will be listened to sooner or later. For they will shatter the belief, now so prevalent among us, that affluence is greatness. It is not. In the history of human societies it has not seldom been the case that when riches were devoted to luxury it was the mark of their decline.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield briefly for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes, although I also wish to request the printing at this point in the RECORD of an editorial which appears in today's press.

Mr. GRUENING. I wonder whether it is the editorial which was published this morning in the Washington Post, and which constitutes a very thoughtful analysis of the inadequacies of the President's budget. I hope the Senator from Texas will also request that that editorial be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am about to do so.

Mr. President, the principal editorial of today's Washington Post deals similarly with this subject matter, in the context of the 1961 fiscal year budget. It, too, observes that there are objectives that may be more important to our national survival, growth, and welfare than budget surpluses.

I request unanimous consent that this editorial also be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 19, 1960]

THE CALL THAT NEVER CAME

The President said it all in his first sentence. "With this message, transmitting the budget of the United States for the fiscal year 1961, I invite the Congress to join with me in a determined effort to achieve a substantial surplus." From beginning to end it is as if nothing else mattered nearly so much. The administration's final energies apparently are to be consecrated to the attainment of a budget surplus. Seldom has its narrow view of Federal economic responsibilities and of the Nation's priority needs been more unabashedly acknowledged. A surplus would indeed be appropriate and helpful in fiscal 1961—but it ought not to be the focus of the Government's planning, as Mr. Eisenhower thus has made it.

It is difficult to see how or why the President thinks his budget attests to the strength of America's economy. The Treasury estimates of gross national product and of corporate earnings on which the $84 billion revenue forecast is founded are plainly ultraconservative. If there is any expectation—as there ought to be—that the Nation can or will experience relatively full employment in the next 18 months, receipts should be measurably higher. (Despite the steel strike, revenues this year are now expected to run $1.5 billion higher than foreseen a year ago, and it is likely that the Treasury again is playing it safe.)

As for spending the President's expenditure estimates hardly constitute an affirmation of faith in the Nation's capacities. The figures are the lowest of all the Eisenhower years in terms of national income—even if the conservative official forecasts are accepted. The $79.8 billion spending program would amount to just 18 percent of the national income, compared with 19 percent for the current fiscal year and an average of 20 percent for the years since 1954. Spending in the coming year could be increased by as much as $9 billion and not exceed the Eisenhower average, in these terms.

Thus a budget more in keeping with national needs in defense, education, research, public health and welfare, and foreign economic assistance would seem easily within reach on the only terms that count: the Nation's ability to pay for it. At truly full employment and with a minimum program of tax reform—including the postal rate and gasoline tax increases which the President properly insists upon—such a budget could be balanced and might well include a surplus for debt retirement.

Spending this year was depressed in so many areas of Federal activity that it is not surprising to find instances in which outlays for 1961 show slight increases. Given last year's policy of no new starts on water resources projects, for example, the 42 projects for which initial funds are proposed in the new budget look like progress. Measured against national needs, this is a faltering half step. The increased outlays for basic research of various kinds are extremely modest.

The aid-to-education programs contain little that is more realistic or workable than the proposals of a year ago. Here among all the challenges to national enterprise is where a substantial increase in Federal spending is not only desperately needed, but also would pay enormous dividends. And so on through the dreary recital: still no significant acceleration of nuclear power development, of urban renewal projects, of stream pollution control, of public housing, and of many other programs in which the national shortfalls are evident and growing.

The defense budget calls for reductions in overall weapons procurement, extensive cutbacks in the Strategic Air Command's bomber strength, and a 47-ship reduction in authorized naval strength. The snail's paced modernization of the Army is to be slightly accelerated, it appears, but nothing is projected for more adequate airlift or for the other requirements of an ample limited war capability. The increased procurement of intercontinental ballistic missiles is heartening but regrettably the major emphasis in the next 2 or 3 years must be on missiles relatively vulnerable to a surprise attack.

The reductions in bomber strength may simply be an accommodation to the realities of improved Russian defenses. But it ought not to be imagined that missiles are yet ready to take over the bomber's role. The budget begins to reflect the imminence—perhaps indeed the presence—of the much-advertised gap in American strategic power. A 50-percent increase in authorizations for the civilian space agency's programs may ultimately help to shorten the long Russian lead in this field, but this is by no means a "crash program" to achieve American parity in space exploration.

The proposed foreign economic aid programs add to impressive totals, but far too small a sum is yet being committed to the basic development programs which the have-not nations so desperately require to achieve the breakthrough to self-sustained growth. This makes all the more desirable the plan to focus economic aid in a few areas. Military aid appropriation requests are somewhat higher, but a decline in actual spending next year is forecast. The recommendations of the Draper committee for more expeditious modernization of NATO forces seem finally to be receiving recognition, however.

Few of the President's legislative recommendations are new. We have previously supported many of them, such as the proposal to equalize military retirement pay, to repeal the American reservation on the jurisdiction of the World Court and to remove the interest ceiling on Government bonds. These and several others deserve the close attention of Congress.

As for the budget itself, Congress has already greeted it on the familiar pattern. Representatives TABER and CANNON, of course, promise that it will be further reduced. A disappointing number of Democrats have contended themselves with observing that the postal rate and gasoline tax increases cannot be approved and that therefore the budget surplus may prove illusory. A few have suggested that urgent programs may get more funds, but last year's reduction in the funds for space exploration is not an encouraging omen. Until the vast sum of unmet national needs is faced, limited goals like the achievement of a surplus or the reduction of an indicated deficit will probably continue to shape Federal budgets.

The call to a peacetime greatness of national purpose comes hard. In President Eisenhower's 7 years it has not come at all. Now, with the outlines of the final chapter written there is little to do but frame the great issues anew for national reappraisal and, hopefully, a fresh start next January. In this budget message, the Republicans presumably have taken their ground. The appeal is narrow—and in these times, exceedingly dangerous.

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET MESSAGE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, the budget message sent to the Congress yesterday is inadequate in its provisions for education, for public health, for research and development, and for national defense; and it is also inadequate in its plans with respect to our position in, and our relationship with, the rest of the world.

A year ago this month the present administration admitted that it was actually planning to let the Soviet Union attain a long lead in the new weapons.

Today, so as to further our unprecedented life of luxury and consumer comforts, this administration further admits, through the proposed budget in question, that we are planning to pass over to the Soviets, leadership in such additional fields as education, technological progress, and production incident to the development of our natural resources.

In summary, therefore, this administration is now, in effect, planning that this Nation become a second-rate power; and all of the various reports by qualified individuals—the Gaither report and the Johns Hopkins, Stanford, and Rockefeller reports, and so forth, plus many statements by Allen Dulles, head of the Central Intelligence Agency—prove that to be true.

I have just returned from a trip to Africa, the Middle East, and Europe. Anyone who makes such a trip can see at first hand the decline in our prestige. What is nevertheless surprising, however, is the speed and degree of that decline.

If these conditions continue, it will not be long before the future of the United States will depend a great deal upon the concepts of justice and mercy as expressed by the rulers in Moscow and Peiping.

Today the United States is no longer the No. 1 military power.

If present policies and programs continue, tomorrow we shall be second also in economic and technological strength: and that unfortunate development can only grow as we plan to fall further behind in educational effort.

These compose the psychological forces which will be present at the peace table.

Recently a great author, formerly close to this administration, wrote that: "Power plus principles equal policy."

As we continue this sad relative decline in at least part of that formula, for all the world to see, it will be interesting to watch what concrete results are attained at the summit conference next May.

In an effort to justify this budget, there has been much talk about the danger of planning to place our future generations in debt. Is not that preferable to planning to place them in bondage?

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRUENING. I commend the distinguished Senator from Missouri for his excellent statement. Evidence of what the Senator has said about putting the United States in second place and Russia's gaining over us is being demonstrated in several aspects. We find in the type of budget sent to Congress yesterday very striking evidence of that kind.

Last year there was nothing in the budget for any power development on the Yukon River in Alaska. We managed to introduce an item of $100,000 to begin surveys of the greatest damsite left on the North American Continent, the Rampart Canyon, northwest of Fairbanks. The Corps of Engineers stated last year it could usefully utilize $100,000. When the item of $50,000 to which amount the corps' estimate had been reduced by the Congress, was placed in the public works bill and sent to the White House, it was vetoed. It was vetoed a second time when that item had been further reduced to $48,750.

Fortunately, Congress, with wisdom and vision, provided that amount so that a study of Rampart could be made. The study was begun. The geologists were on the job last fall. For fiscal 1961 the corps found it could use $350,000. This is not a great deal of money to request for a project of such importance and potential benefit—benefit not merely to Alaska but to our entire Nation. The budget, however, contains a pitiful item for that purpose, having reduced the amount to about one-fifth of that required.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 1 additional minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I congratulate the distinguished Senator from Alaska, who has always been interested in the physical, scientific, and technological development of the United States.

I think one way to further industrial development is by the development of hydroelectric power, in view of the fact that one of our great needs in the future will be fresh water. The Soviet Union continues to develop its water resources at an increasing rate. In addition, they have given the Arab Republic substantial assistance toward building the Aswan Dam.

I congratulate the Senator for bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I desire to add a word to the colloquy I have had with the distinguished Senator from Missouri, to point out the great contrast exhibited in the President's paltry recommendation that we appropriate only $75,000 for the development of the most important hydro site remaining in the Western Hemisphere under the American flag, whereas the Army Engineers have said they could usefully use nearly five times that amount, or some $350,000.

Mr. President, I was a member of a special Senate committee, representing both the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Public Works, which last fall visited Russia and Siberia. We were deeply impressed and at the same time appalled by the tremendous progress which the Soviet Government is making in harnessing its hydroelectric power. They are determined to overtake and outrun us in the economic race.

We saw on the Volga a dam, completed 2 years ago, which was larger in its power production than Grand Coulee, which, at the time of its completion, under the sponsorship of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt was the largest dam in the world, with an installed capacity of 1.9 million kilowatts. The dam we saw at Kuibyshev, on the Volga, had an installed capacity of 2.4 million kilowatts. It was completed 2 years ago.

Farther down on the river we saw already in operation, although not fully completed, a still larger dam at Stalingrad, with an installed capacity of 2½ million kilowatts.

When we went to Siberia, at Bratsk we saw nearing completion on the Angara River a dam almost twice as large, with an installed capacity of 4.5 million kilowatts.

Farther down on the river, at Novosibirsk, a dam is under construction which will have an installed capacity of 5 million kilowatts. These are only a few examples, and I am not going to take the time of the Senate now to go into details as to what the Kremlin is doing to develop its natural hydro resources. The details will be found in the very excellent report issued by the special subcommittee which made the trip to which I have referred. However, it is striking and shocking that while we ought to be worried about Soviet Russian progress, we are doing next to nothing about it. At the very same time, I repeat, we are denying proper progress and proper development to our own hydroelectric resources. At the rate of progress which may be anticipated from the budget's $75,000 item it will take 15 years to complete the rampart study. The Corps of Engineers, given the funds it needs, could complete it in 3 years.

The administration, which is asking for an increase in foreign aid spending in this same budget, an increase of nearly $1 million is authorizing surveys and studies, and construction of hydro dams in countries all over the world. This is indeed a shocking contrast. The Eisenhower administration takes the position that whatever is needed for development in foreign countries is desirable and sacrosanct. Congress has repeatedly been told by the White House not to cut a nickel from foreign aid, but that whatever is needed at home of a similar nature is wasteful, extravagant, and would unbalance the budget.

I think it is high time, Mr President, that we erect a standard which would make clear that the people of the United States are entitled at least to equal treatment with those in foreign countries. That is not a policy of which this administration approves, but it is one which the American people should insist upon, and I for one will do all within my limited powers to work toward that goal.

LINCOLN DAY WEEK—LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate and in order that Senators may be put on notice, I wish to announce that the leadership has an agreement concerning Lincoln Day absences.

I am pleased to announce that we shall expect no rollcalls during Lincoln Day week, following Wednesday, February 10. In other words, we will have a session Wednesday, February 10; and if we have a session on Thursday or Friday, we will not expect any rollcalls before the following Monday, the 15th. We may have sessions those days, but Members may arrange speaking engagements out of town after Wednesday, if they desire.

To repeat, Senators may feel free Thursday and Friday of that week. We will try to protect Members of the Senate from rollcalls on those days. We will expect rollcalls, if possible, not before February 15.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to express my own personal appreciation and that of Members on this side of the aisle for this courtesy. Lincoln Day dinners have now become traditional everywhere in the country, and the time and period over which they run have been expanded in recent years. This opportunity to attend them without missing any important record votes we deeply appreciate. I thank the majority leader for the courtesy. I appreciate he has a schedule in the Senate to maintain, that there is a heavy workload, that there are some impediments which make that schedule a little difficult to follow. That fact only sharpens my appreciation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator.

I should like the Senate to be on notice that after consideration of the pending bill, we shall probably consider Order No. 819, Senate bill 694, the authors of which are the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. That bill is to provide Federal assistance for projects which will demonstrate or develop techniques and practices leading to a solution of the Nation's juvenile delinquency control problems.

I wish the appropriate secretaries of the Senate would notify any interested Senators.

REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT'S COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the sixth annual report to President Eisenhower from the Committee on Government Contracts was recently made public. This report is somewhat different from the usual Government report in that it not only chronicles the Committee's activities and accomplishments of the past year, but also offers some assessments of the future in terms of the Committee's program and objectives.

The Government Contracts Committee, which is headed by Vice President NIXON, was established by President Eisenhower in 1953 and is charged with responsibility for monitoring the standard clause in all Government contracts which forbids discrimination in employment on Government projects on the basis of race, color, religion or national origin.

The Committee report demonstrates that commendable progress is being made in the removal of discrimination in Federal contract work. It also establishes a challenge to employers, educators, vocational counselors, and parents to assist the nonwhite segment of our labor force in acquiring the skills and training which will be needed in the promotion of the Nation's whole economy during the 1960's.

The theme of this report is set in the opening paragraph of its introduction, which reads:

> It is of paramount importance that all of our Nation's manpower should be effectively used. We cannot afford to neglect any part of the potential contribution of our nonwhite population. It comprises over 18 million people, or more than the total population of Canada.

The report places particular stress on the economic importance of the utmost utilization of the Nation's basic resource, manpower, which means that there is a great deal more involved than the moral righteousness of nondiscrimination in employment. It means that the Nation's economy cannot stand any waste of the skills and talents which are offered by the nonwhite segment of America's labor force.

Mr. President, I know that this report will be of interest to many Members. However, since copies of the full report are available at the Committee's office, I request that only the introduction to the report and an article in the New York Times summarizing its contents be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the introduction and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT'S COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

INTRODUCTION

The situation today and tomorrow

It is of paramount importance that all of our Nation's manpower should be effectively used. We cannot afford to neglect any part of the potential contribution of our nonwhite population. It comprises over 18 million people, or more than the total population of Canada.

The President's Committee on Government Contracts helps qualified minority group members to obtain equal job opportunities in work provided by Government contract funds. Thus, it aids our national economy today, and in the measure of its success it can help our Nation still more tomorrow.

To develop the Committee's program effectively we must relate it, of course, to the overall growth of our economy. We must also take note of emerging trends within the labor force to determine whether we are concentrating on the long-term problems as well as those which call for immediate corrective action. Occupational shifts within the labor force, resulting from our changing technology and growing population, make it essential that the Committee redouble its efforts to insure that the Nation's basic resource—manpower—is effectively used.

The labor force in the sixties

There will be an appreciable growth in the Nation's labor force through the next decade, with fairly rapid changes in its internal composition. According to recent studies by the U.S. Department of Labor, our labor force will probably expand from 73.6 to 86.1 million in the next decade. Further, in this net addition of 13.5 million workers, the major proportion will consist either of young workers, under 25 years, or older workers over 45. A small component of this increase, actually fewer than a million, will fall into what statisticians call the prime working group, those between the ages 25 to 44. This primary working group is the one which has had the most training and possesses most of the skills we need.

Since we will have to depend upon very young as well as older workers, the problems of vocational guidance, of training and retraining are of paramount importance.

Our nonwhite population increased more rapidly between 1940 and 1950 than our white population. The former increased 22 percent; the latter 14 percent. Census estimates of the composition of our labor force in 1958 show a very high proportion of Negro men under 20 and over 45. Further, Negro women of all ages have a higher rate of participation in the labor force. If these trends continue, there will clearly be a substantial increase in our nonwhite labor force. This increase will be concentrated in the younger and older male Negro worker and female Negro worker groups.

Employers who will still be looking for male, white, under age 45 workers will be in trouble in the next decade. These sought-for types of workers simply will not be available in the numbers required.

A further complication will arise from changes in the composition of the labor force. The Labor Department's projections for the 1960's show that the most significant increase in employment will be in occupations requiring more training and education. The American economy will require an increasee of nearly 50 percent in professional and technical occupations, 20 percent in the numbers of proprietors and managers, 25 percent in the clerical and sales force, 23 percent in the numbers of skilled craftsmen, and 25 percent more service workers. The increase projected for semiskilled workers is only 15 percent, however, and no increase is foreseen for laborers.

Importance of education

Workers entering the labor force tomorrow will face more demanding entrance requirements. It will become increasingly difficult for young workers without a high school education to obtain their first or entrance job, and when they are successful in obtaining it, to achieve promotion to better jobs. Yet 7½ out of the 26 million new workers who will be in the labor force in the 1960's will be without a high-school education, according to the Labor Department's projections—and a high proportion of these 7½ million workers will be Negroes.

While the differences in educational attainment between Negroes and whites have diminished, they have not been eliminated. Recent Census Bureau data indicate that 80 percent of white children between ages 14–17 are attending high school, while only 65 percent of Negro children in the same age group are enrolled.

The disparity in education which continues to handicap Negroes will become a more serious drawback as occupational needs develop in the next 10 years. Our national leaders, be they colored or white, will have to make added efforts to convince Negro parents to keep their children in school so that they can compete for employment more effectively.

Educational conferences

The Committee's educational activities have been aimed at this problem. The Youth Training-Incentives Conference of 1957 and the Minority Community Resources Conference of 1958 sought to inform Negro leaders throughout the Nation of the changing economic climate. We have been seeking their assistance to marshal the resources of the home, the church, the school and the community to impress Negro youth with the necessity for better educational preparation. The Committee also has conferred with school officials representing some 25 metropolitan areas with substantial Negro populations on the inadequacy of the vocational guidance provided for minority youth, in an effort to meet the demands of the present, and more important, the immediate future.

The Committee is seeking to stimulate the use of the National Defense Education Act of 1958 with its provision for special vocational guidance to help Negro youth to meet the demands of the changing labor market.

Employment trends

The greatest increases in employment will be in the professional, technical, managerial, clerical, sales, and service jobs. All these require preparatory training. The trend is unmistakable. In 1956, for the first time in the history of this country, white-collar jobs exceeded the number of blue-collar jobs in the American economy. The increase in white-collar jobs continues.

Even within the blue-collar job group new forces are operating which will create grave problems for the Negro worker unless he can adapt himself to these changes. Many factory jobs are being automated. To continue to hold even semiskilled positions, workers in the future will have to have a higher degree of literacy. These automated jobs require that the worker be able to read complex measuring instruments, maintain clearly detailed records, and in general operate machines which will be more demanding than today's production equipment.

White-collar jobs have never been readily available to Negroes. In 1958 approximately 12 percent of male Negroes were employed in professional, managerial, clerical, and other white-collar occupations as compared to 6 percent in 1940. However, in the same year almost 40 percent of male white workers were employed in these occupations.

The proportion of Negro women in white-collar positions presents an equally sharp contrast. In 1959 only 23,000 or nine-tenths of 1 percent were in sales positions as compared to 8 percent, or more than 1,500,000 white women. In clerical positions there were 7½ percent, or fewer than 200,000 Negro women as contrasted to 31.8 percent or nearly 6 million white women.

Most of the Government contractors within its jurisdiction are in the manufacturing industries. But labor force statistics show that job opportunities in manufacturing are decreasing. However, job opportunities in service, finance, and Government are increasing and will continue to do so through the next decade. The Committee will therefore emphasize the integration of minority groups into white-collar positions.

Direct consultations

A nondiscriminatory employment policy in itself does not lead to the achievement of an integrated work force. The employer must act to break through the cake of custom by making initial placements in positions traditionally denied to Negroes. Such deliberate breakthroughs are necessary because minority group workers are normally reluctant to risk the possibility of yet another turndown in applying for such jobs. The responsibility of a contractor in carrying on a merit employment policy cannot rest upon his simple declaration. The procedures involved in making such an initial breakthrough are often difficult, and the Committee has found that its assistance at this point is appreciated.

Emphasis is being placed on the program of direct negotiation with major contractors in order to facilitate this highly important first action in implementing a merit policy.

[From the New York Times, Dec. 27, 1959]

JOBS FOR NEGROES EXPECTED TO RISE—BUT LACK OF TRAINING MAY HURT THEM IN NEXT DECADE, ANTIBIAS GROUP REPORTS

(By Anthony Lewis)

WASHINGTON, December 26.—Negro workers will be needed for an expanding labor force in the next decade, but may suffer from lack of adequate education and training.

This was forecast today by the President's Committee on Government Contracts, which strives to end racial discrimination by companies doing work for the Government. It filed its sixth annual report with the President.

The report cited Labor Department statistics to show that the economy would need more and more white-collar and technical employees, and relatively fewer laborers and semiskilled production workers.

Negroes have always had trouble getting the more important jobs, the report noted. In 1958, almost 40 percent of male white workers had white-collar jobs, against only 12 percent of Negro men.

A SHARPER CONTRAST

The contrast was even sharper for women workers. About 40 percent of whites were in clerical or sales jobs, against 8 percent of Negro women.

The Committee indicated that racial prejudice was a major factor in keeping Negroes out of clerical, technical, and managerial work. For that reason, it said, it would emphasize integration into white-collar positions from now on.

Committee activities in opening white-collar jobs to Negroes have been disclosed recently. It has won what it terms "significant breakthroughs" by persuading several large southern employers to hire their first Negroes as secretaries, chemists, and for similar posts.

The report went beyond the question of racial barriers imposed by employers. It emphasized that Negroes must have the background and skill to deserve better jobs.

"While the differences in educational attainment between Negroes and whites have diminished," it said, "they have not been eliminated.

"Recent Census Bureau data indicate that 80 percent of white children between ages 14 and 17 are attending high school, while only 65 percent of Negro children in the same age group are enrolled.

"The disparity in education, which continues to handicap Negroes, will become a more serious drawback as occupational needs develop in the next 10 years."

CALLED VICIOUS CIRCLE

The problem is something of a vicious circle, the Committee indicated. Negroes will not be encouraged to finish high school and get further specialized training unless they have confidence that better jobs will be open to them, it implied.

Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, who is chairman of the Committee, issued a statement terming the report a challenge to the country.

"Pessimistic estimates with respect to the availability of trained Negro workers during the next decade can be reduced through education and training," he said.

"These estimates constitute a challenge to the Nation's educators, vocational guidance counselors, and employers, as well as to Negro students and parents.

"Added efforts must be made to help Negro parents to keep their children in school so that they can compete for employment more effectively."

The growing need for Negro workers was explained by the Committee in terms of population changes.

The nonwhite population of the country has been growing more rapidly than the white, the report said, and there will not be enough white employees, especially young men, for the estimated rise in the labor force from 73 million to 86 million in the next decade.

"Employers who will still be looking for male, white, under-age-45 workers will be in trouble in the next decade," the report said. "These sought-for types of workers simply will not be available in the numbers required."

But the real need, it emphasized, will be for more highly trained employees.

The Committee noted that in 1956, for the first time, white-collar jobs exceeded manual or blue-collar jobs. Even production workers will need a higher degree of literacy as factories become automated, the report added.

The Committee was set up to enforce a provision in Government contracts requiring a contractor to hire without regard to race. It has no real enforcement powers except publicity and persuasion.

Until recently it focused efforts on getting companies to agree in principle on nondiscrimination. Signs were posted and agreements made, but the Committee found that Negroes often were not hired except for menial work.

A new program, adopted since the appointment of Irving Ferman as Executive Vice Chairman last summer, has Committee officials persuading companies to take on their first Negro clerical and professional help.

The report lists several plants that have done so in the last year. Among them are the Martin Co. in Orlanda, Fla.; Southern California Edison Co. in Los Angeles; Kaiser Aluminum Co. in Baton Rouge, La.; and the Convair Division of the General Dynamics Corp. in Fort Worth, Tex.

A WELL-MERITED TRIBUTE TO DR. DOOLEY

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am pleased today to join with the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] and others in sponsoring Senate Joint Resolution 148. This joint resolution would authorize the President to present to the incomparable Dr. Thomas A. Dooley a special gold medal in recognition of his heroic services to the people of Vietnam, Laos, and other newly emerging nations.

The presentation of this medal provides a concrete means for the American people to express their admiration and high esteem for the dedicated humanitarian crusade of this man. Dr. Dooley's selfless efforts to wipe out disease and want among peoples least well equipped for such a fight is a shining example of the splendid American in action. His work has done much to raise America's standing in the world community and all of us should be grateful for his supreme work.

Because Dr. Dooley symbolizes the best that is in America, because he is working unceasingly to fight disease and ignorance in the less well developed nations of the world, and because the American people yearn for the opportunity to express their gratitude to him, this medal is a well-merited and fitting idea. I am delighted to join in sponsoring this joint resolution and hope it will receive the early and favorable consideration it deserves.

LYNDON JOHNSON "VICTORY" DEPLORED

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I commend to the careful and thoughtful reading of my colleagues an editorial carried in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on January 16, 1960. This editorial throws the editorial support of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch squarely behind those of us who are fighting for a strong and responsible Democratic Party program in the Senate.

Mr. President, no man can question the dedication to principle of this newspaper that has so brilliantly lived up to the legacy of Joseph Pulitzer who, on April 10, 1907, willed to the Post-Dispatch this great platform, and said:

I know that my retirement will make no difference in its cardinal principles, that it will always fight for progress and reform, never tolerate injustice or corruption, always fight demagogs of all parties, never belong to any party, always oppose privileged classes and public plunderers, never lack sympathy with the poor, always remain devoted to the public welfare, never be satisfied with merely printing news, always be drastically independent, never be afraid to attack wrong, whether by predatory plutocracy or predatory poverty.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the January 16, 1960, editorial be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

TOO MUCH POWER

Senator LYNDON JOHNSON'S victory over the hardy handful of liberal Democratic Senators who are trying to cut the majority leader's powers down to size is as unfortunate for the country as it is for the U.S. Senate and the Democratic Party. For what is fundamentally at stake here is whether the majority shall present a strong legislative program and fight for it vigorously, or whether it shall continue presenting only disjointed proposals which have been timorously watered down to avoid a Presidential veto.

The reforms which had been proposed were both fair and moderate. Senator GORE, of Tennessee, proposed that the Democratic policy committee, which decides when legislation shall be considered, should be enlarged from 9 to 15 Members by election, and should be so chosen thereafter, rather than appointed by the majority leader as it is now.

Senator CARROL, of Colorado, proposed that the steering committee, which assigns Democrats to other Senate committees, should be elected rather than, as now, appointed by the majority leader. Senators CLARK, of Pennsylvania, MCNAMARA, of Michigan, and DOUGLAS, of Illinois, proposed regular and frequent party caucuses, the best means by which every Senator can make his influence felt in majority action and become fully informed about what is going on.

The majority leader pulverized the proposals respecting committees with votes of 51 to a dozen or less. He turned aside the caucus proposal with his standard formula reply that he would call a caucus whenever a Senator asked for one and he thought it would be useful. All of which leaves the liberal Democratic Senators back where they were to start with, blocked by JOHNSON in fighting for what they believe to be the mandate of their electorates.

But the ranks of emboldened insurgents have grown remarkably in a short time. Last year Senator PROXMIRE, of Wisconsin, raised what was at first a lonely voice, though he was soon supported by Senators DOUGLAS, of Illinois, CLARK, of Pennsylvania, and MORSE, of Oregon. Now are heard also HUMPHREY and MCCARTHY, of Minnesota, MONRONEY, of Oklahoma, a leading student of parliamentary processes and coauthor of the Congressional Reform Act of 1946; and YARBOROUGH, of JOHNSON'S own State, Texas.

What they are up against is the necessity to regain for themselves and other Senators authority rightfully belonging to them which has become overconcentrated in the majority leader. It is such a struggle as the House of Representatives faced when it broke, in 1910, the stranglehold of "Czar" Cannon, of Illinois, its Speaker.

The fact that Senator JOHNSON can muster a crushing vote against the rebels does not necessarily mean that all who voted on his side are particularly happy to have him dictate. Many others may be disturbed by this excess of power, but restrained by the knowledge that success in the Senate is not promoted by locking horns with the man who runs it. All this only emphasizes the courage of those who have spoken out. The making of majority decisions by the majority, instead of by Senator JOHNSON, is an objective worthy of some risk; it is also one which must be attained.

INCREASE IN ALASKAN FREIGHT RATES

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, one of the interesting phenomena of our time is the striking disparity between the pronouncements and the actions of this administration, and the contrast between its words and its deeds.

A few days ago we heard, in the state of the Union message of President Eisenhower, an injunction to the American people to fight inflation, as he said, as they would fight a fire imperiling their home. That was a very fine sentiment. Almost before the echoes of his urgent injunction to fight inflation died away, one of his executive agencies, the Federal Maritime Board, took one of the most inflationary actions imaginable.

Without granting a prior hearing, which was requested by the people of Alaska, by the Governor of Alaska, and by the Alaskan delegation, it granted a 10-percent increase in freight rates to the Alaska Steamship Co. and other carriers, which provide the only means of transportation of freight to Alaska, this increase coming on top of a 15-percent increase granted less than 2 years ago, thereby making a total increase of 26½ percent in these rates.

It is true that a hearing has been granted after the event, with the understanding that until the Commission makes its finding, the amounts of the increase will be held in escrow, and if the increase is found unwarranted, the amount thus retained will be returned to the shippers. But that is a striking example of putting the cart before the horse, or, let us say, of imprisoning people before trial with the understanding that if they are found innocent, they will then be let out of jail. It will do no good to the consumers of Alaska, to whom these increases are passed on, to have refunds made to the shippers. That was pointed out most specifically to the Federal Maritime Board before its members made their decision. They were particularly reminded of President Eisenhower's fervent injunction to fight inflation. Our delegation's plea fell on deaf ears. Already the cost of transported articles has gone up in Alaska and the inflationary spiral launched. It is no more possible to stop it, no matter whether the ultimate decision calls for reduction, than it is possible to get the genie back into the bottle.

Two days later another such increase was projected by the Government in a case in which no private shipper is involved. It involves the Alaska Railroad, which is a wholly owned Government enterprise. In other words, the Government itself is raising the rates on one of its own activities, without immediate inflationary consequences.

The Alaska delegation in Congress has received no official announcement of this action. We learned of it through the Alaska newspapers. When reading of it a week ago I sent a telegram of protest to Secretary Seaton, asking why this was to be done, and why no hearing had been held or scheduled.

Yesterday I was visited in my office by two Alaskans who both happen to be outstanding Republicans. They live along the rail belt, and are adversely affected by the increase as will all Alaskans who live in the central part of Alaska. They pointed out that the result would be to increase the cost of living, and they expressed their view that hearings should be held. So, having received no reply to my previous wire, I sent to the Secretary of the Interior another telegram, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 18, 1960.

HON. FRED SEATON,
Secretary of the Interior,
Department of the Interior,
Washington D.C.:

On Wednesday, January 13, I sent you a telegram protesting against the information received only through newspapers that the Alaska Railroad was announcing a rate increase and protesting this as a direct violation to the view expressed a few days earlier by President Eisenhower in his state of the Union message when he said, "We must fight inflation as we would a fire that imperils our home."

I have just talked to two Alaska businessmen who are directly affected not merely by the 10-percent water transportation increase which was granted without a hearing by the Federal Maritime Board on Sunday but by the railroad increase. One is Mr. John B. Coghill, a general store merchant of Nenana, who is also a member of the State Senate in which body he happens to be the minority leader. He feels that this is an increase which is totally unwarranted and will add to the further high cost of living in Nenana. He expressed surprise that this proposal had been made without a hearing. The other visitor was Mr. John H. Clawson, who has a steel fabricating plant in Anchorage. He happens also to be an appointee of this administration on the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission. He points out that his steel products will have to go up in price because of the increased water rate from Seattle to Seward and again because of the increased rail rates over the railroad between Seward and Anchorage and beyond as his products are distributed by railroad to the interior.

What justification is there for this increase in rates without a full hearing to which the merchants, shippers, and consumers along the Alaska rail belt can be heard?

ERNEST GRUENING,
U.S. Senator.

PREDICTION OF BUSINESS FAILURES DURING 1960

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the popular commentator on economic affairs, Sylvia Porter, whose column appears in the Evening Star, has written another thoughtful article which appeared in yesterday's evening edition of the Star.

Miss Porter very correctly, in my judgment, outlined the situation faced by the typical small or new business in these days of tight money and high-interest rates.

Miss Porter predicts business failures at a rate of more than 300 per week as 1960 unfolds as a year of prosperity for some and extreme difficulty for others.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article by Sylvia Porter which appeared in the Evening Star for January 18, 1960, be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAVE OF SMALL FAILURES DUE

A wave of bankruptcies among small businessmen is due this year.

The number of small business failures is heading for the highest level since the depression thirties. It's almost certain that 1959's total of 14,000 bankruptcies will be topped. It's almost certain that businesses will be dying at a rate of more than 300 a week as the year rolls on.

The ironic explanation lies in the very fact of prosperity. The economic boom is bringing on the most severe money squeeze in over a generation, and this credit pinch will spell disaster for smaller concerns.

A second explanation lies in the upsurge in competition, older firms without the know-how to compete successfully in a rough period and tender infants without adequate credit lines will die.

I am not guessing about this trend. The background of prosperity and tight money is unmistakable now.

Against this background, all I am doing is making a simple—and conservative—projection of Dun & Bradstreet's authoritative compilations of the total and type of failures which occurred in 1959.

As always in a boom cycle, thousands of enthusiastic but inexperienced individuals try to realize the American dream of going into business for themselves.

But the significant fact is that in this boom, credit is becoming tougher and increasingly expensive to get.

A big, established corporation can get credit. Even if it can't get all it wants, it will have the financial connections to raise what it must have to compete and grow.

But the smaller businessman? The Nation's banks aren't organized to supply him with risk capital, and in this era of tight money they understandably favor their long-standing, safe customers.

The capital markets aren't set up to provide him at tolerable cost with the long-term funds he needs to grow.

The revolutionary system of small business investment companies created by law in 1958 to help finance small business has so far been an appalling flop.

And even if a small firm can get a loan, the cost in many instances may be just too steep. With the bluest of blue-chip companies paying close to 6 percent for loans, the charges—plus extras—to a little, marginal concern may be unbearable.

Most vulnerable will be merchandising and food stores, high-cost service shops, businesses in the $5,000 to $25,000 range. Killing them will be not only their experience, but also their inability to get the cash imperative if they are to compete and grow.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if some way is not found by this Democratic Congress to reverse the tight money, high interest rate policy of the Eisenhower administration and the Federal Reserve System, I am apprehensive that the happy predictions of many other writers on economic affairs will prove to have been without sufficient justification.

CIVILIANS AND COURTS-MARTIAL

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I believe the Supreme Court decisions handed down yesterday are sound constitutional law and do not create a frightening legal no man's land for the criminal prosecutions of Americans with our Armed Forces overseas.

I believe it is possible to maintain necessary discipline and support for American defense operations outside the United States at the same time we are preserving basic constitutional rights of Americans.

Since the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, of which I am chairman, has been studying the subject of "Civilians and Courts-Martial" for over 2 years, I am asking the Secretary of Defense and the Attorney General of the United States to present their views on dealing with the situation as a result of the Supreme Court decisions.

I ask unanimous consent to have included as a part of my remarks at this point in the RECORD, the texts of the Supreme Court decisions, including concurring and dissenting opinions; copies of my letters to the Secretary of Defense and the Attorney General; and a brief public statement I issued today.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—NOS. 21 AND 37, OCTOBER TERM, 1959—MCELROY, SECRETARY OF DEFENSE, ET AL., PETITIONERS, v. UNITED STATES EX REL. DOMINIC GUAGLIARDO; ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE U.S. COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT—BRUCE WILSON, PETITIONER v. MAJ. GEN. JOHN F. BOHLENDER, COMMANDER, FITZSIMONS ARMY HOSPITAL; ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE U.S. COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE TENTH CIRCUIT

(January 18, 1960)

(Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the Court.)

These are companion cases to No. 22, Kinsella v. Singleton, and No. 58, Grisham v. Hagan, both decided today. All of the cases involve the application of article 2(11)[1] of the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Here

[1] Article 2. The following persons are subject to this chapter:

"(11) Subject to any treaty or agreement to which the United States is or may be a party or to any accepted rule of international law, persons serving with, employed by, or accompanying the Armed Forces outside the United States and outside the following: that part of Alaska east of longitude 172° west, the Canal Zone, the main group of the Hawaiian Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands."

its application to noncapital offenses committed by civilian employees of the Armed Forces while stationed overseas is tested.

In No. 21 the respondent, a civilian employee of the Air Force performing the duties of an electrical lineman, was convicted by court-martial at the Nouasseur Air Depot near Casablanca, Morocco, of larceny and conspiracy to commit larceny from the supply house at the depot. Before being transferred to the U.S. Disciplinary Barracks, New Cumberland, Pa., respondent filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in the District Court for the District of Columbia alleging that the military authorities had no jurisdiction to try him by court-martial. This petition was dismissed (158 F. Supp. 171). The court of appeals reversed and ordered respondent discharged. It held that Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957), was binding as to all classes of persons included within the section and that each class was nonseverable (259 F. 2d 927). We granted certiorari, 359 U.S. 904, in view of the conflict with Grisham v. Hagan, 261 F. 2d 204.

In No. 37, petitioner, a civilian auditor employed by the U.S. Army and stationed in Berlin, was convicted by a general court-martial on a plea of guilty to three acts of sodomy. While serving his 5-year sentence, petitioner filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in the U.S. District Court for Colorado. The petition was dismissed and appeal was perfected to the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit. Prior to argument we granted certiorari[2] (359 U.S. 906).

We first turn to respondent Guagliardo's contention that article 2(11) is nonseverable. As desirable as it is to avoid constitutional issues, we cannot do so on this ground. The act provides for severability of the remaining sections if "a part of this act is invalid in one or more of its applications" (70A Stat. 640). The intention of Congress in providing for severability is clear, and legal effect can be given to each category standing alone. See Dorchy v. Kansas, 264 U.S. 286, 290 (1924).

We believe that these cases involving the applicability of article 2(11) to employees of the armed services while serving outside the United States are controlled by our opinion in No. 22, Kinsella v. Singleton, and No. 58, Grisham v. Hagan, announced today. In Singleton we refused, in the light of Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957), to apply the provisions of the article to noncapital offenses committed by dependents of soldiers in the armed services while overseas; in Grisham we held that there was no constitutional distinction for purposes of court-martial jurisdiction between dependents and employees insofar as application of the death penalty is concerned. The rationale of those cases applies here.

Although it is true that there are materials supporting prosecution of sutlers and other civilians by courts-martial, these materials are "too episodic, too meager, to form a solid basis in history, preceding and contemporaneous with the framing of the Constitution, for constitutional adjudication." Concurring opinion, Covert, 354 U.S. at 64. Furthermore, those during the Revolutionary period, on which it is claimed that court-martial jurisdiction rests, were all during a period of war, and hence inapplicable here. Moreover, the materials are not by any means one-sided. The recognized authority on courts-martial jurisdiction, after a careful consideration of all of the historical background, concluded: "That a civilian, entitled as he is, by article VI of the amendments to the Constitution, to trial by jury, cannot legally be made liable to the military law and jurisdiction, in time of peace, is a fundamental principle of our public law."[3] But it is contended that Ex parte Reed, 100 U.S. 13 (1879), is controlling because the forces covered by article 2(11) are overseas and therefore in the field. Examination of that case, as well as Johnson v. Sayre, 158 U.S. 109 (1895), however, shows them to be entirely inapposite. Those cases permitted trial by courts-martial of paymasters' clerks in the Navy. The Court found that such a position was "an important one in the machinery of the Navy," the appointment being made only upon approval of the commander of the ship and for a permanent tenure "until discharged." Also the paymaster's clerk was required to agree in writing "to submit to the laws and regulations for the government and discipline of the Navy." Moreover, from time immemorial the law of the sea has placed the power of disciplinary action in the commander of the ship when at sea or in a foreign port. None of these considerations are present here. As we shall point out subsequently, a procedure along the lines of that used by the Navy as to paymasters' clerk might offer a practical alternative to the use of civilian employees by the armed services. As was stated in the second Covert case, supra, at 23, "there might be circumstances where a person could be 'in' the armed services for the purposes of clause 14 even though he had not formally been inducted into the military."

The only other authority cited in support of court-martial jurisdiction appears to be opinions by the Attorney General and the Judge Advocate General of the Army. However, the 1866 opinion of the Judge Advocate General (cited in support of the Government's position) was repudiated by subsequent Judge Advocate Generals.[4] To be sure, the 1872 opinion of the Attorney General, dealing with civilians serving with troops in the building of defensive earthworks to protect against threatened Indian uprisings, is entitled to some weight. However, like the other examples of frontier activities based on the legal concept of the troops' being "in the field," they are inapposite here. They were in time of "hostilities" with Indian tribes or were in "territories" covered by entirely different considerations. See second Covert, at 12–13. Such opinions, however, do not have the force of judicial decisions and, where so "episodic," have little weight in the reviewing of administrative practice. Moreover, in the performance of such functions as were involved there, the military service would today use engineering corps subject to its jurisdiction. This being entirely practical, as we hereafter point out, as to all civilians serving with the Armed Forces today, we believe the Toth doctrine, that we must limit the coverage of clause 14 to "the least possible power adequate to the end proposed," 350 U.S., at 23, to be controlling.

In the consideration of the constitutional question here we believe it should be pointed out that, in addition to the alternative types of procedure available to the Government in the prosecution of civilian dependents and mentioned in Kinsella v. Singleton, supra, additional practical alternatives have been suggested in the case of employees of the armed services. One solution might possibly be to follow a procedure along the line of that provided for paymasters' clerks as approved in Ex parte Reed; supra. Another would incorporate those civilian employees who are to be stationed outside of the United States directly into the armed services, either by compulsory induction or by voluntary enlistment. If a doctor or dentist may be drafted into the armed services (50 U.S.C. App. sec. 454(i), extended, 73 Stat. 13); Orlioff v. Willoughby, 345 U.S. 84 (1953), there should be no legal objection to the organization and recruitment of other civilian specialists needed by the armed services.

Moreover, the armed servics presently have sufficient authority to set up a system for the voluntary enlistment of specialists. This was done with much success during the Second World War. "The Navy's Construction Battalions, popularly known as the Seabees, were established to meet the wartime need for uniformed men to perform construction work in combat areas" 1 Building the Navy's Bases in World War II (1947) 133. Just as electricians, clerks, draftsmen, and surveyors were enlisted as "specialists" in the Seabees, id., at 136, provisions can be made for the voluntary enlistment of an electrician (Guagliardo), an auditor (Wilson), or an accountant (Grisham). It likewise appears entirely possible that the present "specialist" program conducted by the Department of the Army[5] could be utilized to replace civilian employees if disciplinary problems required military control. Although some workers might hesitate to give up their civilian status for Government employment overseas, it is unlikely that the Armed Forces would be unable to obtain a sufficient number of volunteers to meet their requirements. The increased cost to maintain these employees in a military status is the price the Government must pay to comply with constitutional requirements.

The judgement in No. 21 is affirmed and the judgment in No. 37 is reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—NOS. 21, 37, 22 AND 58, OCTOBER TERM, 1959—MCELROY, SECRETARY OF DEFENSE, ET AL., PETITIONERS v. UNITED STATES EX REL. DOMINIE GUAGLIARDO; ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT—BRUCE WILSON, PETITIONER, v. MAJ. GEN. JOHN F. BOHLENDER, COMMANDER, FITZSIMONS ARMY HOSPITAL; ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE TENTH CIRCUIT—KINSELLA, WARDEN, APPELLANT, v. UNITED STATES EX REL. SINGLETON; ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF WEST VIRGINIA—ALBERT H. GRISHAM, PETITIONER, v. CHARLES R. HAGAN, WARDEN; ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE THIRD CIRCUIT

(January 18, 1960)

(Mr. Justice Whittaker, with whom Mr. Justice Stewart joins, concurring in part and dissenting in part.)

---

[2] Since the offense occurred within the U.S. area of control of West Berlin, the Government now contends that petitioner Wilson is amenable to the military government jurisdiction of an occupied territory. However the charges were drawn in terms of art. 2(11) power, and jurisdiction was sustained on that basis. Moreover the Court of Military Appeals refused to consider that issue when raised by the Government and the trial court did not rest its decision sustaining military jurisdiction over petitioner on that ground. This contention is consequently denied.

[3] Winthrop, "Military Law and Precedents" (2d ed. 1896), 143. See also Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 121, 123 (1866); Maltby, "Courts Martial and Military Law," 37; Rawle, "Constitution" (2d ed. 1829), 220; 3 Ops. Atty. Gen. 690; 5 id., at 736; 13 id., at 63.

[4] See 16 Ops. Atty. Gen. 13; id., at 48 Dig. Ops. JAG (1901), 563, Par. 2033; id. (1895), at 599–600, Par. 4; id. (1830), at 384, sec. 4.

[5] See Army Regulations 600–201, 20 June 1956, as changed 15 March 1957, and Army Regulations 624–200, 19 May 1958, as changed 1 July 1959.

In No. 22, one Joanna Dial (whose cause is prosecuted here by respondent Singleton), an American civilian wife accompanying her husband, an American soldier serving in Germany, was there tried and convicted in 1957 by a general court-martial for manslaughter in violation of Article 119 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice,[1] (10 U.S.C., sec. 919), and was sentenced to imprisonment for a term of 3 years. In No. 21, respondent Guagliardo, an American civilian employed as an electrical lineman by the United States Air Force at Nouasseur Air Base in Morocco, was there tried and convicted in 1957 by a general court-martial for conspiring to commit larceny from the stores of the Air Force in violation of Article 81 of the Code (10 U.S.C., sec. 881), and was sentenced to imprisonment for a term of 3 years. In No. 37, petitioner Wilson, an American civilian employed as an auditor by the United States Army in Berlin, Germany, was there tried and convicted in 1956 by a general court-martial for three acts of sodomy committed upon military personnel in violation of article 134 of the Code (50 U.S.C., sec 728), and was sentenced to imprisonment for a term of 5 years. In No. 58, petitioner Grisham, an American civilian employed as a cost accountant by the United States Army Corps of Engineers in Orleans, France, was there tried by a general court-martial for the capital offense of premeditated murder and convicted of the lesser included offense of unpremeditated murder in violation of article 118 of the Code (50 U.S.C., sec. 712), and was sentenced, as affected by clemency action of the Secretary of the Army, in 1957, to imprisonment for a term of 35 years.

Each of the accused persons objected to trial by the court-martial upon the ground that it had no jurisdiction to try him. After their convictions, sentences, and return to the United States, each sought release by habeas corpus in a Federal district court. Two were successful—Singleton (164 F. Supp. 707, D.C.S.D., W. Va.) and Guagliardo (259 F. 2d 927, C.A.D.C. Cir.)—but the other two were not—Wilson (167 F. Supp. 791, D.C. Colo.) and Grisham (261 F. 2d 204, C.A. 3d Cir.)—and the four cases were brought here for review.

These cases fall into three categories. No. 22, the Singleton case, involves a civilian dependent tried for a noncapital offense; Nos. 21 and 37, the Guagliardo and Wilson cases, involve civilian employees of the military tried for noncapital offenses, and No. 58, the Grisham case, involves a civilian employee of the military tried for a capital offense. Each claims that, being a civilian, he was not constitutionally subject to trial by court-martial but, instead, could constitutionally be tried by the United States only in an article III court, upon an indictment of a grand jury under the fifth amendment, by an impartial petit jury under the sixth amendment of the Constitution.

The cases present grave questions and, for me at least, ones of great difficulty. Our recent decision in Reid v. Covert (354 U.S. 1) makes clear that the U.S. Constitution extends beyond our Territorial boundaries and reaches to and applies within all foreign areas where jurisdiction is or may be exercised by the United States over its citizens—that when the United States proceeds against its citizens abroad "[i]t can only act in accordance with all the limitations imposed by the Constitution" (354 U.S., at 6).

The broad question presented, then, is whether our Constitution authorizes trials and punishments by courts-martial in foreign lands in time of peace of civilian dependents "accompanying" members of the Armed Forces and of civilians "employed by" the Armed Forces, for conduct made an offense by the Uniform Code of Military Justice, whether capital or noncapital in character.

The source of the power, if it exists, is article I, section 8, clause 14 of the Constitution.[2] It provides:

"The Congress shall have power. * * *

"To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

Pursuant to that grant of power, Congress by the act of August 10, 1956, c. 1041, 70A Stat. 36 et seq.—revising the preexisting Articles of War—enacted the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Article 2(11) of that code provides, in pertinent part:

"The following persons are subject to this chapter:

* * * * *

"(11) Subject to any treaty or agreement to which the United States is or may be a party or to any accepted rule of international law, persons serving with, employed by, or accompanying the Armed Forces outside the United States."

It is not disputed that existing treaties with each of the foreign sovereignties, within whose territory the alleged offenses occurred, permitted the Armed Forces of the United States to punish offenses against the laws of the United States committed by persons embraced by section 2(11) of the code. Arguments challenging the reasonableness of section 2(11) are presently put aside, for if clause 14 does not grant to Congress the power to provide for the court-martial trial and punishment of the persons embraced in article 2(11) of the code it may not do so, however reasonable. Reid v. Covert, supra, 354 U.S., at 74 (concurring opinion).

Did clause 14 empower Congress to enact article 2(11) of the Code? Certain aspects of that broad question have recently been determined in Reid v. Covert, supra, and though not a Court opinion. I consider that decision to be binding upon me.[3] In that case four members of the Court held that article 2(11) of the Code cannot constitutionally be applied to civilian dependents "accompanying" members of the Armed Forces outside the United States in time of peace, because, in their view, to do so would violate article III, section 2, and the fifth and sixth amendments of the Constitution; and two members of the Court, in separate concurring opinions, agreed with that result, but only with respect to capital offenses.

Like my Brother Clark who writes for the Court today, I am unable to find any basis in the Constitution to support the view that Congress may not constitutionally provide for the court-martial trial and punishment of civilian dependents for capital offenses but may do so for noncapital ones. Certainly there is nothing in clause 14 that creates any such distinction or limitation. Legalistically and logically, it would seem that the question is one of status of the accused person, and that courts-martial either do or do not have jurisdiction and, hence, power to try the accused for all offenses against the military law or for none at all. Sympathetic as one may be to curtailment of the awesome power of courts-martial to impose maximum sentences in capital cases, the question, for me at least, is the perhaps cold but purely legal one of constitutional power. There would seem to be no doubt that Congress may constitutionally prescribe gradations of offenses and punishments in military cases. The question is solely whether clause 14 has granted to Congress any power to provide for the court-martial trial and punishment of civilian dependents "accompanying," and civilians "employed by," the Armed Forces at military posts in foreign lands in time of peace. If it has, then Congress has acted within its powers in enacting section 2(11) of the code—otherwise not. Inasmuch as six members of the Court have held in Covert that Congress may not constitutionally provide for the court-martial trial and punishment of civilian dependents "accompanying the Armed Forces" overseas in peacetime in capital cases, and because I can see no constitutional distinction between Congress' power to provide for the court-martial punishment of capital offenses, on the one hand, and noncapital offenses, on the other hand, I conclude that the holding in Covert means that civilian dependents accompanying the Armed Forces in peacetime are not subject to military power, and that it requires affirmance of No. 22, the Singleton case.

But each of the three opinions supporting the conclusion reached in Covert was at points to limit the decision to civilian dependents. "[T]he wives, children and other dependents of servicemen cannot be placed in that category [of being 'in' the armed services for purposes of clause 14], even though they may be accompanying a serviceman abroad at Government expense and receiving other benefits from the Government" (354 U.S., at 23). "The mere fact that these women had gone overseas with their husbands should not reduce the protection the Constitution gives them" (354 U.S., at 33). See also 354 U.S., at 45 (concurring opinion of Frankfurter, J.), and 354 U.S., at 75–76 (concurring opinion of Harlan, J.). The main opinion carefully pointed out that "Mrs. Covert and Mrs. Smith * * * had never been employed by the Army, had never served in the Army in any capacity" (354 U.S., at 32).

There is a marked and clear difference between civilian dependents "accompanying the armed forces" and civilian persons "serving with [or] employed by" the armed forces at military posts in foreign lands. The latter, numbering more than 25,000 employed at United States military bases located in 63 countries throughout the world—mainly highly trained specialists and technicians possessing skills not readily available to the armed forces—are engaged in purely military work—as in the case of Guagliardo, employed as an electrical lineman by the Air Force to construct and maintain lines of communication and air field lighting apparatus and equipment, as also in the case of Wilson, an auditor employed to audit the accounts of the U.S. Army in Berlin, and as in the case of Grisham, employed as a cost accountant by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to assist in setting up a cost accounting system for the building of a line of communications from Pardeau, France, to Kossalater in the American-occupied section of Germany.

These civilian employees thus perform essential services for the military and, in doing so, are subject to the orders, direction, and control of the same military command

[1] The Uniform Code of Military Justice, 70A Stat. 36 et seq., will hereafter, for brevity, be called the "Code."

[2] This does not overlook the "necessary and proper" clause, art. I, sec. 8, clause 18, of the Constitution, but, in my view, that clause, though applicable, adds nothing to clause 14, because the latter clause, empowering Congress "To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," plainly means all necessary and proper rules for those purposes.

Mr. Justice Stewart is of the view that clause 14 must be read in connection with the "necessary and proper" clause, and agrees with the views expressed in Mr. Justice Harlan's separate opinion as to the applicability and effect of that clause.

[3] Although a member of the Court when the opinions in the Covert case were handed down, I was ineligible to and did not participate in the decision of that case because it had been argued, submitted and decided prior to my coming to the Court.

as the members of those forces; and, not infrequently, members of those forces who are assigned to work with and assist those employees are subject to their direction and control. They have the same contact with, and information concerning, the military operation as members of those forces and present the same security risks and disciplinary problems. They are paid upon the same payroll, and have the same commissary, housing, medical, dental, mailing, transportation, banking, tax exemption, customs benefits, border-crossing privileges, and other privileges as members of the Armed Forces. They are so intertwined with those forces and military communities as to be in every practical sense an integral part of them. On the other hand, civilian dependents accompanying the Armed Forces perform no services for those forces, present dissimilar security and disciplinary problems, have only a few of the military privileges, and generally stand in a very different relationship to those forces than the civilian employees. Nor should there be any confusion about the fact that the materials found in Covert to be "too episodic, too meager, to form a solid basis in history, preceding and contemporaneous with the framing of the Constitution, for constitutional adjudication" (354 U.S., at 64, concurring opinion), related, as did the whole case, to civilian dependents in particular, id., not to persons employed at foreign military bases to do essential military work. And I readily agree with the Court today that under the severability clause in the Code, 70A Stat. 640, "legal effect can be given to each category standing alone" (McElroy v. Guagliardo, ante, p. 638).

Determination of the scope of the powers intended by the framers of the Constitution to be given to Congress by clause 14 requires an examination into the customs, practices, and general political climate known to the framers and existing at that time. The first Articles of War in this country were those adopted by the Provisional Congress of Massachusetts Bay on April 5, 1775.[4] Those articles, initially governing the civilian army of farmers and tradesmen—the Minute Men—who were first involved in the War of the Revolution, were made applicable to "all officers, soldiers, and others concerned" (Winthrop 950). Article 31 provided:

"All sellers and retailers to a camp, and all persons whatsoever serving with the Massachusetts Army in the field, though not enlisted soldiers, are to be subject to the articles, rules, and regulations of the Massachusetts Army." Ibid.

The American Revolutionary Army initially was governed by Articles of War adopted by the Continental Congress on June 30, 1775.[5] Nine of the original 69 articles provided for the trial by court-martial of persons serving with the Army but who were not soldiers. Those articles were revised by the Continental Congress on September 20, 1776,[6] and, save for minor revisions not here pertinent, governed the Revolutionary Army during the remainder of the war.[7] Thirteen of those articles provided for the trial by court-martial of civilians serving with the Army such as "commissaries,"[8] "sutlers,"[9] "store-keepers,"[10] persons "belonging to the forces employed in the service of the United States,"[11] and persons "belonging to the forces of the United States, employed in foreign parts."[12] In 1778, a relevant addition was made. It provided, in pertinent part: "That every person employed either as commissary, quartermaster, forage master, or in any other Civilian Department of the Army shall be subject to trial by court-martial for neglect of duty, or other offense committed in the execution of their office." (Journals of the Continental Congress, vol. X, p. 72.) Wagon drivers "receiving pay or hire" in the service of the artillery were made subject to court-martial jurisdiction under the American Articles of 1775[13] and 1776.[14] Throughout the Revolutionary period, "drivers" and "artillery gunners" were civilian experts. "Horses or oxen, with hired civilian drivers formed the transport" for the cannon. Manucy, Artillery Through the Ages (G.P.O. 1949), p. 10. Their civilian status in Washington's Army is concretely shown by his writings.[15]

There was a protracted controversy in the Constitutional Convention over whether there should be a standing army or whether the militia of the various States should be the source of military power.[16] There was, on the one hand, fear that a standing army might be detrimental to liberty; on the other was the necessity of an army for the preservation of peace and defense of the country.[17] The problem of providing for essential forces and also of assuring enforcement of the unanimous determination to keep them in subjection to the civil power was resolved by inserting the provision that no appropriation for the support of the army could be made for a longer period than 2 years (art. I, sec. 8, clause 12), and by the continuance of the militia "according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." (Art. I, sec. 8, clauses 15 and 16, and amendment II.)[18]

It was in the light of this background and upon these considerations that the framers gave to the representatives of the people—the Congress—the power "To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces" (clause 14). That language was taken straight from the Articles of Confederation.[19] In respect thereto, Hamilton said in the Federalist, No. 23:

"These powers ought to exist without limitation; because it is impossible to foresee or define the extent and variety of national exigencies, and the corresponding extent and variety of the means which may be necessary to satisfy them."[20]

Soon after the formation of the Government under the Constitution, Congress, by the act of September 29, 1789 (c. 25, § 4, 1 Stat. 96), adopted the Articles of War which were essentially the articles of 1776. By that act, Congress—it is almost necessary to assume—approved the consistent practice of exercising military jurisdiction over civilians serving with the Armed Forces, although not actually soldiers. The first complete enactment of the Articles of War subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution was the act of April 10, 1806. Article 60 of that act (2 Stat. 366) reenacted the provisions for jurisdiction over sutlers, retainers, and "all persons whomsoever, serving with the armies of the United States in the field, though not enlisted soldiers." Provisions similar to article 60 have been made in all subsequent reenactments of the Military Code: In the revision of 1874 (Rev. Stat. (2d ed. 1878), p. 236 (art. 63)); in 1916 (39 Stat. 651); in 1920 (41 Stat. 787); and in the adoption of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (64 Stat. 109, codified in 70A Stat. 37, 10 U. S. C., sec. 802(11)).

In the 1916 general revision of the Articles of War, Congress used language which is substantially equivalent to that of article 2(11),[21] and it appears it did not consider

---

[4] Winthrop, "Military Law and Precedents," 947.

[5] Journals of the Continental Congress, vol. II, p. 111. Those articles, with additional articles enacted Nov. 7, 1775, are reprinted in Winthrop 953 et seq.

[6] Those articles are reprinted in Winthrop 961–971.

[7] The articles were prepared principally by John Adams. See John Adams, Works, vol. 3, pp. 83–84; Winthrop 22.

[8] Articles of War, Sept. 20, 1776, § IV, art. 6.

[9] Id., § VIII, art. 1.

[10] Id., § XII, art. 1.

[11] Id., § XIII, art. 9.

[12] Id., § XIII, art. 17.

[13] Articles of War, June 30, 1775, art. XLVIII; Winthrop 957, n. 19.

[14] Articles of War, Sept. 30, 1776, § XVI, art. I; Winthrop 970, n. 22.

[15] The civilian status of such persons is concretely shown by the report which Washington made to the Committee of Congress With the Army, on January 29, 1778; "As it does not require military men, to discharge the duties of Commissaries, Forage Masters, and Wagon Masters, who are also looked upon as the moneymaking part of the Army, no rank should be allowed to any of them, nor indeed to any in the departments merely of a civil nature. Neither is it, in my opinion proper, though it may seem a trivial and inconsequential circumstance, that they should wear the established uniforms of the Army, which ought to be considered as a badge of military distinction." Writings of Washington, vol. 10, at 379. (Emphasis added.)

Numerous instances of the exercise of military jurisdiction over civilians serving with the Army are detailed in Washington's Writings. A "Wagon Master" was so tried and acquitted on January 22, 1778. (Vol. 10, p. 359.) A "waggoner" was so tried and sentenced on May 25, 1778 (vol. 11, p. 487), and another on September 2, 1780. At the same time, an "express rider" was so tried and convicted. (Vol. 20, pp. 24–25.) On October 1, 1779, a "Commissary of Issues" and a "Commissary of Hides" were tried by court-martial. (Vol. 16, pp. 385–386.) On September 27, 1780, another "waggoner" was so tried and convicted. (Vol. 20, p. 96.) On December 16, 1780, another "commissary" and also a "barrack master" were so tried. (Vol. 21, p. 10, and pp. 22–23.) Numerous other court-martial trials of civilians serving with the Army are recited in vol. 10, p. 507; vol. 12, p. 242; vol. 13, pp. 54, 314; vol. 21, p. 190.

[16] Prescott, "Drafting the Federal Constitution" (1941), pp. 515–525; 5 Elliott's Debates 443–445.

[17] Glenn and Schiller, "The Army and the Law," pp. 14, 18–20.

[18] The basis of this conclusion was summarized by James Madison in the Federalist, No. 41:

"Next to the effectual establishment of the Union, the best possible precaution against danger from standing armies, is a limitation of the term for which revenue may be appropriated to their support. This precaution the Constitution has prudently added."

[19] Prescott, "Drafting the Federal Constitution" (1941), p. 526; 5 Elliott's Debates 443.

[20] Hamilton, aide-de-camp to Washington and a distinguished army officer, undoubtedly knew that civilians serving with the army were commonly subjected to court-martial judisdiction. The same must be presumed to have been known by most, if not all, of the members of the Constitutional Convention, for so many of them had been a part of the Revolutionary Army wherein that practice was commonplace.

[21] Article 2(d) of the 1916 articles provided that the following persons should be subject to the Articles of War:

"(d) All retainers to the camp and all persons accompanying or serving with the armies of the United States without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and in time of war all such retainers and persons accompanying or serving with the armies of the United States in the field, both within and without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, though not otherwise subject to these articles." This section was reenacted in 1920, 41 Stat. 767.

that any new concept was being adopted.[22] After full consideration by an eminent committee of experts, Congress, in 1956—recognizing that, although we are not at war, turbulent world conditions require large military commitments throughout the world—reenacted, in article 2(11), the provision that civilians "serving with" the armies of the United States "outside the United States" are subject to military jurisdiction, and it redefined that concept by adding the "employed by" classification.

Clause 14 does not limit Congress to the making of rules for the government and regulation of members of the Armed Forces. Rather, it empowers Congress to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces. The term "land and naval forces" does not appear to be, nor ever to have been treated as synonymous with members of the armed services.[23]

Viewed in the light of its birth and history, is it not reasonably clear that the grant of clause 14, to make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces, empowers Congress to govern and regulate all persons so closely related to and intertwined with those forces as to make their government essential to the government of those forces? Do not civilians employed by the Armed Forces at bases in foreign lands to do essential work for the military establishment, such as was being done by respondent Guagliardo and petitioners Wilson and Grisham, occupy that status and stand in that relationship to the Armed Forces for which they worked?

This Court has consistently held, in various contexts, that clause 14 does not limit the power of Congress to the government and regulation of only those persons who are members of the armed services. In Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 123, it was said, relative to the discipline necessary to the efficient operation of the Army and Navy, that "Everyone connected with these branches of the public service is amenable to the jurisdiction which Congress has created for their government, and, while thus serving, surrenders his right to be tried by the civil courts." In Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304, 313, this Court recognized the well-established power of the military to exercise jurisdiction over members of the Armed Forces [and] those directly connected with such forces." In Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11, 15, this Court said that clause 14 "would seem to restrict court-martial jurisdiction to persons who are actually members or part of the Armed Forces." Of even greater relevance, the main opinion in Covert although expressing the view that clause 14 authorized military trials only of persons in the Armed Forces, recognized that there might be circumstances where a person could be in the armed services for purposes of clause 14 even though he had not formally been inducted into the military or did not wear a uniform (354 U.S., at 23). To repeat the query of this Court, made under very similar circumstances, in Ex parte Reed, 100 U.S. 13, 22, "If these [civilian employees] are not in the [armed] service, it may well be asked who are. That case held that a civilian, employed to serve aboard ship as the clerk of a paymaster of the United States Navy and who was dismissable at the will of the commander of the ship, occupied such an important [place] in the machinery of the Navy • • • [that] [t]he good order and efficiency of the service depend[ed] largely upon the faithful performance of [his] duties and brought him in the naval service, so that he was subject to trial and punishment by court-martial for an offense committed in a Brazilian port (100 U.S., at 21–22), Johnson v. Sayre, 158 U.S. 109, reaffirmed the principle on practically identical facts.

The provisions of article III, section 2, and the fifth and sixth amendments of the Constitution requiring the trial of capital or otherwise infamous crimes in an article III court, upon an indictment of a grand jury, by an impartial petit jury, are not applicable to "cases arising in the land or naval forces." The fifth amendment expressly excepts those cases. It cannot be said that the "words in the fifth amendment, relating to the mode of accusation, restrict the jurisdiction of courts-martial in the regular land and naval forces." Johnson v. Sayre, supra, 158 U.S., at 115. The exception in the fifth amendment "was undoubtedly designed to correlate with the power granted to Congress to provide for the 'government and regulation' of the armed services" (Reid v. Covert, supra, at 22), and so was the jury trial provision of the sixth amendment, for "the framers of the Constitution, doubtless, meant to limit the right of trial by jury, in the sixth amendment, to those persons who were subject to indictment or presentment in the fifth." Ex parte Milligan, supra, 4 Wall., at 123. See also Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1, 40. The power conferred upon Congress by clause 14 to provide for court-martial trials of offenses arising in the land and naval forces is independent of and not restricted by article III or the fifth and sixth amendments to the Constitution.

Counsel for the convicted employees argue, with the citation and force of much history, that even if civilians "serving with [or] employed by" the Armed Forces are subject to the military power of courts-martial, such could be so only in respect of offenses committed while those forces are "in the field." Some of the early Articles of War limited military jurisdiction over certain civilian employees to the perod when the army was "in the field."[24] What is really meant by the term "in the field"? Seemingly, it does not mean "in actual war" or even "in time of war." "The essential element was thought to be, not so much that there be war, in the technical sense, but rather that the forces and their retainers be 'in the field.'" Reid v. Covert, supra, 354 U.S., at 71, note 8 (concerning opinion). Historically, the term has been thought to include armed forces located at points where the civil power of the Government did not extend or where its civil courts did not exist. Prior to the Civil War, a number of civilians employed by the Armed Forces were tried and punished by courts-martial in time of peace.[25] In 1814, the Attorney General expressed the opinion that civilian employees of the Navy were subject to punishment by court-martial for offenses committed on board vessels beyond the territorial jurisdiction of our civil courts (1 Op. Atty. Gen. 177). The term "in the field" was thought to apply to organized camps stationed in remote places where civil courts did not exist or were not functioning. In 1860 the Judge Advocate General of the Army so declared.[26] But thereafter, Winthrop expressed the view that the term "in the field" is to be "confined both to the period and pendency of war and to acts committed on the theater of the war."[27] This would seem to ignore the fact that the constitutional authority involved in clause 14, not the war power, and that the clause 14 powers apply both to times of peace and war.

Moreover, even at the time when Winthrop wrote, there was no consensus of interpretation supporting his view. In 1872, the Attorney General issued an opinion which concluded that civilians serving with troops in Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico, and the Indian Territory (where civil courts did not exist or were not functioning) in the building of defensive earthworks to protect against threatening Indians were "in the field" (14 Op. Atty. Gen. 22).[28] As earlier observed, this Court held, in 1879, in Ex parte Reed, supra, and again in 1895, in Johnson v. Sayre, supra, that the civilian clerk of a paymaster of the Navy might be tried and punished by a court-martial for a military offense committed in peacetime aboardship in a foreign port.

Doubtless, with the passing of the frontier and the extension of civil courts throughout the territorial boundaries of the United States, detachments of troops stationed within our borders may not in time of peace be regarded as "in the field." But, it

---

[22] Gen. Enoch H. Crowder, then Judge Advocate General of the Army, stated before the House Committee on Military Affairs: "There is nothing new in the article in subjecting these several classes to the provisions of article 65. It is a jurisdiction which has always been exercised. When any person joins an army in the field and subjects himself by that act to the discipline of the camp he acquires the capacity to imperil the safety of the command to the same degree as a man under the obligation of an enlistment contract or of a commission." (62d Cong., 2d sess., H.R. 23628, p. 61).

[23] See Congressional Globe, 37th Cong., 3d sess., 995 et seq.

[24] Article 32 of American Articles of War of 1775, 2 J. Cont. Cong. 111, provided that "All sutlers and retailers to a camp, and all persons whatsoever, serving with the Continental Army in the field" were subject to court-martial jurisdiction.

Article 60 of the American Articles of War of 1806, 2 Stat. 359, provided that "All sutlers and retainers to the camp, and all persons whatsoever, serving with the armies of the United States in the field" were subject to court-martial jurisdiction.

Article 63 of American Articles of War of 1874, R. S., sec. 1342, provided that "All retainers to the camp, and all persons serving with the armies of the United States in the field" were within the jurisdiction of courts-martial.

[25] At Fort Monroe, Va., in 1825; Fort Washington, Md., in 1825; Fort Gibson, in what is now Oklahoma, in 1833; Fort Brooke, Fla., in 1838; Camp Scott, Utah Territory, in 1858; Fort Bridger, Utah Territory, in 1858.

[26] On November 15, 1866, the Judge Advocate General of the Army formulated the following opinion and direction:

"It is held by this Bureau and has been the general usage of the service in times of peace, that a detachment of troops is an army 'in the field' when on the march, or at a post remote from civil jurisdiction.

"It has been the custom and is held to be advisable, that civil employees, sutlers and camp followers when guilty of crimes known to the civil law, to turn the parties over to the courts of the vicinity in which the crimes were committed. For minor offenses against good orders and discipline, it has been customary to expel the parties from the Army: If, however, it is sought to punish civil employees in New Mexico, for crimes committed at a post where there are no civil courts before which they can be tried, it is held that they can be brought to trial before a General Court Martial, as they must be considered as serving with 'an army in the field' and, therefore, within the provision of the 60th Article of War." Op. J. A. G. of the Army, No. 15, 1866, 23 Letters sent, 331 (National Archives).

[27] Winthrop, "Military Law and Precedents," 101.

[28] The opinion rested primarily on the ground that the term "in the field" implies military operations with a view to an enemy, and that an army was "in the field" when "engaged in offensive or defensive operations." It also noted, p. 24, that:

"Possibly the fact that troops are found in a region of country chiefly inhabited by Indians and remote from the exercise of civil authority may enter into the description of 'an army in the field.'"

seems to me that armed forces of the United States stationed at bases in foreign lands—where jurisdiction of our civil courts does not extend—must, under turbulent world conditions, be otherwise regarded. Because of long-existing world tensions and with the fervent hope of preventing worse, the U.S. Government has stationed armed forces at military bases in 63 foreign lands throughout the world. We are told that they must be kept constantly alert and ready to prevent or, if and when they arise, to put down "brush fires" which if allowed to spread might ignite a worldwide holocaust of atomic war. Because of physical necessities, such a war, like the frequently recurring "brush fires," could be suppressed, if at all, mainly from those bases. The forces at those bases are as much "in the field" in the one case as in the other. Though there be no war in the technical sense, those forces while so engaged in foreign lands—where our civil courts do not exist—are in every practical sense "in the field." They are as clearly "in the field" as were American soldiers while building fortifications to protect against threatening Indians in New Mexico and the Indian Territory, where our civil courts did not exist, in the days of the frontier. Op. J.A.G. of the Army, November 15, 1866, 23 Letters sent, 331 (National Archives) and see note 26; 14 Op. Atty. Gen. 22, and see note 28.

Clause 14 empowers Congress to "make rules"—all necessary and proper rules—"for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces"—not just for members of those forces, but the forces, and not only in time of war but in times of both peace and war. In the exercise of that granted power, Congress has promulgated rules, the Uniform Code of Military Justice, for the government of the Armed Forces and, to that end, has deemed it necessary, as witness article 2(11), to include persons employed by those forces when outside the United States—where our civil courts have no jurisdiction and do not exist—in times of both peace and war. In the light of all the facts, it would seem clear enough that Congress could rationally find that those persons are in those forces and, though there be no shooting war, that those forces, in turn, are in the field; and hence Congress could and did constitutionally make those employees subject to the military power. Both the practical necessities and the lack of alternatives, so clearly demonstrated by Mr. Justice Clark in the Covert case, 354 U.S., at 78 (dissenting opinion), strongly buttress this conclusion, if, indeed, it could otherwise be doubted.

For these reasons, I would affirm No. 22, the Singleton case; reverse No. 21, the Guagliardo case; and affirm Nos. 37 and 58, the Wilson and Grisham cases.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—NOS. 21, 37, 22, AND 58, OCTOBER TERM, 1959—McELROY, SECRETARY OF DEFENSE, ET AL., PETITIONERS, v. UNITED STATES EX REL. DOMINIC GUAGLIARDO; ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE U.S. COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT—BRUCE WILSON, PETITIONER, v. MAJ. GEN. JOHN F. BOHLENDER, COMMANDER, FITZSIMONS ARMY HOSPITAL; ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE U.S. COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE 10TH CIRCUIT—KINSELLA, WARDEN, APPELLANT, v. UNITED STATES EX REL. SINGLETON; ON APPEAL FROM THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF WEST VIRGINIA—ALBERT H. GRISHAM, PETITIONER, v. CHARLES R. HAGAN, WARDEN; ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE U.S. COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE THIRD CIRCUIT

(January 18, 1960)

(Mr. Justice Harlan, whom Mr. Justice Frankfurter joins, dissenting in Nos. 22, 21, and 37, and concurring in No. 58.)

Within the compass of "any treaty or agreement to which the United States is or may be a party" and "any accepted rule of international law," article 2(11) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice makes subject to the code, and therefore prosecutable by court-martial for offenses committed abroad, all "persons serving with, employed by, or accompanying the Armed Forces" outside the United States and certain other areas.[1]

These four cases, involving persons and crimes concededly covered by the Military Code, bring before us the constitutionality of article 2(11) as applied to (1) civilian service dependents charged with noncapital offenses (No. 22); (2) civilian service employees, also charged with noncapital offenses (Nos. 21 and 37);[2] and (3) civilian service employees charged with capital offenses (No. 58). In each instance the Court holds the act unconstitutional. While I agree with the judgment in No. 58, which involves a capital offense, I cannot agree with the judgments in Nos. 22, 21, and 37, in each of which the conviction was for a noncapital offense.

The effect of these decisions is to deny to Congress the power to give the military services, when the United States is not actually at war, criminal jurisdiction over noncapital offenses committed by nonmilitary personnel while accompanying or serving with our Armed Forces abroad. I consider this a much too narrow conception of the constitutional power of Congress and the result particularly unfortunate in the setting of the present-day international scene. To put what the Court has decided in proper context, some review of the past fate of article 2(11) in this Court is desirable.

At the 1955 term there came before the Court in Kinsella v. Krueger, 351 U.S. 470, and Reid v. Covert, 351 U.S. 487, the question whether two army wives could be constitutionally convicted, under article 2(11), of the capital offense of first degree murder, committed while stationed with their husbands at military bases abroad. Initially a divided Court, in two opinions which I joined, upheld the convictions.[3] In so holding the Court relied not upon constitutional power of Congress "To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," (art. I, sec. 8, cl. 14), but upon In re Ross, 140 U.S. 453, the so-called Insular Cases, e.g., Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298 and article IV, section 3, of the Constitution, respecting congressional power over territories. These factors, in combination, led the Court to conclude that the constitutional guarantees of article III and the fifth and sixth amendments did not apply to criminal trials of Americans abroad before legislatively established tribunals; that it was permissible for Congress to conclude that persons circumstanced as those women were should be tried before a court-martial, rather than a civil tribunal; and that such trials did not offend the fundamentals of due process.

The decisions in these cases were reached under the pressures of the closing days of the term. (See 351 U.S., at 483–486.) Having become convinced over the summer that the grounds on which they rested were untenable, I moved at the opening of the 1956 Term that the cases be reheard, being joined by the four Justices who had been in the minority. See 352 U.S. 901, 354 U.S. 1, 65–67.[4]

Upon a consolidated rehearing of the cases, the Court's original opinions and the judgments of conviction were set aside, a majority of the Court then holding that whether the convictions should stand or fall depended solely on the article I, section 8, clause 14 power, and that such power should not be constitutionally applied in those cases. Reid v. Covert (354 U.S. 1). There was, however, no opinion for the Court. Four Justices joined in an opinion broadly holding that "civilians" can never be criminally tried by military courts in times of peace, id., at 3–41.[5] Two Justices concurred specially in the result, on the narrow ground that article 2(11) could not be so applied to civilian service dependents charged with capital offenses, explicitly reserving judgment, however, as to whether nonmilitary personnel charged with other than capital offenses could be subjected to such trials,[6] id., at 41–64, 65–78. Two Justices dissented, adhering to the grounds expressed in the earlier majority opinions,[7] id., at 78. And one Justice did not participate in the cases.[8]

Thus the only issue that second Covert actually decided was that article 2(11) could not be constitutionally applied to civilian service dependents charged with capital offenses. Nevertheless, despite the wide differences of views by which this particular result was reached—none of which commanded the assent of a majority of the Court—Covert is now regarded as establishing that nonmilitary personnel are never within the reach of the article I power in times of peace. On this faulty view of the case, it is considered that Covert controls the issues presently before us. Apart from that view I think it fair to say different results might well have been reached in the three noncapital cases now under consideration. Without needlessly traversing ground already covered in my separate opinion in Covert, id., at 67–78, I shall give my reasons for believing that while the result reached by the Court in the capital case is right, its decisions in the noncapital cases are wrong.

First. The Court's view of the effect of Covert in these noncapital cases stems from the basic premise that only persons occupying a military "status" are within the scope of the article I, section 8, clause 14 power. The judgment in Covert having decided that civilian service dependents were not within the reach of that power in capital cases, it is said to follow that such dependents, and presumably all other "civilians," may also not be tried by courts-martial in noncapital cases; this because neither the statute nor article I makes exercise of the power turn upon the nature of the offense involved.

I think the "status" premise on which the Court has proceeded is unsound. Article I, section 8, clause 14, speaks not in narrow terms of soldiers and sailors, but broadly gives Congress power to prescribe "rules for the government and regulation of the

---

[1] To wit: "that part of Alaska east of longitude 172° west, the Canal Zone, the main group of the Hawaiian Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands."

[2] In No. 37 the Government, alternatively, relies on the "War Power," the offense having been committed in the American Occupied Zone of West Berlin. Cf. Madsen v. Kinsella, 343 U.S. 341. Apart from whether or not the contention is available in light of the course of the proceedings below, I do not reach that issue.

[3] In addition to myself, the majority opinions, written by Mr. Justice Clark, were joined by Justices Reed, Burton and Minton. 351 U.S. 470 and 487. The Chief Justice and Justices Black and Douglas dissented. Id., at 485. Mr. Justice Frankfurter filed a reservation. Id., at 481.

[4] The three remaining members of the original majority were in dissent, 352 U.S., at 902, Mr. Justice Minton having meanwhile retired. Mr. Justice Brennan, his successor, did not participate on the motion.

[5] The Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Black (the writer of the opinion), and Justices Douglas and Brennan.

[6] Mr. Justice Frankfurter and myself.

[7] Justices Clark and Burton.

[8] Mr. Justice Whittaker, succeeding Mr. Justice Reed who had meanwhile retired.

land and naval forces."[9] This power must be read in connection with clause 18 of the same article, authorizing Congress—

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Thus read, the power respecting the land and naval forces encompasses, in my opinion, all that Congress may appropriately deem "necessary" for their good order. It does not automatically exclude the regulation of nonmilitary personnel.

I think it impermissible to conclude, as some of my brethren have indicated on an earlier occasion (see second Covert, supra, at 20–22), and as the Court now holds, ante, —, that the Necessary and Proper Clause may not be resorted to in judging constitutionality in cases of this type. The clause, itself a part of article I, section 8, in which the power to regulate the armed forces is also found, applies no less to that power than it does to the other section 8 congressional powers, and indeed is to be read "as an integral part of each" such power. Second Covert, supra, at 43 (concurring opinion of Frankfurter, J.). As Mr. Justice Brandeis put it in Ruppert v. Caffey, 251 U.S. 264, at 300–301:

"Whether it be for purposes of national defense, or for the purpose of establishing post offices and post roads or for the purpose of regulating commerce among the several States Congress has the power 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution' the duty so reposed in the Federal Government. While this is a Government of enumerated powers it has full attributes of sovereignty within the limits of those powers. In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564. Some confusion of thought might perhaps have been avoided, if, instead of distinguishing between powers by the terms express and implied, the terms specific and general had been used. For the power conferred by clause 18 of section 8 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution' powers specifically enumerated is also an express power."

Of course, the Necessary and Proper Clause cannot be used to "expand" powers which are otherwise constitutionally limited, but that is only to say that when an asserted power is not appropriate to the exercise of an express power, to which all "necessary and proper" powers must relate, the asserted power is not a "proper" one. But to say, as the Court does now, that the necessary and proper clause "is not a grant of power" is to disregard clause 18 as one of the enumerated powers of section 8 of article I.

Viewing Congress power to provide for the governing of the Armed Forces in connection with the necessary and proper clause, it becomes apparent, I believe, that a person's status with reference to the Military Establishment is but one, and not alone the determinative, factor in judging the constitutionality of a particular exercise of that power. By the same token, the major premise on which the Court ascribes to Covert a controlling effect in these noncapital cases disappears.

Second. It is further suggsted that the difference between capital and noncapital offenses is not constitutionally significant, and that if article 2(11) of the Military Code, as applied to nonmilitary persons, is unconstitutional in one case, it equally is so in the other. I think this passes over too lightly the awesome finality of a capital case, a factor which in other instances has been reflected both in the constitutional adjudications of this Court and in the special procedural safeguards which have been thrown around those charged with such crimes.

Thus, this Court has held that the 14th amendment requires a State to appoint counsel for an indigent defendant in a capital case, Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, whereas in noncapital cases a defendant has no such absolute right to counsel, Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455. Again, the Congress in first-degree murder cases has in effect put infliction of the death penalty in the hands of the jury, rather than the judge, 18 U.S.C., sec. 1111(b); see also 60 Stat. 766, as amended, 42 U.S.C., sec. 2274(a), and various States have similar statutes.[10] Further illustrations of the same concern about capital cases are the prohibition on acceptance of pleas of guilty in such cases,[11] and, in the appellate field, provisions for mandatory or automatic appeals from such convictions.[12]

In my Covert opinion I pointed out that the Government itself had in effect acknowledged that because of the gravity of the offense, a treason case against a nonsoldier in time of peace could not constitutionally be held to be within the otherwise unlimited scope of article 2(11); and I expressed the view that the same constitutional limitation should obtain whenever the death penalty is involved (354 U.S., at 77). I see no reason for retreating from that conclusion. The view that we must hold that nonmilitary personnel abroad are either subject to peacetime court-martial jurisdiction for all offenses, or for none at all, represents an inexorable approach to constitutional adjudication to which I cannot subscribe.

It is one thing to hold that nonmilitary personnel situated at our foreign bases may be tried abroad by courts-martial in times of peace for noncapital offenses, but quite another to say that they may be so tried where life is at stake. In the latter situation, I do not believe that the necessary and proper clause, which alone in cases like this brings the exceptional article I jurisdiction into play, can properly be taken as justifying the trial of nonmilitary personnel without the full protections of an article III court. (See 354 U.S., at 77.) Before the constitutional existence of such a power can be found, for me a much more persuasive showing would be required that Congress had good reason for concluding that such a course is necessary to the proper maintenance of our Military Establishment abroad than has been made in any of the cases of this kind which have thus far come before the Court.

Third. I revert to the Court's status approach to the power of Congress to make rules for governing the Armed Forces. How little of substance that view holds appears when it is pointed out that had those involved in these cases been inducted into the Army, though otherwise maintaining their same capacities, it would presumably have been held that they were all fully subject to article 2(11). Yet except for this formality their real status would have remained the same.

Although it was recognized in the second Covert case that a person might be subject to article 2(11) "even though he had not formally been inducted into the military or did not wear a uniform," (354 U.S., at 23), I think that drawing a line of demarcation between those who are constitutionally subject to the article I, section 8, clause 14 power, and those who are not, defies definition in terms of military status. I believe that the true issue on this aspect of all such cases concerns the closeness or remoteness of the relationship between the person affected and the Military Establishment. Is that relationship close enough so that Congress may, in light of all the factors involved, appropriately deem it necessary that the military should be given jurisdiction to deal with offenses committed by such persons?

I think that such relationship here was close enough, and in this respect can draw no constitutional distinction between the Army wife in No. 22 and the civilian service employees in the other cases. Though their presence at these Army oversea bases was for different reasons and purposes, the relationship of both to the military community was such as to render them constitutionally amenable to the article 2(11) jurisdiction. By the same token, being of the view that the constitutional existence of such jurisdiction has not been shown as to civilian service dependents charged with capital offenses, I am equally of the opinion that it cannot be found with respect to civilian service employees similarly charged. For these reasons I concur in the judgment of the Court in No. 58.

Fourth. The other factors which must be weighed in judging the constitutionality of article 2(11) as applied to noncapital cases have, in my opinion, been adequately satisfied. I need not add to what was said in my concurring opinion in Covert, 354 U.S., at 70–73, 76–77, with reference to the matters which originally were adumbrated by my Brother Clark in his dissent in the same case (id., at 83–88). Nothing in the supplemental historical data respecting courts-martial which has been presented in these cases persuades me that we would be justified in holding that Congress' exercise of its constitutional powers in this area was without a rational and appropriate basis, so far as noncapital cases are concerned. Although it is now suggested that the problem with which Congress sought to deal in article 2(11) may be met in other ways, I submit that once it is shown that Congress' choice was not excluded by a rational judgment concerned with the problem it is beyond our competence to find constitutional command for other procedures.

I think it unfortunate that this Court should have found the Constitution lacking in enabling Congress to cope effectively with matters which are so intertwined with broader problems that have been engendered by present disturbed world conditions. Those problems are fraught with many factors that this Court is ill equipped to assess, and involve important national concerns into which we should be reluctant to enter except under the clearest sort of constitutional compulsion. That such compulsion is lacking here has been amply demonstrated by the checkered history of the past cases of this kind in the Court. Today's decisions are the more regrettable because they are bound to disturb delicate arrangements with many foreign countries, and may result in our having to relinquish to other nations where U.S. forces are stationed a substantial part of the jurisdiction now retained over American personnel under the Status of Forces Agreements.

I would reverse in Nos. 22, 21, and 58, and affirm in No. 37.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—No. 22, OCTOBER TERM, 1959—KINSELLA, WARDEN, APPELLANT, v. UNITED STATES EX REL. SINGLETON; ON APPEAL FROM THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF WEST VIRGINIA

(January 18, 1960)

(Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the Court.)

This direct appeal tests the constitutional validity of peacetime court-martial trials of civilian persons "accompanying the Armed Forces without the continental limits of the

---

[9] The fifth amendment excepts from its protection "cases arising," not persons, "in the land or naval forces."

[10] E.g., Mass. Gen. Laws Ann., c. 265, sec. 2; Miss. Code Ann., sec. 2536; N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann., c. 585, sec. 4.

[11] E.g., N.Y. Code Crim. Proc., sec. 332.

[12] E.g., Cal. Penal Code, sec. 1239(b); Oreg. Rev. Stat., sec. 138.810.

United States,"[1] and charged with noncapital offenses under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, 50 U.S.C., sec. 551, 64 Stat. 108. Appellee contends that the dependent wife of a soldier can be tried only in a court that affords her the safeguards of article III and of the fifth and sixth amendments to the Constitution. The trial court held article 2(11) of the code unconstitutional as applied to civilian dependents accompanying the Armed Forces overseas and charged with noncapital offenses, 164 F. Supp. 707, and the Government appealed. We noted probable jurisdiction and permitted appellee to proceed in forma pauperis. 359 U.S. 903.

The appellee is the mother of Mrs. Joanna S. Dial, the wife of a soldier who was assigned to a tank battalion of the U.S. Army. The Dials and their three children lived in Government housing quarters at Baumholder, Germany. In consequence of the death of one of their children, both of the Dials were charged with unpremeditated murder under article 118(2) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Upon the Dials' offer to plead guilty to involuntary manslaughter under article 119 of the code, both charges were withdrawn and new ones charging them separately with the lesser offense were returned. They were then tried together before a general court-martial at Baumholder. Mrs. Dial challenged the jurisdiction of the court-martial over her but, upon denial of her motion, pled guilty, as did her husband. Each was sentenced to the maximum penalty permitted under the code. Their convictions were upheld by the Court of Military Appeals and Mrs. Dial was returned to the United States and placed in the Federal Reformatory for Women at Alderson, W. Va. Thereafter the appellee filed this petition for habeas corpus and obtained Mrs. Dial's discharge from custody. From this judgment the warden has appealed.

As has been noted, the jurisdiction of the court-martial was based upon the provisions of article 2(11) of the Code. The Congress enacted that article in an effort to extend, for disciplinary reasons, the coverage of the Uniform Code of Military Justice to the classes of persons therein enumerated. The jurisdiction of the code only attached, however, when and if its applicability in a given foreign territory was sanctioned under "any treaty or agreement to which the United States is or may be a party" with the foreign sovereignty, or under "any accepted rule of international law." The existence of such an agreement here is admitted. The constitutionality of article 2(11) as it applies in time of peace to civilian dependents charged with noncapital offenses under the code is the sole issue to be decided.

The question is not one of first impression, as we had before us in 1956 the constitutionality of the article as applied to civilian dependents charged with capital offenses, in the companion cases of Kinsella v. Krueger, 351 U.S. 470, and Reid v. Covert, 351 U.S. 487. At the original submission of those cases, we decided by a bare majority that the article was a valid exercise of the power of the Congress, under article IV, section 3, to "make all needful rules and regulations" for the "territories" of the United States. We held further that the "procedure in such tribunals need not comply with the standards prescribed by the Constitution for article III courts," 351 U.S., at 475, and specifically upheld court-martial jurisdiction in such cases against the contention that its procedures did not provide for indictment by grand jury or trial by petit jury. In short, we said that the failure to provide such protections raised "no constitutional defect," citing In re Ress, 140 U.S. 453 (1891), and the Insular Cases, such as Belzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298 (1922). On rehearing at the following term, these opinions were withdrawn and judgments were entered declaring the article unconstitutional when applied to civilian dependents charged with capital offenses. Reid v. Covert, consolidated with Kinsella v. Krueger, 354 U.S. 1 (1957). The Court held[2] that the power over "territories," as applied by the In re Ross doctrine, was neither applicable nor controlling. It found that trial by court-martial was the exercise of an exceptional jurisdiction springing from the power granted the Congress in article I, section 8, clause 14, "to make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces," as supplemented by the necessary and proper clause of article I, section 8, clause 18.[3] But as applied to the civilian dependents there involved it must be considered, the Court said, in relation to article III and the fifth and sixth amendments. The majority concluded that, in those capital cases, trial by court-martial as provided could not constitutionally be justified.

The appellee contends that this result, declaring civilian dependents charged with capital offenses not to be subject to the provisions of the code, bears directly on its applicability to the same class charged with noncapital crimes. She says that the test of whether civilian dependents come within the power of Congress as granted in clause 14's limitation to the "land and naval forces" is the status of the person involved. Her conclusion is that if civilian dependents charged with capital offenses are not within that language, a fortiori persons in the same class charged with noncapital offenses could not be included, since the clause draws no distinctions as to offenses. The Government fully accepts the holding in the second Covert case, supra. It contends that the case is controlling only where civilian dependents are charged with capital offenses, and that in fact the concurrences indicate that considerations of a compelling necessity for prosecution by courts-martial of civilian dependents charged with noncapital offenses might permit with reason the inclusion of that limited category within court-martial jurisdiction. It submits that such necessities are controlling in the case of civilian dependents charged with noncapital crimes. It points out that such dependents affect the military community as a whole; that they have, in fact, been permitted to enjoy their residence in such communities on the representation that they are subject to military control; and that realistically they are a part of the Military Establishment. It argues that, from a morale standpoint, the present need for dependents to accompany American forces maintained abroad is a pressing one; that their special status as integral parts of the military community requires disciplinary control over them by the military commander; that the effectiveness of this control depends upon a readily available machinery affording a prompt sanction and resulting deterrent present only in court-martial jurisdiction; and that not only is court-martial procedure inherently fair but there are no alternatives to it. The Government further contends that it has entered into international agreements with a large number of foreign governments permitting the exercise of military jurisdiction in the territory of the signatories, and pursuant to the same it has been utilizing court-martial procedures at various American installations abroad. Its legal theory is based on historical materials which it asserts indicate a well-established practice of court-martial jurisdiction over civilians accompanying the Armed Forces, during colonial days as well as the formative period of our Constitution. From this it concludes that civilian dependents may be included as a necessary and proper incident to the congressional power "To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," as granted in clause 14.

In this field, Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11 (1955), cited with approval by a majority in the second Covert case, supra, is a landmark. Likewise, of course, we must consider the effect of the latter case on our problem.[4] We therefore turn to their teachings. The Toth case involved a discharged soldier who was tried by court-martial after his discharge from the Army, for an offense committed before his discharge. It was said there that the clause 14 "provision itself does not empower Congress to deprive people of trials under Bill of Rights safeguards," 350 U.S., at 21–22, and that military tribunals must be restricted "to the narrowest jurisdiction deemed absolutely essential to maintaining discipline among troops in active service" (id., at 22). We brushed aside the thought that "considerations of discipline" could provide an excuse for "new expansion of court-martial jurisdiction at the expense of normal and constitutionally preferable systems of trial by jury" (id., at 22–33). We were therefore "not willing to hold that power to circumvent these safeguards should be inferred through the necessary and proper clause" (id., at 22).

The holding of the case may be summed up in its own words; namely, that "the power granted Congress 'to makes rules' to regulate 'the land and naval forces' would seem to restrict court-martial jurisdiction to persons who are actually members or part of the Armed Forces." Id., at 15. It was with this gloss on clause 14 that the Court reached the second Covert case, supra. There, as we have noted, the person involved was the civilian dependent of a soldier, who was accompanying him outside the United States when the capital offense complained of was committed. The majority concluded that "trial by court-martial is constitutionally permissible only for persons who can, on a fair appraisal, be regarded as falling within the authority given to Congress under article I to regulate the 'land and naval forces.'" Concurring opinion, 354 U.S. at 42.[5] The test for jurisdiction, it follows, is one of status; namely, whether the accused in the court-martial proceeding is a person who can be regarded as

---

[1] "Art. 2. The following persons are subject to this chapter:

"(11) Subject to any treaty or agreement to which the United States is or may be a party or to any accepted rule of international law, persons serving with, employed by, or accompanying the Armed Forces outside the United States and outside the following: that part of Alaska east of longitude 172 degrees west, the Canal Zone, the main group of the Hawaiian Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands."

[2] Four Justices joined in an opinion announcing the judgment, two concurred in the result, and two dissented. Mr. Justice Whittaker, having come to the Court subsequent to the time of argument and decision in this case, took no part.

[3] Clause 18. "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution, the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

[4] See also Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How. 65 (1857); Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2 (1866); Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946); and Winthrop, Military Law and Precedents (2d ed. 1896), 144 et seq. and Reprint (1920) 105–107.

[5] The second concurring opinion expressed the view that art. I was an unlimited grant of power to Congress "to make such laws in the regulation of the land and naval forces as are necessary to the proper functioning of those forces" and indicated that the necessary and proper clause "modified" clause 14 "expanding" its power "under changing circumstances" (354 U.S., at 68).

falling within the term "land and naval forces." The Court concluded that civilian dependents charged with capital offenses were not included within such authority, the concurring Justices expressing the view that they did not think "that the proximity, physical and social, of these women to the 'land and naval forces' is, with due regard to all that has been put before us, so clearly demanded by the effective 'government and regulation' of those forces as reasonably to demonstrate a justification for court-martial jurisdiction over capital offenses." Concurring opinion, 354 U.S., at 46–47.

In the second Covert case, each opinion supporting the judgment struck down the article as it was applied to civilian dependents charged with capital crimes. The separate concurrences supported the judgment on the theory that the crime being "in fact punishable by death," id., at 45, the question to be decided is "analogous, ultimately, to issues of due process," id., at 75. The Justices joining in the opinion announcing the judgment, however, did not join in this view, but held that the constitutional safeguards claimed applied in "all criminal trials" in article III courts and applied "outside of the States," pointing out that both the fifth and sixth amendments "were all inclusive with their sweeping references to 'no person' and to 'all criminal prosecutions.'" Id., at 7–8. The two dissenters [6] found "no distinction in the Constitution between capital and other cases," id., at 89, but said that the constitutional safeguards claimed were not required under the power granted Congress in Art. IV, § 3, and the cases heretofore mentioned. The briefs and argument in Covert reveal that it was argued and submitted by the parties on the theory that no constitutional distinction could be drawn between capital and noncapital offenses for the purposes of clause 14. Supplemental Brief for Government on Rehearing, Nos. 701 and 713, at pp. 16–20, 82–95.

We have given careful study to the contentions of the Government. They add up to a reverse of form from the broad presentation in Covert, where it asserted that no distinction could be drawn as between capital and noncapital offenses. But the same fittings are used here with only adaptation to noncapital crimes. It asserts that the second Covert case, rather than foreclosing the issue here, indicates that military tribunals would have jurisdiction over civilian dependents charged with offenses less than capital. It says that the trial of such a person for a noncapital crime is "significantly different" from his trial for a capital one, that the maintaining of different standards or considerations in capital cases is not a new concept, and that, therefore, there must be a fresh evaluation of the necessities for court-martial jurisdiction and a new balancing of the rights involved. As we have indicated, these necessities add up to about the same as those asserted in capital cases and which the concurrence in second Covert held as not of sufficient "proximity, physical and social * * * to the 'land and naval forces' * * * as reasonably to demonstrate a justification" for court-martial prosecution. Likewise in the Government's historical material—dealing with court-martial jurisdiction during peace—which was found in Covert "too episodic, too meager * * * for constitutional adjudication," concurring opinion, 354 U.S., at 64, it has been unable to point out one court-martial which drew any distinction, insofar as the grant of power to the Congress under clause 14 was concerned, between capital and noncapital crimes.[7] The Government makes no claim that historically there was ever any distinction made as to the jurisdiction of courts-martial to try civilian dependents on the basis of capital as against noncapital offenses. Without contradiction, the materials furnished show that military jurisdiction has always been based on the "status" of the accused, rather than the nature of the offense. To say that military jurisdiction "defies definition in terms of military 'status'" is to defy unambiguous language of art. I, sec. 8, clause 14, as well as the historical background thereof and the precedents with reference thereto.[8]

Furthermore, we are not convinced that a critical impact upon discipline will result, as claimed by the Government (even if anyone deemed this a relevant consideration), if noncapital offenses are given the same treatment as capital ones by virtue of the second Covert case. The same necessities claimed here were found present in the second Covert case, see the dissent there, and were rejected by the Court. Even if the necessity for court-martial jurisdiction be relevant in cases involving deprivation of the constitutional rights of civilian dependents, which we seriously doubt, we doubt that the existence of the small number of noncapital cases now admitted by the Government in its brief here,[9] when spread over the worldwide coverage of military installations, would of itself bring on such a crisis. Moreover, in the critical areas of occupation other legal grounds may exist for court-martial jurisdiction as claimed by the Government in No. 37, Wilson v. Bohlender, decided today. See Madsen v. Kinsella, 343 U.S. 341 (1952). Another serious obstacle to permitting prosecution of noncapital offenses, while rejecting capital ones, is that it would place in the hands of the military an unreviewable discretion to exercise jurisdiction over civilian dependents simply by downgrading the offense, thus stripping the accused of his constitutional rights and protections. By allowing this assumption of "the garb of mercy," [10] we would be depriving a capital offender of his constitutional means of defense and in effect would nullify the second Covert case, supra. This situation will be aggravated by the want of legislation providing for trials in capital cases in article III courts sitting in the United States. At argument, the Government indicated that there had been no effort in the Congress to make any provision for the prosecution of such cases either in continental United States or in foreign lands. Still we heard no claim that the total failure to prosecute capital cases against civilian dependents since the second Covert decision in 1957 had affected in the least the discipline at armed services installations. We do know that in one case (Wilson v. Girard, 354 U.S. 524 (1957)), the Government insisted and we agreed that it had the power to turn over the case of an American soldier to Japanese civil authorities for trial on an offense committed while on duty. We have no information as to the impact of that trial on civilian dependents. Strangely, this itself might prove to be quite an effective deterrent.

Moreover the immediate return to the United States permanently of such civilian dependents, or their subsequent prosecution for the more serious offenses in the United States when authorized by the Congress, might well be the answer to the disciplinary problem. Certainly such trials would not involve as much expense nor be as difficult of successful prosecution as capital offenses.

We now reach the Government's suggestion that, in the light of the noncapital nature of the offense here, as opposed to the capital one in the Covert case, we should make a "fresh evaluation and a new balancing." But the power to "make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces" bears no limitation as to offenses. The power there granted includes not only the creation of offenses but the fixing of the punishment therefor. If civilian dependents are included in the term "land and naval forces" at all, they are subject to the full power granted the Congress therein to create capital as well as noncapital offenses. This Court cannot diminish and expand that power, either on a case-by-case [6] The writer of this opinion wrote the dissent.

---

[7] Even at argument here Government counsel admitted he had found no such distinction other than that asserted by the concurrences in second Covert:

"Mr. Justice Black. What is the historical difference as to the 'Members of the land and naval forces' and the constitutional power of Congress dependent upon whether they are capital crimes or noncapital crimes? When did that distinction first come into existence?

"Mr. Davis. Well, I think that distinction was first articulated in the concurring opinions in the Covert case."

* * * * *

"Mr. Justice Black. I really asked you about the history because I was curious to know [whether], in your reading and so forth, you found any reference to that distinction in this field before the Covert case.

"Mr. Davis. No. No explicit reference Mr. Justice Black."

[8] It was for this reason that the majority in the first Covert case, supra, based its decision on art. IV, sec. 3, rather than the congressional power under clause 14.

[9] Aside from traffic violations, there were only 273 cases (both capital and noncapital) involving dependents subject to foreign jurisdiction during the period between December 1, 1954, and November 30, 1958. This number includes 54 "offenses against economic control laws" and 88 offenses denominated "other." Government's brief on the merits in McElroy v. Guagliardo, No. 21, at p. 75.

[10] "He was glad, he said, that the penalty under this bill was not to be greater than that to which persons were subjected who were convicted of counterfeiting the great seal; but, on the other hand, he feared that this seeming lenity was not what it appeared to be, the child of mercy; he apprehended that its object was to facilitate the conviction of the accused, by taking from him the means of defense, which he might claim as his right, if the bill left the enumerated acts within the statute of the 25th of Edward III. These acts might be considered as proofs of an adherence to the King's enemies, and consequently came within the species of treason on which corruption of blood attached; but, by classing them under the head of treasons which did not operate a corruption of blood, the framers of the bill had contrived to take from the accused the means of defense, under the appearance of lenity. Of all the characters of cruelty, he considered that as the most odious which assumed the garb of mercy: such was the case here; under the pretence of mercy to the accused, in not charging him with corruption of blood, he was to be deprived of the means of making his defense. That he might not stand a chance in the contest, his shield was to be taken from him. The list of the jury, to give him the benefit of the challenge—the list of witnesses, to enable him to detect conspiracies and to prevent perjury—the copy of the charge 10 days before the trial, to enable him to prepare himself for the awful day—the assistance of a learned gentleman to speak for an unlearned man—all the arms and means of protection with which the humanity of the law of England had fortified an individual, when accused by the crown, were to be taken away. Harshness and severity were to be substituted for tenderness and compassion; and then he was to be insulted by being told he was spared the corruption of blood." 5 The Speeches of the Right Honorable Charles James Fox in the House of Commons (London 1815) 78.

basis or on a balancing of the power there granted Congress against the safeguards of article III and the fifth and sixth amendments. Due process cannot create or enlarge power. See Toth v. Quarles, supra. It has to do, as taught by the Government's own cases [11] with the denial of that "fundamental fairness, shocking to the universal sense of justice." Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455, 462 (1942). It deals neither with power nor with jurisdiction, but with their exercise.

Obviously 14th amendment cases dealing with State action have no application here, but if they did, we believe that to deprive civilian dependents of the safeguards of a jury trial here, an infamous case by constitutional standards, would be as invalid under those cases as it would be in cases of a capital nature. Nor do we believe that due process considerations bring about an expansion of clause 14 through the operation of the necessary and proper clause. If the exercise of the power is valid it is because it is granted in clause 14, not because of the necessary and proper clause. That clause is not itself a grant of power, but a caveat that the Congress possesses all of the means necessary to carry out the specifically granted "foregoing" powers of section 8 "and all other powers vested by this Constitution." As James Madison explained, the necessary and proper clause is "but merely a declaration, for the removal of all uncertainty, that the means of carrying into execution those [powers] otherwise granted are included in the grant." VI Writings of James Madison, edited by Gaillard Hunt, 383. There can be no question but that clause 14 grants the Congress power to adopt the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Our initial inquiry is whether Congress can include civilian dependents within the term "land and naval forces" as a proper incident to this power and necessary to its execution. If answered in the affirmative then civilian dependents are amenable to the code. In the second Covert case, supra, it was held they were not so amenable as to capital offenses. Our final inquiry, therefore, is narrowed to whether clause 14, which under the second Covert case has been held not to include civilian dependents charged with capital offenses, may now be expanded to include the same civilian dependents but who are charged with noncapital offenses. We again refer to James Madison:

"When the Constitution was under the discussions which preceded its ratification, it is well known that great apprehensions were expressed by many, lest the omission of some positive exception, from the powers delegated, of certain rights * * * might expose them to the danger of being drawn, by construction, within some of the powers vested in Congress, more especially of the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying their other powers into execution. In reply to this objection, it was invariably urged to be a fundamental and characteristic principle of the Constitution, that all powers not given by it were reserved; that no powers were given beyond those enumerated in the Constitution, and such as were fairly incident to them." Writings, supra, at 390.

We are therefore constrained to say that since this Court has said that the necessary and proper clause cannot expand clause 14 so as to include prosecution of civilian dependents for capital crimes, it cannot expand clause 14 to include prosecution of them for noncapital offenses.

Neither our history nor our decisions furnish a foothold for the application of such due process concepts as the Government projects. Its application today in light of the irreversibility of the death penalty would free from military prosecution a civilian accompanying or employed by the armed services who committed a capital offense, while the same civilian could be prosecuted by the military for a noncapital crime. It is illogical to say that the power respecting the land and naval forces encompasses * * * all that Congress may appropriately deem necessary for their good order and still deny to Congress the means to exercise such power through the infliction of the death penalty. But that is proposed here. In our view this would militate against our whole concept of power and jurisdiction. It would likewise be contrary to the entire history of the Articles of War. Even prior to the Constitutional Convention, the Articles of War included 17 capital offenses applicable to all persons whose status brought them within the term "land and naval forces." There were not then and never have been any exceptions as to persons in the applicability of these capital offenses. In 1806 when the Articles of War were first revised, Congress retained therein 16 offenses that carried the death penalty, although there was complaint that "almost every article in the bill was stained with blood." (15 Annals of Cong. 326.)

Nor do we believe that the exclusion of noncapital offenses along with capital ones will cause any additional disturbance in our "delicate arrangements with many foreign countries." The Government has pointed to no disruption in such relations by reason of the second Covert decision. Certainly this case involves no more "important national concerns into which we should be reluctant to enter" than did Covert. In truth the problems are identical and are so intertwined that equal treatment of capital and noncapital cases would be a palliative to a troubled world.

We therefore hold that Mrs. Dial is protected by the specific provisions of article III and the fifth and sixth amendments and that her prosecution and conviction by courtmartial is not constitutionally permissible. The judgment must therefore be

---

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—No. 58—OCTOBER TERM, 1959—ALBERT H. GRISHAM, PETITIONER, v. CHARLES R. HAGAN, WARDEN—ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE THIRD CIRCUIT

(January 18, 1960)

(Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the Court.)

This case tests by habeas corpus the validity of Article 2(11) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, 10 U.S.C., section 802,[1] as applied to a civilian convicted by courtmartial of a capital offense while employed overseas by the U.S. Army. It is a companion case to No. 22, Kinsella v. Singleton, which involves the application of the same article to noncapital offenses committed by dependents accompanying soldiers stationed outside the United States, and to No. 21, McElroy v. Guagliardo, and No. 37, Wilson v. Bohlender, involving noncapital offenses committed by armed services employees while stationed overseas—all of which cases are decided today.

Petitioner, a civilian employee of the U.S. Army attached to an Army installation in France, was tried by a general court-martial for the capital offense of premeditated murder as defined in article 118(1) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice. He was found guilty of the lesser and included offense of unpremeditated murder, and sentenced to confinement at hard labor for the term of his natural life. The sentence was subsequently reduced to 35 years. While serving this sentence at the U.S. Penitentiary at Lewisburg, Pa., he filed this petition for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that article 2(11) was unconstitutional as applied to him, for the reason that Congress lacked the power to deprive him of a civil trial affording all of the protections of article III and the fifth and sixth amendments to the Constitution. The writ was dismissed, 161 F. Supp. 112, and the Court of Appeals affirmed, 261 F. 2d 204. In the light of the opinion of this Court on the rehearing in Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957), as well as that of the Court of Appeals on the issue of the severability of article 2(11) in Guagliardo v. McElroy, 259 F. 2d 927,[2] we granted certiorari. 359 U.S. 978 (1959).

We are of the opinion that this case is controlled by Reid v. Covert, supra. It decided that the application of the article to civilian dependents charged with capital offenses while accompanying servicemen outside the United States was unconstitutional as violative of article III and the fifth and sixth amendments. We have carefully considered the Government's position as to the distinctions between civilian dependents and civilian employees, especially its voluminous historical materials relating to court-martial jurisdiction. However, the considerations pointed out in Covert have equal applicability here. Those who controlled the majority there held that the death penalty is so irreversible that a dependent charged with a capital crime must have the benefit of a jury. The awesomeness of the death penalty has no less impact when applied to civilian employees. Continued adherence to Covert requires civilian employees to be afforded the same right of trial by jury. Furthermore, the number of civilian employees is much smaller than the number of dependents, and the alternative procedures available for controlling discipline as to the former more effective. See McElroy v. Guagliardo. For the purposes of this decision, we cannot say that there are any valid distinctions between the two classes of persons. The judgment is therefore reversed.

It is so ordered.

JANUARY 19, 1960.

Hon. THOMAS S. GATES,
Secretary of Defense,
Department of Defense,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, for the past 2 years, has been studying the rights of persons under American military jurisdiction, particularly civilians, whether dependents, employees of the armed services, or defense contractors and their employees.

Accordingly, the subcommittee is very much interested in the Supreme Court decisions handed down yesterday in four cases involving persons in these categories.

This is to ask that you inform the subcommittee as soon as possible of the plans or plan proposed by the Department of Defense to handle criminal jurisdiction of civilians with American military overseas. I would like to know your thinking on this matter immediately and receive your detailed proposal as soon as it is prepared. It is presumed that you have been making such plans in the eventuality that the court would

---

[1] "Art. 2. The following persons are subject to this chapter:

* * * * * *

"(11) Subject to any treaty or agreement to which the United States is or may be a party or to any accepted rule of international law, persons serving with, employed by, or accompanying the Armed Forces outside the United States and outside the following: That part of Alaska east of longitude 172 degrees west, the Canal Zone, the main group of the Hawaiian Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands."

[2] In the light of our opinion in No. 21, McElroy v. Guagliardo, handed down today, we deny the contention that the article is nonseverable.

[11] Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), and Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942), both 14th amendment cases which would, of course, have no application here.

decide as it did. When we have had an opportunity to examine your suggestions, we will be in a better position to decide ourselves what public hearings or further study are indicated.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman.

JANUARY 19, 1960.

Hon. WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
Attorney General,
U.S. Department of Justice,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: The Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, for the past 2 years, has been studying the rights of persons under American military jurisdiction, particularly civilians, whether dependents, employees of the armed services, or defense contractors and their employees.

Accordingly, the subcommittee is very much interested in the Supreme Court decisions handed down yesterday in four cases involving persons in these categories.

This is to ask that you inform the subcommittee as soon as possible of the plans or plan proposed by the Department of Justice to handle criminal jurisdiction of civilians with American military overseas. I would like to know your thinking on this matter immediately and receive your detailed proposal as soon as it is prepared. It is presumed that you have been making such plans in the eventuality that the Court would decide as it did. When we have had an opportunity to examine your suggestions, we will be in a better positoin to decide ourselves what public hearings or further study are indicated.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman.

HENNINGS CALLS FOR JUSTICE AND DEFENSE DEPARTMENT VIEWS ON CRIMINAL PROSECUTION OF CIVILIANS WITH AMERICAN MILITARY OVERSEAS

U.S. Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Democrat, Missouri, chairman of the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, commenting on the Supreme Court decisions holding that the Constitution prohibits courts-martial of civilians with American military overseas in peacetime, pointed out today that the subcommittee has been continuing a study for the past 2 years on the subject, and called for Justice and Defense Department plans concerning criminal prosecution of such Americans who commit offenses overseas.

"I think the Court decisions are sound constitutional law and, further, I believe it would be quite incorrect to assume that there is now a legal 'no man's land' as a result of the holdings," Senator HENNINGS stated.

"However," the Senator went on, "the Government of the United States should decide what legal forum is most desirable in which to prosecute civilian offenders overseas.

"The nearly half-million civilians under discussion fall in three categories: (1) dependents of American military personnel, (2) Defense Department employees, and (3) defense contractors and their employees, working overseas with American Armed Forces," Senator HENNINGS explained.

"Of course," he said, "the hundreds of thousands of American civilians who travel abroad yearly, outside the above categories, are always subject to the criminal laws of the countries that they visit. This is equally true for civilians with the American military unless they are completely exempted from local laws by treaty provisions.

"The United States has several alternatives: (1) Let foreign countries try these American civilians the way they would try any other American civilians under their local laws in their own courts; (2) bring the civilians back for trial in courts in the United States; (3) enact legislation placing such civilians in a military status so that they could be covered by courts-martial under the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

"The Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee is anxious to receive the views of the Departments of Defense and Justice. I feel that necessary discipline and support for American defense operations outside the continental limits of the United States can be maintained at the same time we are guaranteeing basic constitutional rights of Americans," Senator HENNINGS concluded.

IMPORTANCE OF DEVELOPMENTS IN CHINA

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the Communist regime on the mainland of China has now been implanted for a full decade. During that time there has been evidence of many rumblings within Communist China, and quite forcefully brought to world attention was the ruthlessness with which the Chinese Communists dealt with the 1959 Tibetan rebellion.

In assessing both the past and future of the Communist regime, it seemed to me that it would be helpful to Members of the Senate and the general public to have an analysis of the frictions which have developed on the mainland since the Communist takeover. Accordingly, I asked the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress to prepare a study of tensions in Communist China, along the lines of a series of studies relating to tensions in the Soviet Union and the satellites which was prepared at my request several years ago. The earlier studies proved to be most useful documents.

The report indicates that some of the factual assumptions on which our China policy is based are not static, but are constantly in a state of change. Opposition to the present regime in Communist China is poorly and ineffectively organized, according to the report. In attempting to gain support, the Chinese Communists appeal to the nationalism of the people and seek to create resentment against the West.

Complacent westerners should not forget, however, that for many centuries before modern times—long before the advent of communism—this giant nation excelled all countries in cultural attainments, political stability, military prowess, and economic wealth. Today China is the second greatest national land mass on the globe and its people make up one-quarter of the world's population.

Reportedly, there have been extensive economic improvements in China in recent years. For example, it is reported that China mines four to five times more coal than during the best pre-Communist years. Operating railway and highway mileage has been tripled since 1949. While many of these accomplishments may be Communist exaggerations, there is no doubt that much has been changed in China since the Communists came to power.

In the light of these facts, the United States and the free world will need to design a strong, effective policy to deal with the impact which this mighty Nation will have upon not only its surrounding neighbors, but the world itself, in the years ahead.

In proposing a new, hard look at our China policy, this does not mean that we should go soft on communism. Nor does it mean—now or in the foreseeable future—that we should recognize Red China or admit it into the United Nations.

To the contrary, the purpose is to provide our policymakers with a more realistic evaluation of the changes and motivating forces in China.

An effective China policy must take into account the following factors:

First. The increasing military power of Red China, particularly when this massive nation obtains missile-nuclear weapons.

Second. The impact of the Chinese population explosion on both southeast Asia and the world community.

Third. The growing Chinese economic might, and its impact of world trade.

Fourth. The interrelationships in the Communist league, particularly between Peiping and Moscow.

For an effective policy, we must better understand what goes on in China, what motivates the Chinese Government, and what we can expect from the Chinese Government in the future. It is imperative that we take measures to keep developments in China under constant review, that we keep alert, adequate, and ready to meet changing conditions.

It has been the policy of the Chinese Communists to carry most of their campaigns—for industrialization, for farm communes, and for political control—to an excess, and such excesses may very well increase tensions within China. In the hurry to obtain national goals, the individual rights of the citizens are being ignored. Ten years after its establishment, the Communist regime still has no definite code of laws and no regard for civil liberties.

This study on "Tensions in Communist China" points to some of the major areas of tensions which have occurred on the mainland of China since the Communist takeover.

What do these findings mean? Fundamentally, this:

First. The Communist leadership now has a strong grasp on China—but only the future can tell how long this hold on the 650 million people of China will last.

Second. There is no doubt that large groups of the Chinese people, traditionally beset by hunger and poverty, are experiencing some economic benefits under the Communist system.

Third. If internal unity is accomplished and the rate of Chinese economic expansion continues, China may in a few years rank as one of the great powers. This, we must recognize, and prepare for.

Consequently, our China policy cannot be based on an attitude of turning our heads. We must remain alert and adequate.

I recommend this study of "Tensions in Communist China" as a highly informative and interesting one. I am informed that it will be ready for distribution today, and that it is Senate Document No. 66 of the 86th Congress, 1st session.

VOTING RECORDS IN DALLAS AND WILCOX COUNTIES, ALA.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to call to the attention of the Senate a well-documented series of incidents which point most directly to the need for responsible Federal officials who will respect the right of qualified U.S. citizens to vote and who, when called upon to do so by properly constituted authorities, will furnish proof that they have upheld these citizens' rights.

The Director of the Federal Civil Rights Commission has submitted to me a chronological account, recording a history of frustrations engaged in by officials in one of the States of this Union—a history which has now lasted for 14 months and has not yet ended—hampering work of the Federal Civil Rights Commission in determining whether or not the practice of democracy is truly being followed in every part of this Nation. This frustration persists in two counties, one of which, Dallas, has a nonwhite population over the age of 21 of 18,000 with only a maximum 5 percent of nonwhite voter registration, and the other of which, Wilcox, with a nonwhite population of more than 8,200 over the age of 21, has no perceivable nonwhite registration whatsoever.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in my remarks a letter I have received this morning from the Honorable Gordon Tiffany, Staff Director of the Federal Civil Rights Commission, and a series of newspaper articles from the local Alabama press, describing the record to which I refer.

There being no objection, the letter and newspaper articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS,
Washington, D.C., January 18, 1960.

Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR JAVITS: A member of your staff has been discussing the voting situation in Alabama with various members of my staff, in particular the difficulties we have encountered in attempting to carry out our duties with respect to the investigation of voting complaints in Alabama. As recently as the past week we made a further attempt to examine the voting records in Dallas and Wilcox Counties, two of the counties involved in our original hearing in Alabama in December of 1958, and were again prevented from seeing such records.

During the hearing, in the afternoon of December 8, 1958, one of the witnesses who had been subpenaed to appear before the Commission with the records was the probate judge of Dallas County, Hon. Bernard Reynolds. His testimony appears at page 188 of the record of the hearing which has now been printed. Judge Reynolds did not produce the records, stating that they had been subpenaed by the grand jury of Dallas County, dated the 5th day of December 1958 but served on him on the 4th day of December 1958. The same records had been subpenaed by the Commission on Civil Rights prior to the 4th day of December 1958, which Judge Reynolds admitted (p. 189 of the record).

During the spring of 1959 in order to complete our investigation, and subsequent to the examination of the records of Macon, Barbour, and Bullock Counties, we again requested an examination of the records of Dallas and Wilcox Counties and were advised through a statement by the grand juries that we could see only those records of the complaining witnesses whose names we would divulge to the grand jury. This was contrary to the examination of the records in Macon, Barbour, and Bullock Counties, wherein all of the records were open for inspection.

Negotiations were made for the inspection of the records of Dallas and Wilcox Counties in the spring of 1959 between this office and Mr. Joseph F. Johnston, president of the Alabama State Bar Association, who appeared in the hearings in the Federal court in Montgomery, Ala., in January of 1959 at the time of the legal arguments involved in our examination of the records of Macon, Barbour, and Bullock Counties.

At the special direction of the Commission to attempt to wind up all unfinished investigations, negotiations were again established with Mr. Johnston the latter part of December 1959 and on January 6, 1960, for the purpose of making a final attempt to see these records. As a result of conversations with Mr. Johnston, representatives appeared at the office of the judge of the circuit court embracing Dallas and Wilcox Counties on Tuesday, January 12, and Wednesday, January 13, 1960. The representatives were again informed that the voting records of those counties were still under subpena to the grand jury and that all additional voting records since that time were under subpena to the grand jury, and, therefore, were not available for inspection by our representatives except in those cases where we would disclose the names of the complaining witnesses, after which we might examine the records of those witnesses.

In order to present a picture of the attitude of the authorities in Alabama at the present time, I have enclosed herewith photographic copies of the newspaper publicity taken from the local Alabama papers last week during and following the visit of our representatives.

If there is any further information you desire with respect to our attempt to see the records, will you be good enough to communicate with me.

Sincerely yours,

GORDON M. TIFFANY,
Staff Director.

[From the Birmingham News, Jan. 14, 1960]

FORTY-FIVE COMPLAINTS MADE—PROBERS CHECK MONTGOMERY VOTING CASES

(By James Free)

WASHINGTON, January 14.—The U.S. Civil Rights Commission has checked on 45 recent voting rights complaints from Montgomery County, a spokesman said here today.

It has made a third vain attempt to see voting records in Dallas, Wilcox, and Lowndes Counties, he added.

He said the investigations in Montgomery County began several weeks ago and has just been completed. Fieldmen from the Commission tried without success to look at records in Dallas and Wilcox Counties earlier this week.

A planned visit to Lowndes County today was called off as useless.

Col. A. H. Rosenfeld, head of the field division, said the Commission sought to inspect records in these three counties on the basis of an oral agreement worked out with Alabama authorities in Federal Judge Frank M. Johnson's office in Montgomery early last year. Gov. John Patterson, then attorney general, was a party to the agreement, Rosenfeld said.

"These Alabama counties had everything to gain and nothing to lose by letting us see their records," said Rosenfeld. "After all, we already have reported on the general registration situation in these counties. We probably could have added little more except for detail and documentation. And—more important—we would have wound up our unfinished business there. As it is, the continued challenge cannot be ignored."

Next step of the Commission probably will be to report to Congress on the Alabama situation. The continued refusal of Alabama authorities to make these voting records available to the Commission could stir liberals in Congress to more demands for new civil rights legislation.

Efforts are now being made in the House to bypass the Rules Committee and get a civil rights bill to the floor by a discharge petition. At last reports, the petition lacked 40 to 50 of the required 219 signatures.

A Birmingham news survey last year gave the following voter registration figures in the four counties:

Wilcox—3,040 registered, no Negroes.

Montgomery—29,000 registered, including 3,480 Negroes.

Lowndes—2,306 registered, no Negroes.

Dallas—8,000 registered, including 520 Negroes.

At Selma, Circuit Judge James A. Hare said the investigators conferred with us about grand jury meetings in Dallas and Wilcox Counties and the possibility of their inspecting board of registrar records now in the hands of those grand juries.

Hare said they also asked about the location of grand jury records in Lowndes County.

"I told them that Lowndes County is not in my circuit and I don't know what those folks over there do with their records," Hare told a reporter.

Dallas and Wilcox Counties are in the fourth judicial circuit which Hare represents. Lowndes is in the second judicial circuit.

Judge Hare said he informed the investigators of the next regular meeting dates of the grand juries—in Dallas County January 24, and in Wilcox County during February.

He said he reminded them of past action of these grand juries concerning Commission requests to inspect voting records in their hands.

These grand juries have agreed to permit Commission investigators to examine records held by them under certain conditions.

These conditions call for an agreement that the records would be examined only upon the presentation of a specific complaint brought against the board of registrars.

Any inspection would be made in the presence of a special grand jury committee and the circuit solicitor.

Hare said the investigators declined to disclose any specific complaint.

Voter registration records in Dallas and Wilcox Counties have been in the hands of grand juries since November 1958, when Hare ordered them to investigate alleged malpractice of voter registration.

[From the Birmingham Post-Herald, Jan. 15, 1960]

PATTERSON "DELIGHTED" IF HE INTERFERED IN RIGHTS VOTE PROBE

(By Donald F. Martin)

MONTGOMERY, January 14.—Gov. John Patterson said today he was "delighted" if he interfered with a Civil Rights Commission investigation in Alabama because "it is the most unconstitutional body there is."

The Governor's statement followed an accusation by a Civil Rights spokesman in Washington that Dallas and Wilcox Counties officials had broken an agreement to give Commission agents access to the voting records of the two counties. The spokesman said three Commission field representatives met with a circuit judge and other officials at Selma Wednesday in an effort to examine voting records.

DENIES AGREEMENT

Patterson hotly denied any agreement, but added "if there was an agreement (Col. A. H.) Rosenfeld, chief investigator for the Commission, and his so-called civil righters broke it."

While denying any deal, the chief executive said "there was an agreement that the Federal investigators could see the records in Macon County and then get out. They were given a certain length of time.

"But what did they do? They went ahead and sued us anyway."

Patterson implied that permission had been given on the basis the Federal Government would not sue the State as such.

Showing his anger, Patterson said, "If I've caused these so-called civil righters any difficulty, I'm delighted."

The Governor said the Federal Commission "got beat in court and now they're mad as hell about it. The trouble with Rosenfeld," he said, "is that his word ain't good." There was no agreement.

"If he made an agreement, it was not to sue the State and he repudiated his own agreement. This Commission has used lies, intimidation, and harrassment against our public officials.

"They are trying to destroy our schools and stir up race conflict. If the President wanted to help the country he would kick that bunch.

"Let them go to New York City where you can't even walk down the street safely."

RECORDS IMPOUNDED

The civil rights spokesman said when the investigators arrived there the judge said that the records were still impounded by the grand jury.

"They've been saying that for 14 months and they've had an election since then," he added. "I wonder how they held that election. They can keep saying that the records are impounded for the next 3 years."

The spokesman said the latest defiance on the part of Alabama officials would be mentioned "when Commission members testify before House and Senate committees considering proposals that Federal registrars be sent into the area where certain persons cannot get registered by local officials."

Patterson, in a press conference a few weeks ago, requested all State, county, and local officials to refuse aid to the Federal agents. While attorney general in 1958, Patterson also advised all boards of registrars to close their records to the Federal agents.

Grand juries in Barbour, Bullock, Lowndes, Wilcox, and Dallas Counties went into emergency sessions and impounded all voter registration records just before a Civil Rights Commission hearing here December 8, 1958. The jury action blocked Rosenfeld's attempts to compile alleged evidence from the records.

[From the Montgomery (Ala.) Journal, Jan. 14, 1960]

RIGHTS MEN BLOCKED—GRAND JURIES HOLD RECORDS IN TWO COUNTIES

WASHINGTON.—Field representatives of the Federal Civil Rights Commission failed yesterday in a renewed effort to gain access to voting records of Dallas and Wilcox Counties in Alabama.

A spokesman of the Federal Civil Rights Commission said today that two field representatives were in Selma, Ala., yesterday by appointment to meet with the State circuit court judge and other officials.

The spokesman said it was understood in advance that the representatives were to be given access to records the Commission has sought since late 1958.

JURY HOLDS RECORDS

"The representatives were told that the records are still impounded by the grand jury," the spokesman said. "They were told that the grand jury would let them see the records pertaining to any complaining witness, if they would divulge the names of the witnesses."

The grand jury impounded the records after the Civil Rights Commission sought to subpena them for a hearing in December 1958.

The spokesman said the field representatives arranged to leave Selma yesterday after reporting by telephone on what had taken place.

Circuit Judge James A. Hare today revealed at Selma that inquiries were made there concerning voter registration in Dallas, Wilcox, and Lowndes Counties by Civil Rights Commission agents.

Hare said two men who showed credentials associating them with the Commission had spent 2 days questioning him, Circuit Solicitor Blanchard L. McLeod, and Dallas Sheriff James G. Clark.

Hare issued a brief statement after the sessions ended Wednesday. He said:

"They conferred with us about grand-jury meetings in Dallas and Wilcox Counties and the possibility of their inspecting board of registrars' records now in the hands of those grand juries."

Hare said they also asked about the location of grand-jury records in Lowndes County.

"I told them that Lowndes County is not in my circuit and I don't know what those folks over there do with their records," Hare told a reporter.

Dallas and Wilcox Counties are in the fourth judicial circuit, which Hare represents. Lowndes is in the second judicial circuit.

Hare said he could only identify the two men as Bounds and Miller.

Judge Hare said he informed the two men of the next regular meeting dates of the grand juries—in Dallas County January 24 and in Wilcox during February.

He said he reminded them of the past action of these grand juries concerning commission requests to inspect voting records in their hands.

These grand juries have agreed to permit Commission investigators to examine records held by them under certain conditions.

These conditions call for an agreement that the records would be examined only upon the presentation of a specific complaint brought against the board of registrars.

Any inspection would be made in the presence of a special grand-jury committee and the circuit solicitor.

Hare said the two men declined to disclose any specific complaint.

Voter registration records in Dallas and Wilcox Counties have been in the hands of grand juries since November 1958, when Hare ordered them to investigate "alleged malpractice of voter registration."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PROXMIRE in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. Is there further morning business?

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Chair lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PROXMIRE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

THE BUDGET AND THE ECONOMY

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, time and again the junior Senator from Tennessee has lifted his voice in apprehension over the drift and complacency, in this crucial period in world history, of U.S. policy and program, and the weakness of its leadership.

I am prompted once again to cry out a word of warning, and I wish to call to the attention of the Senate a very pungent and beautifully written article by the eminent commentator, Mr. Walter Lippmann, published in today's issue of the Washington Post.

Mr. Lippmann says:

The President has been true to the principle he laid down in his budget, which was submitted on January 21, 1954. "We will reduce" he said 6 years ago, "the share of the national income which is spent by the Government."

He has done that.

Later on in the article Mr. Lippmann says:

So the President is entitled to say that he has been faithful to the principle he laid down when he began. During his term of office the American people have been enjoying a larger share of a greatly enlarged national income.

Then Mr. Lippmann says:

This would be an unalloyed delight were it not for the disturbing fact that during these years of private prosperity, the President has been presiding over the loss of American primacy among the great powers of the world.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article written by Mr. Lippmann be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECOND BEST

(By Walter Lippmann)

The President has been true to the principle he laid down in his first budget, which was submitted on January 21, 1954. "We will reduce," he said 6 years ago, "the share of the national income which is spent by the Government."

He has done that. Although the Federal Government is spending on the purchase of goods and services more than it did 6 years ago, this is a smaller share of the much increased national income. Even when we add the very considerable increased amount spent by local and State governments, the total is still a smaller share than it was in 1953, when the President was preparing his first budget.

So the President is entitled to say that he has been faithful to the principle he laid down when he began. During his term of office the American people have been enjoying a larger share of a greatly enlarged national income. Never before in all history have so many people in any country had so much money to spend privately and as they saw fit.

This would be an unalloyed delight were it not for the disturbing fact that during these years of private prosperity, the President has been presiding over the loss of American primacy among the great powers of the world.

There is no doubt that this country is still much richer than the Soviet Union. It may be, although no one knows, not any weaker than the Soviet Union. But we have fallen behind and are not holding our own in terms of national power, in overall military capacity, in the competition to pioneer in outer space, in the comparative rate of economic growth, and in education, which is the lifegiving principle of national power.

Why has this happened? Why are we challenged in this way when, in fact, the Soviet Union has a gross national product which is less than half of ours and a standard of living about a third as high as our own? Why is this richer country being pressed by a poorer country?

The reason, at bottom, is that in this period of cold war, the President has adhered to a principle which would probably no longer be suitable even in a time of total peace. He has adhered to a principle which puts private comfort and private consumption ahead of national need. The President has spent his 7 years in office reducing the share of the national income devoted to public purposes. The challenge of the Soviet Union has been demanding an increase, not a reduction, of the share of the national income devoted to public purposes. We are falling behind in the race because we are not allowed to run.

The Soviet economy is growing at a rate which, estimated conservatively, is 6 percent per annum. Our economy has been growing at a rate of less than 3 percent. The Soviet economy is half as big as ours but it is growing twice as fast. This means that this year's increment of increase is about $12 billion in the U.S.S.R. and about $15 billion in the United States of America.

But, and this is the crux of the matter, the U.S.S.R. will use most, not all, of the $12 billion increase for national purposes, for armaments, for productive investment, for foreign aid, and for national education. We, on the other hand, are acting on the Eisenhower principle, and are spending a greater share of our $15 billion increase for private purposes, for the making of consumer goods and of the factories and facilities connected with the making and use of consumer goods.

That is why the national power of the Soviet Union is forging ahead of the national power of the United States.

I have taken this analysis of the figures from several sources but chiefly from the brilliant and notable testimony before the Joint Committee of Congress given last autumn by Prof. W. W. Rostow, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The analysis is confirmed by the testimony of Mr. Allen W. Dulles, based on the findings of the Central Intelligence Agency.

The concluding paragraph of Mr. Dulles' statement is one that we must all ponder and take to heart. It says "the major thrust of Soviet economic development and its high technological skills and resources are directed toward specialized industrial, military, and national power goals. A major thrust of our economy is directed into the production of the consumer type goods and services which add little to the sinews of our national strength. Hence, neither the size of our respective gross national products nor of our respective industrial productions is a true yardstick of our relative national power positions.

"The uses to which economic resources are directed largely determine the measure of national power."

I have quoted the last sentence of Mr. Dulles' statement because it states, so it seems to me, the fundamental issue which the country must meet. The President's controlling principle—that the Government should spend a smaller share of a growing national income—has as its consequence, in this age of cold war and national rivalry, that the country will have a smaller position of influence and power in the world. While it may be that the days of our primacy, which were brief, are ending, what must not be allowed to come to an end is our parity with the greatest powers. For on it depend many of the dearest hopes of mankind.

Nobody can say as yet when the Nation will become aroused to the realization that national duty must take precedence over private indulgence, that it is not possible to preserve our society by private affluence and public complacency

The voices that will serve this country, and indeed save it, will be those of stern men demanding hard things. They may not as yet do well in the Gallup polls. They will be listened to sooner or later. For they will shatter the belief, now so prevalent among us, that affluence is greatness. It is not. In the history of human societies it has not seldom been the case that when riches were devoted to luxury it was the mark of their decline.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD: FACT OR FICTION OF THE LEGISLATIVE PROCESS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, in the December 1959 issue of the Western Political Quarterly there appeared an excellent article by Howard N. Mantel, of Columbia University, entitled "The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD: Fact or Fiction of the Legislative Process."

In a most illuminating discussion, Mr. Mantel explores the use of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the courts in interpreting statutes passed by Congress.

Mr. Mantel reviews present practices by which a Member of Congress may revise or extend his remarks so as to appear to have delivered remarks during debate which, in fact, he did not, or may insert material in a fashion which leaves the impression that he spoke on the floor when, actually, he did not.

RECORD ACCURACY QUESTIONED

He cites the use by the courts of statements appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in attempting to clarify the intent of Congress for the purpose of determining the meaning of statutory language, and questions the weight which can be given to such evidence in light of procedures followed in recording of the statements of Members of Congress.

Mr. Mantel notes court acceptance of the accuracy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and examines the legal difficulties involved in raising this question in the courts. He concludes that—

A strong argument can be made for the gradual lessening of weight assigned in appellate cases to the floor debates as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless and until the revision and extension practices are radically revamped. There is need for a rule against substantive changes in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and, in the case of the House of Representatives, against extensions which appear as speeches. Changes for the sake of grammar and, perhaps, rhetoric should be allowed, with prudence the keyword to apprehensive Congressmen, worried about the possible effects their unexpurgated remarks may have in home districts.

SUGGESTIONS FOR IMPROVEMENT OFFERED

Several suggestions are made by Mr. Mantel for improvement of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a device for reporting of congressional debates, including use of maps, diagrams, and illustrations to help explain debates—a suggestion which I advanced in an article in the New York Times in 1958; a limit on the number of items which a Member of Congress may insert in the Appendix during a single session; a table of contents to each day's Appendix items; a status table of major substantive legislation; and a weekly digest of debates reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. President, I think that Mr. Mantel's article points up a significant problem upon which the Congress should act. In the 85th Congress, the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] and I introduced Senate Resolution 193 to amend the standing rules of the Senate to prohibit substantive changes in the recording of remarks made on the Senate floor. The resolution provided that changes would be permissible only to correct grammar and syntax and to eliminate errors made in the transcribing of remarks. We reintroduced this proposal in the 1st session of the 86th Congress. It is embodied in Senate Resolution 168.

CONGRESS HAS RESPONSIBILITY

In view of the fact that Congress has in general retained to itself the privilege of deciding whether or not a Member may voluntarily, or in answer to a subpena, testify in ordinary courts of justice as to any matter pertaining to his official capacity, a special responsibility is placed upon Congress to insure that justice is not denied through its practices in the recording of its official proceedings. If the actions of Congress are to be analyzed in courts of law on the basis of statements appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, then the RECORD must actually be a record—an honest reporting of the remarks of individual Members. Rigging the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD represents not merely a distortion of debate, but a real interference with the carrying out of justice in the courts.

As Mr. Mantel states:

A certain fiber of moral courage is needed so that Members of Congress will not hesitate to speak their minds on issues of the day. Perpetual doctoring of the primary source of legislative activity is no solution to hasty thoughts and hot tempers.

I commend this article to my colleagues. I urge that they read it. I hope that they will act on it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Mantel's comments be printed in their entirety at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD: FACT OR FICTION OF THE LEGISLATIVE PROCESS

(By Howard N. Mantel)

Unlike its staid British cousin the Parliamentary Debates (Hansard), the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is at times a lively, and is always a many-faceted, publication.[1] It records the debates of the House and Senate; it summarizes activities of congressional committees; it is replete with editorial opinion gleaned from the great and the not-so-great newspapers of America; and it is dotted with such sundry items as poetry, both professional and homespun, high school essays on "what democracy means to me," the results of a particular Congressman's public opinion poll, letters to the editor and other miscellany, ad infinitum. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD serves also as a local tabloid of events on Capitol Hill, recording, for example, the menu and agenda for the serving of the second Senate salad, an epicurean concoction combining the finest in back-home specialties, to be offered in "the world's largest salad bowl—3 feet wide and 14 inches deep. Heaped, it will serve 320 main course salads. Hand turned, it is made of solid walnut."[2]

This paper explores problems implicit in reporting the proceedings and debates of Congress, the value of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as an instrument of immediate political control and as a source of information, and its historic value as documentation of the legislative process, both to the scholar and (as illustrative of the problem generally) to the courts where the RECORD serves as evidence of legislative intent of statutes enacted by Congress. That the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under present rules of publication is not altogether accepted by those who write it is evidenced by a speech on the floor of the House by Representative THOMAS CURTIS of Missouri[3] and an article by Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER in the New York Times.[4]

I

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not the official record of the proceedings of the House and Senate, that function being fulfilled by the Journal of each House in accordance with the constitutional requirement that "each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgments require secrecy. * * *"[5] The RECORD is, by law, "substantially a verbatim report of proceedings," to be printed under control of the Joint Committee on Printing.[6]

The daily edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a formidable document, printed on newsprint and containing stapled pages measuring 8½ by 11 inches. A single issue may have upward of 200 pages. Each day's proceedings follow a set pattern, the Senate debates preceding those of the House,[7] which, in turn, are followed by a voluminous Appendix and the well-prepared and informative Daily Digest. A semimonthly printing of the daily RECORD is issued in limited edition, together with an index for that period. Thereafter, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is "revised, printed, and bound promptly, as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, in permanent form, for distribution during and after the close of each session of Congress."[8]

The significant thing about the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is that, by statute, it is not intended to be an exact reproduction of the remarks uttered on the floor. The language, "substantially a verbatim report on proceedings," reflects accurately what the RECORD is, the less-than-verbatim status being derived from custom and practice of the two Houses: a Member may revise his own remarks and, in the House of Representatives, may insert into the RECORD as a speech material never uttered on the floor of the House. The Official Reporters work in relays; one reporter takes down the debates for several minutes and immediately transcribes them, so that before the printing deadline a Member has full opportunity, timewise, to revise his own remarks.

In the Senate, revision is done as a matter of course. Senator NEUBERGER in his Times article described one aspect of the process as follows:

"After a major debate in the Senate over an issue which stirs profound emotions * * * I have seen many Senators * * * virtually rewriting the speeches and retorts just delivered on the floor of the Senate. Some will totally expunge comments made in the heat of debate that may seem indiscreet or unwise in the cold, gray light of the next dawn and in the inflexible type of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Others will be adding afterthoughts, which may furnish an extra fillip to a reply that was flat or ineffective when uttered under the duress of argument in the Senate Chamber."[9]

In a recent volume on Senate procedure and precedents, it is stated, "A Senator in making a revision of his remarks is not supposed to make any substantial changes therein. (He has no rule of the Senate for guidance.)"[10]

In the House of Representatives it is customary and universal for a Member to ask and to obtain unanimous consent to revise remarks made, usually with leave to extend. Revision, but not the right to extend, may be done without such express permission of the House although the precedents speak of a necessary consent of the Speaker. The Joint Committee rules do not, in terms, authorize revision, but speak of revision as accepted fact. Section 3 states, "When manuscript is submitted to Members for revision, * * *"; section 5 states, "Proofs of 'leave to print' and advance speeches will not be furnished the day the manuscript is received * * *"; and section 6 refers to manuscripts returned too late for printing in the day's RECORD. House practice prohibits a Member from changing the remarks of another Member, nor can he alter his own remarks "in such a way as to affect the remarks of an opponent in controversy without bringing the correction to the attention of that Member."[11] Representative CURTIS of Missouri has pointed out that under present practice some far-reaching results are obtained: "This privilege has been abused to the extent that even in a colloquy which has occurred in debate the remarks of one of the debaters has been so changed as to render meaningless the printed remarks of his opponent which remain unrevised."[12] Under permission of the House to extend remarks, a Member may add to his own spoken remarks or have inserted as a speech statements never made on the floor.[13] Some curious results follow: A Member may ask and obtain leave for another Member to extend even though such Member is absent from the floor; where an authorized extension is submitted too late in the day to appear in the body of the RECORD, it will usually appear in the Appendix, but as a speech, not as an extension of remarks.

Senate procedure is more circumscribed. Speeches not actually delivered may be printed in the body of the RECORD or in the Appendix, but they must appear in "such manner as to indicate clearly that the contents thereof were not read orally by such Senator on the floor of the Senate."[14] The difference between the two Houses as to extension in the body of the RECORD stems directly from the size of each body. Time considerations are so precious on the House side that speeches made just after the House convenes, and before the business of the day—that is, while there is a sizable audi-

---

[1] The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD dates from Mar. 4, 1873, 43d Cong. Earlier volumes covering the proceedings and debates of Congress consisted of the Debates and Proceedings (generally known by its binder's title, Annals of Congress), 1st–18th Congs., 1789–1824 (42 volumes, 1834–56); Register of Debates, 18th Cong., 2d sess.–25th Cong., 1st sess., 1824–37 (14 volumes in 29, 1825–37); Congressional Globe, 23d–42d Cong., 1833–73 (46 volumes in 108, 1834–73). See Constance M. Winchell, Guide to Reference Books (7th ed.; Chicago: American Library Association, 1951), p. 108.

[2] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 9, pp. 11421–11422, 11505–11506. Among other ingredients, the salad was to contain 2 quarts of Michigan vinegar blended with 30 envelopes of a garlic-type salad dressing mix and 5½ quarts of salad oil; frozen Florida grapefruit sections; Alabama watercress from Huntsville, "watercress capital of the world"; California ripe olives and 32 heads of California iceberg lettuce; lemon-flavored gelatin from Le Roy, N.Y.; New Jersey tomatoes; Texas gulf shrimp, escarole, and green onions.

[3] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 5, pp. 6594–6597.

[4] "The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Is Not a Record," New York Times, April 20, 1958, sec. 6, 14, reprinted in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 5, pp. 6816–6818. NEUBERGER reasserted his position on this subject in a recent Senate speech. See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 105, pt. 12, pp. 16454–16455. He has also introduced a resolution (S. Res. 168, 86th Cong.) to curb certain practices in the Senate. The text of the resolution follows: "Resolved, That the Standing Rules of the Senate are amended by adding at the end thereof the following new rule: 'Rule XLI. Reporting of Proceedings in the Senate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Except as provided herein, the remarks of Senators in proceedings of the Senate shall be recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as actually made. Changes in the recording of such remarks shall be permissible only to correct grammar and syntax, and to correct actual errors made in the reporting of such remarks. No changes of a substantive nature or changes concerning remarks of another Senator made in the proceedings shall be permitted.' "

[5] U.S. Constitution, art. I, sec. 5, clause 3. On the proposition that the Journal, not the RECORD, is the official record of the proceedings, see Hinds' "Precedents of the House of Representatives," vol. IV, sec. 2727.

[6] Title 44, U.S.C., sec. 181. Sec. 182a of that title provides, "The public proceedings of each House of Congress, as reported by the Official Reporters thereof, shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD." See also U.S. Congress, Joint Committee on Printing, Rules for Publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 2, 1956.

[7] Joint Committee Rules, sec. 1. The rule contains a proviso authorizing the House debates to be printed first, when the Senate debates are not received in time.

[8] Title 44, U.S.C., sec. 182a.

[9] NEUBERGER, op. cit.

[10] Charles L. Watkins and Floyd M. Riddick, Senate Procedure, S. Doc. No. 93, 85th Cong., 2d sess. 204 (1958).

[11] Manual and Rules, U.S. House of Representatives, 1957, sec. 928. See also Hinds, op. cit., vol. V, sec. 6972 and vol. VIII, sec. 3462.

[12] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 5, p. 6594.

[13] See Clarence Cannon, Cannon's Procedure in the House of Representatives (Washington: GPO, 1953, 82d Cong., 2d Sess., H. Doc. No. 562), p. 318.

[14] Rules and Manual, U.S. Senate, 1957, p. 132 (standing order of the Senate of July 23, 1947, S. Res. 127, Senate Journal, 80th Cong., 1st sess., p. 510).

ence—are normally limited to 1 minute. Even during general debate either in the House qua House or when sitting as Committee of the Whole, time is scarce, and tempers have been known to rise to the height of fisticuffs over the question of allotment of time.[15]

There are reasons for "fixing up" the RECORD, some of which, at least, deserve more than cursory attention. There is a real question of how best to facilitate the placing on record of the views of a Member both as to current national issues and to more local ones.[16] Questions of grammar and rhetoric involved in transcribing oral remarks, often delivered impromptu, to printed literature worthy of perpetual scrutiny, require that some minimum flexibility be allowed. Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts, offers still another reason for favoring a broad revision policy:

Sometimes in running debate, extemporaneous debate in the House and heated argument, I say things sharply that upon reflection I would not have said and did not mean. * * * But I have always gone to the Member and said, "I just did not mean that; do you mind if I delete it?" I do not want to have anything sharp in the RECORD unless someone is nasty with me, trying to smear me, but I find upon reading my remarks that unintentionally I had a sharper quality that I do not want to possess, but that in running debate I find occasionally I do possess.[17]

The daily edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not always completely accurate, hence the customary unanimous consent grants in both Houses to correct the previous day's RECORD. The House has, on occasion, ordered the omission from the permanent RECORD of remarks made but not caught at the time of utterance.[18] On rare occasions, remarks made during debate are excluded from the daily RECORD as being in violation of the rules of House or Senate. A Member of the House, for example, may be called to order for words spoken in debate and, under rule XIV, section 5, "the Member calling him to order shall indicate the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing * * * and read aloud to the House; but he shall not be held to answer, nor be subject to the censure of the House therefor, if further debate or other business has intervened."[19]

It is almost impossible to ascertain the accuracy of a Senate speech once printed since there does not appear in the RECORD any request for authority to revise, but it is possible at times to gain some slight insight into the revision and extension practices in the House. In the case of extensions in the body of the RECORD, a careful reading may disclose an individual request to extend, so, while the extension appears as a speech, it is obviously not a speech actually delivered. There are, however, many instances of leave to extend being granted across the board for all Members of the House. It is the practice of the House for such permission to be granted immediately after passage of a bill and, in fact, this permission is given to extend remarks for five legislative days thereafter. There is no way of determining whether such remarks are uttered or inserted. In the case of an individual request to extend, if the extension is part of an actual, delivered speech, there is no sure way of determining which portion was delivered and which inserted under the leave-to-extend privilege.

II

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not an inexpensive document to publish. In 1956 the total printing cost of the daily edition (43,000 copies), the semimonthly reprint, the index, and the bound edition cost $1,733,861.06. The cost of the daily edition alone for that period was $1,311,763.06, at an estimated page cost of $60.47. The total cost of the Appendix for 1956 was estimated at $480,000 and, as an indication that the cost for publishing the RECORD is rising, an estimate for page cost of the daily for 1959 is given as $81.[20]

The Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD serves the principal distinction of keeping out of the body of the RECORD the mass of extraneous material which would, otherwise, hopelessly clog the reported debates. In the Appendix, too, appears those items intended for the body of the RECORD but which are returned too late in the day. Some of the Appendix items relate directly to pending issues; many do not. There are limitations on what may be included, and it would appear that nothing which may not be uttered on the floor may be inserted in the Appendix.[21] No insertion which will run more than two pages may be printed unless an estimate of the cost, obtained from the Public Printer, is recited in the unanimous consent request.[22] This limitation is somewhat illusory in that consent may be obtained to extend in three, four, or a score of instances. The Joint Committee rules provide that an article printed in two or more parts "shall be considered as a single extension and the two-page rule shall apply."[23] Further, section 10 of the rules provides for elimination of duplication of articles, with the caveat that it does not "apply to quotations which form part of a speech of a Member, or to an authorized extension of his own remarks." The rule prohibits insertions of speeches, addresses, or articles delivered or released after the session of Congress. Notwithstanding these limitations the Appendix is enormous and the variety of material which finds its way into the Appendix is truly amazing. Beginning with the 83d Congress, 2d session, the Appendix is no longer bound permanently as separate volumes, although some extension of remarks in the House are included following each day's session.[24]

The Daily Digest is a summary index of congressional activity prepared by a staff of employees under the supervision of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and is authorized by the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.[25] Periodically, the Daily Digest contains a statistical summary of legislative activity for the session to date, as well as a status table of the annual appropriation bills. It would be helpful if a similar table of major legislative resolutions, bills, and treaties were published. The Daily Digest does not attempt to summarize the speeches delivered. While the Digest is designed to make meaningful the great mass of material in the body of the RECORD and to furnish helpful information on other action of Congress, to the political scientist and to the historian it offers a unique opportunity to study the day-by-day activities of the committees, whose journals and minutes are not always available. The Daily Digest for each session is bound and indexed in separate volumes from the debates, and I recommend it as one of the more important documents for the study of congressional activity.[26]

III

Much of what has already been discussed is academic unless one considers the "how" and the "why" of the RECORD's publication in light of its use. The value of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is twofold: first, as a source of information and political control, and second, as an historical record of congressional activity and intent. The RECORD under the practice of revision and extension described, can be viewed as a good approximation of what transpires on the floor of each House; but it is not, obviously, a spontaneous transcript. Major changes in text present an inaccurate and misleading picture of congressional debate and intent. Senator GORDON ALLOTT, of Colorado, notes, "I myself have participated in numerous debates on the floor, and sometimes when I read the RECORD the following morning, I have found it very difficult to recognize the debate which occurred."[27] We may illustrate some of the difficulties which ensue from this situation by examining the extent to which the courts use the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and other legislative documents in determining questions of statutory interpretation. In an era of

---

[15] Letter to editor, New York Times, June 30, 1940, "Speeding Up Legislation," reprinted, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 95, pt. 15, p. A4326.

[16] See, in this connection, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 96, pt. 17, p. A5837, reprinted, U.S. Congress, Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, Hearings on Evaluation of the Effects of Laws Enacted To Reorganize the Legislative Branch of the Government, 82d Cong., 1st sess., 1951, p. 304 (hereinafter cited as Hearings).

[17] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 5, p. 6597.

[18] Cannon, op. cit., sec. 926, p. 315; Hinds, op. cit., vol. V, secs. 6978–81. Letter from Charles H. Hallam, Associate Librarian, U.S. Supreme Court Library (July 15, 1958), reveals that the Supreme Court Library has a file of the semimonthly cumulative edition of the daily RECORD from 1940 to date. It is interesting to note that the library has "a nearly complete run of dailies from 1885 to 1891, which were bound for the convenience and use of a then member of the Court."

[19] Discussed, House Manual, op. cit., secs. 671, 924, 925. For the Senate rule, see rule XIX and Jefferson's Manual, sec. XVII.

[20] Letter from Raymond Blattenberger, Public Printer; U.S. Government Printing Office (July 15, 1958). Dates given are for fiscal years.

[21] Cannon, op. cit., p. 319, and Hinds, op. cit., vol. V, secs. 7004, 7005, and 7008. The Senate, on motion or by unanimous consent, may reverse a previous unanimous consent grant to place matters in the RECORD and order the matter stricken. Watkins and Riddick, op. cit., p. 200.

[22] Joint Committee rules, sec. 11. The rule does not apply "to excerpts from letters, telegrams, or articles presented in connection with a speech delivered in the course of debate or to communications from State legislatures, addresses, or articles by the President and the members of his Cabinet, the Vice President, or a Member of Congress."

[23] Ibid.

[24] The Index includes reference to all Appendix items but with the notation that page references preceded by "A" indicate Appendix material deleted from the permanent RECORD. Thus, in order to have a complete file of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD it is now necessary either to bind the daily or semimonthly Appendixes or to obtain microfilm files thereof. Note that an analysis of the growth of the Appendix, including statistics showing the number of items inserted therein by Members, is included in remarks of Representative JONES of Missouri in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 105, pt. 8, pp. 9545–9547. The text of the resolution by the Joint Committee on Printing setting forth its policy on the Appendix (revised to Feb. 6, 1956) is contained in JONES' remarks.

[25] Sec. 221; title 44, U.S.C., sec. 182c.

[26] A poll of 67 Senators and 263 Representatives, conducted in December 1950, determined that the Daily Digest, of all innovations resulting from the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, was the most successful. Only 4 percent of the Senators and 7 percent of the Representatives polled felt that it was unsuccessful. Hearings, op. cit., p. 7.

[27] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 5, p. 6016.

increasing Federal activity, the answer to the question, "What did Congress mean?" becomes of vital significance, and the documentation reflecting congressional intent becomes a part of the living literature of our statutes.

The American rule on construction of statutes differs from the rule followed in Great Britain: "The sense and meaning of an act of Parliament must be collected from what it says when passed into a law; and not from the history of changes it underwent in the house where it took its rise. That history is not known to the other house or to the sovereign." [28] While it is not our purpose to comment on the wisdom of this approach, which should be viewed in the context of the whole juridical picture of the United Kingdom, yet the comment of Mr. Justice Frankfurter is revealing:

"These current English rules of construction are simple. They are too simple. If the purpose of construction is the ascertainment of meaning, nothing that is logically relevant should be excluded. The rigidity of English courts in interpreting language merely by reading it disregards the fact that enactments are, as it were, organisms which exist in their environment. One wonders whether English judges are confined psychologically as they purport to be legally. The judges deem themselves limited to reading the words of a statute. But can they really escape placing the words in the context of their minds, which after all are not automata applying legal logic but repositories of all sorts of assumptions and impressions? Such a modest if not mechanical view of the task of construction disregards legal history." [29] In the United States the courts have generally moved beyond the English rule. A court will look at the language of the act and in doing so may apply one or more of a number of canons or maxims of construction, e.g., that a penal statute is to be strictly construed; general language following particularly described acts, classes of persons, or other enumerated objects are to be viewed as applicable to the general kind described by the enumerated items or persons and not as a complete generality (ejusdem generis rule); [30] what was the mischief sought to be remedied by the statute; or that statutes in pari materia, that is, relating to the same subject, should be construed together. The court may also seek to determine the meaning of the language of the statute by inquiring into the legislative intent as set forth in the history of the act. It is here that persists the essential difference between English and American methods of construction of statutes, the function of our courts being aptly described by Mr. Justice Reed: "It is to construe the language so as to give effect to the intent of Congress. There is no invariable rule for the discovery of that intention." [31]

The examination of legislative history is followed by both Federal and State courts, but it is the former, and more particularly, the Supreme Court, which chiefly interests us.[32] Two questions are raised regarding legislative history: Is there evidence of the intent of the legislative body which can be used in the understanding of statutory language, and if so, what weight should be assigned to that evidence? The question is never quantitative, for as Frankfurter has remarked:

"Spurious use of legislative history must not swallow the legislation so as to give point to the quip that only when legislative history is doubtful do you go to the statute. While courts are no longer confined to the language they are still confined by it. * * * In the end, language and external aids, each accorded the authority deserved in the circumstances, must be weighed in the balance of judicial judgment." [33]

In a 1916 decision, Mr. Justice Day ruled that where the language of the act is plain and constitutionally authorized, the use of extrinsic aids is not justified.[34] The dissenting opinion argued that the majority rule was too simple:

"The words of a statute may be uncertain in their significations or in their application. If the words be ambiguous, the problem they present is to be resolved by their definition; the subject matter and the lexicons become our guides. For here, even, we are not exempt from putting ourselves in the place of the legislators. If the words be clear in meaning but the objects to which they are addressed be uncertain, the problem then is to determine the uncertainty. And for this a realization of conditions that provoked the statute must inform our judgment." [35]

It is the dissent which has been largely followed in recent years, rather than the "plain meaning rule" announced by Mr. Justice Day.

What is sought for in the examination of legislative history is a nonstatutory expression of congressional intent. To be valid this evidence must reflect the intent of the majority of both branches of the Congress at the time of passage of the amendment, bill, resolution, or treaty in question. Certain types of legislative history have more validity than others. The statement of a witness before a House committee holding hearings on the bill in question will have some passing weight, more so if the witness is a member of the President's Cabinet and the bill—as finally enacted—is the administration proposal. The committee report, as a formal document submitted to the parent House or Senate, has considerable weight since it represents the considered judgment of the legislative committee assigned to consider the proposed bill. But committee reports do not always represent the intent of the full membership of the House or Senate, and in at least one case a committee report was shown to have been hastily prepared and, in fact, not to have been read by all Members who signed it.[36] Statements made on the floor of the House or Senate—as recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—are often cited, particularly explanatory statements of the chairman of the committee reporting the bill or other committee spokesman or sponsor of the bill.[37] Here the very keenest reading of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is called for, since the crucial point to be determined, reasonably, is whether the statements made orally, or the formally submitted report of legislative committee or conference committee, or any other legislative documentation, was accepted by the majority of the parent body at time of voting. Where the chairman or floor leader of the bill makes a statement that particular language is designed to accomplish a stated objective, and it appears subsequently that that language was amended in either House, the statement loses weight. So, too, a statement made by the chairman or floor leader which is challenged by other members of the committee as inaccurate or as not being indicative of committee intent. Mr. Justice Jackson, concurring in a 1951 opinion, stated that the use of legislative history must be exercised with caution. He commented:

"Resort to legislative history is only justified where the face of the act is inescapably ambiguous, and then I think we should not go beyond committee reports, which presumably are well considered and carefully prepared. I cannot deny that I have sometimes offended against that rule. But to select casual statements from floor debates, not always distinguished for candor or accuracy, as a basis for making up our minds what law Congress intended to enact is to substitute ourselves for the Congress in one of its important functions. It is not to be supposed that, in signing a bill, the President endorses the whole CONGRESSIONAL RECORD." [38]

Compare, too, the remarks of Justice Frankfurter in United States v. Public Utilities Commission of California:

"It is one thing to construe a section of a comprehensive statute in the context of its general scheme, as that scheme is indicated by its terms and by the gloss of those authorized to speak for Congress, either through reports or statements on the floor. It is a very different thing to extrapolate meaning from surmises and speculation and free-wheeling utterances, especially to do so in disregard of the terms in which Congress has chosen to express its purpose." [39]

There is little doubt that those preparing committee reports do so with full knowledge

---

[28] From a 1769 opinion, Millar v. Taylor, quoted by Lord Haldane in Viscountess Rhondda's Claim, 2 A.C. 339, 383 (House of Lords 1922). The opinion of Lord Wrenbury, concurring in the (latter) case, gives the rule as follows: "Neither the debate nor the outcome of the debate is admissible to explain the words which are found in the Act as passed."

[29] Felix Frankfurter, "Some Reflections on the Reading of Statutes," 47 Col. L. Rev. 527–546 (May 1947).

[30] In the hypothetical statute, "No shipper, truck operator, barge conductor, freight forwarder 'or other person' shall operate without a license," the quoted phrase would not, under the ejusdem generis maxim, include every man, woman, and child in the United States, but at most only those persons within the general class comprising shippers, truck operators, and the others enumerated or reasonably to be included in such class.

[31] United States v. American Trucking Associations, 310 U.S. 534 at 542 (1940).

[32] For a general analysis of this subject, see 70 American Law Reports 5–46, annotation: "Resort to constitutional or legislative debates, committee reports, journals, etc., as aid in construction of constitution or statute." For a good anthology the textbook by H. E. Read, J. W. MacDonald, and J. B. Fordham, "Cases and Other Materials on Legislation" (Brooklyn: Foundation Press 1959), pp. 964–1277, is recommended. I was rather surprised to find that the examination of legislative history extends to local ordinances; in a recent New York lower court case, People v. Greenberg, 174 N.Y., Supp. 2d, 803 (Magistrates' Court, New York City, 1958), a provision of the city administrative code was under scrutiny. The court quoted at length from a committee report on the legislation of the 1926 municipal assembly of the city of New York, aldermanic branch.

[33] Frankfurter, op, cit., pp. 543–544.

[34] Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470 (1916).

[35] Ibid., p. 496. See also Harry W. Jones, "The Plain Meaning Rule and Extrinsic Aids in the Interpretations of Statutes," 25 Wash. U.L.Q., 2–26 (December 1939).

[36] Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific RR Co. v. Acme Fast Freight, Inc., 336 U.S. 465 (1949). The Court, p. 473, quotes Representative Wolverton in his floor statement on the bill in question: "Due to limitations of time the report was not submitted to the members of the committee or subcommittee. * * *"

[37] Statements issued by the President when approving a bill or a veto message are also used as legislative history.

[38] Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Distillers Corp., 341 U.S. 348, at 395–396 (1951). Jackson agreed with the judgment of the Court "insofar as it rests upon the language of the Miller-Tydings Act. But it does not appear that there is either necessity or propriety in going back of it into legislative history." Cf. Jackson's opinion in United States v. Five Gambling Devices, 346 U.S. 441 (1953), wherein he cites floor statements of a number of Congressmen as well as the House committee report.

[39] 345 U.S. 295 at 321 (1953).

of their subsequent use in the courts: so too, statements made on the floor, Senator NEUBERGER noting that a Senator sponsoring a bill may read into the RECORD a detailed "record of legislative history" as a guide to those administering the legislation when finally enacted.[40] A CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which is subject to extensive revision of uttered remarks lessens the efficacy of the legislative history offered to the judiciary. How sure can one be that a committee report is accepted by the membership at large or that a statement of the floor manager of a bill in the House was actually uttered on the floor? Yet the printed RECORD is often the only clue to congressional intent. Despite these fundamental queries, the current sessions of the Supreme Court, as recorded in the recent opinions thereof, show continued usage of legislative history including the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. A summary of some of these opinions follows.

In Nashville Milk Co. v. Carnation Co.,[41] legislative history was used in support of opposite sides of an argument, lending emphasis to the point that such history must be used with caution. Mr. Justice Harlan, for the majority, decided that the legislative history of the Robinson-Patman Act was that "although price discriminations are both criminally punishable (under section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act) and subject to civil redress (under section 2 of the Clayton Act), selling 'at unreasonably low prices' is subject only to the criminal penalties provided in section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act." In support of this he cites the conference report of the bill, a statement on the House floor of the senior House manager of the committee of conference, a statement of another member of that committee, and a later statement—not on the pending bill—by Representative PATMAN before a congressional committee. Mr. Justice Douglas, dissenting, stated: "The Court holds that section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act is not a part of 'the antitrust laws' as used in the Clayton Act. We disagree. The legislative history in our opinion shows that Congress intended to permit private actions to be brought for violations of section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act." Douglas cites some of the very same legislative history used by the majority and, in addition, the debates in the Senate on the bill and the additional fact that the House Judiciary Committee, in its work of preparing and publishing the United States Code, included section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act as part of the antitrust laws.

In United States v. McNinch,[42] the Supreme Court held, "From the language of that act, read as a whole in the light of normal usage, and the available legislative history we are led to the conclusion that an application for credit insurance does not fairly come within the scope that Congress intended the act to have." A footnote to the opinion cited a statement of the Senate floor manager of the bill and noted, "Apparently there were no committee reports nor any record of the proceedings in the House."

In Perez v. Brownell,[43] the opinion of the Supreme Court quotes committee reports, hearings, and other history of the act in question including a statement by the chairman of the committee of the House responsible for the bill during the course of House debate; in the same case, the Chief Justice, Mr. Warren, cites floor debates in the dissent.[44] In none of these opinions is there raised any question regarding the accuracy of the reported debates.

IV

How long this trend of accepting the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as evidence of the debates in Congress will continue, is not too easily predictable, but certainly the fact that Members of Congress themselves have become concerned about the practice of revision and extension is an indication that the situation is far from static.[45] Attorneys have a knack of finding loopholes, and the practice of revision and extension may give one or more of them an opportunity to try and negate the use of legislative history by opposing counsel. The questions posed are whether such negating evidence can be presented to the courts, and if so, what use will the courts make of it? At the outset one must distinguish between questions of fact and of law. A question of law concerning the meaning of a statute may be raised in the trial court, but not as a factual issue triable by a jury. More likely, it is not raised until the trial has concluded. Procedurally, an attorney would be faced with the difficult problem of how to impeach the printed CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. If he makes the assertion in his brief, it would be nothing more than a self-serving statement and would, no doubt, be rejected by the court. He might, however, show as a general principle that the printed RECORD may not always record with accuracy remarks made on the floor, citing appropriate documentation. But such an argument, while having the possible effect of causing the court to refuse to accept any legislative history from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, would not prove whether the quoted statement of the Congressman was or was not his actual oral remarks and, as such, accepted by the majority of the House or Senate. Testimony would be required from either the official reporter of debates or some officer of the House or Senate or, perhaps, the Congressman himself or one of his colleagues. Thus counsel would be faced with task of arguing a legal point by the presentation of factual evidence—all of which would be subject to cross-examination. This is not an easy thing to do on the court level—less so on the level of the court of appeals or the U.S Supreme Court.[46]

The settled practice of the House is that no Member nor officer of that body may voluntarily or in answer to a subpena testify in the ordinary courts of justice as to any matter pertaining to his official capacity. In practice, where the Clerk of the House is served with a subpena duces tecum, he formally notifies the Speaker who lays such communication and the subpena before the House. If there is no objection to his appearing, a resolution will be adopted which states: (1) That the privileges of the House preclude its documentation from being subject to the "process of the ordinary courts of justice * * * but by its permission"; (2) that where it appears that such documentation is needed for use in any court of justice, "this House will take such order thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House"; (3) that the Clerk may appear at the court but without the asked for papers; and, (4) that where the court "determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for," the court officers and parties may proceed to the House and make copies of the documents "except minutes and transcripts of executive sessions. * * *"[47] This question has never been resolved in the Senate, but on one occasion during the 85th Congress, Senator EASTLAND was subpenaed to appear as a witness in a criminal case in a U.S. District Court. The case arose out of a contempt citation voted by the Senate in respect of conduct of the defendant when he was a witness before the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee which EASTLAND chairs. A vigorous debate ensued on the proprieties of allowing the Senator to respond to the subpena, Senator RUSSELL arguing that "the privileges of the Senate are involved. The Senate might be completely disorganized, so that it could not proceed as a legislative body, by reason of the abuse of the power of subpena. It could not function. It could be denuded of Senators by reason of irresponsible subpenaing." The entire matter and two proposed authorizing resolutions were dropped when EASTLAND announced that he would appear voluntarily as witness for the Government.[48] There is little practicable chance of testimony questioning the accuracy of the debates reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD being presented to the courts.

Then, too, there is the question of whether the courts will even sanction the raising of such an issue. In Meyers v. United States,[49] the U.S. Court of Appeals, in affirming a district court conviction for violation of a provision of the District of Columbia Code (title 22, sec. 2501) on perjury and subornation of perjury, held that it was not error to allow the counsel of a congressional committee investigating the national defense program to testify as to what was said in the committee, the indictment arising from certain statements therein alleged to have been made. The court ruled that the "best evidence rule" in Federal courts is limited

[40] NEUBERGER, op cit.

[41] 355 U.S. 373 (1958).

[42] 356 U.S. 595 (1958). See also Automobile Workers v. Russell, 356 U.S. 634 at 647–59 (1958), dissent of Mr. Chief Justice Warren, on legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act.

[43] 356 U.S. 44 (1956).

[44] Ibid., p. 72 (see footnote 25 of the opinion).

[45] See, e.g., the remarks of Representative JONES of Missouri, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 105, pt. 5, p. 6136, and H. Res. 176, 86th Cong., 1st sess., introduced by Representative CURTIS of Missouri, which would prohibit the printing of remarks in the RECORD as oral remarks unless actually delivered.

[46] The question is somewhat analogous to the problem involved in trying to prove that a printed statute, i.e., the bill signed by the executive (or the slip law, the session law, or the codification of the law) does not represent the act passed by the legislative body. The question comes down to this: Do we (the court) accept the statute as set forth on the paper ultimately signed by the Executive or do we look beyond this paper to see what the enacting body actually passed.

[47] See, e.g., CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 6, pp. 7262–7263 and 7636–7637. In the latter instance, the subpena duces tecum involved a grand jury investigation of Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR. Among the information called for were "Records reflecting attendance of ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR., during each session in the years 1951 through 1955."

[48] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 103, pt. 3, pp. 4135–4136, 4140–4147, and 4202–4212. Senator JOHNSON, the majority leader, offered one resolution (S. Res. 116) and commented. "The Parliamentarian suggested that in view of the lack of precedents in the Senate on this very point, there should be a formal resolution similar to the resolutions passed in the House and this resolution was modeled after the resolution adopted there." S. Res. 117 was offered by Senator WAYNE MORSE and differed from the JOHNSON resolution in that it recited that the Senate rules prohibit the absence of a Senator but by leave of the Senate; JOHNSON's resolution recited that "by the privileges of the Senate no Member is authorized to appear and testify but by order of the Senate." MORSE did not feel that there was any precedent for the JOHNSON recital.

[49] 171 F. 2d 800 (D.C. Cir., 1948), certiorari denied, 336 U.S. 912 (1949).

"to cases where the contents of a writing are to be proved. Here there was no attempt to prove the contents of a writing; the issue was that Lamarre had said, not what the transcript contained."[50] In the Meyers case the conviction arose out of testimony in a committee, whereas in the situation we are discussing, impeachment of the RECORD is not to determine whether perjury or the subornation thereof, or contemptuous language was used, but whether a Congressman did or did not make a statement on a given bill. I think the courts would refuse to inquire into the correctness of the RECORD, save in the very rare instance where the House or Senate itself adjudges a person in contempt.[51] But while the courts may not allow impeachment of the reported debates, they may well come to a realization that the RECORD is not always a record, to paraphrase the title of the Neuberger article, and think twice before using any such legislative history. One recent U.S. Court of Appeals case offers some final clue as to judicial thinking in the area of Congress-court relationships:

The right of an accused by appropriate means to obtain evidence material to his defense is essential to the administration of the criminal law. A subpena duces tecum to one who has custody of the evidences is an appropriate means. If such evidence is under the control of a department of Government charged with the administration of those laws for whose violation the accused has been indicted, and its production is refused, or it is excluded, the courts, having responsibility under the Constitution for the trial of criminal cases, have held a conviction will not be permitted without the evidence. * * * Like principles should apply with regard to evidence in the custody of the House of Representatives. While the privilege of the House must be respected it might give rise to occasions when it would be necessary to forego conviction of crime because evidence is withheld. There is no doubt some discretion, to be carefully exercised so as not to invade the constitutional rights of an accused to compulsory process.[52]

But here, as in Myers v. United States, the situation is to be distinguished from the question of interpretation of statutes and evidence impeaching certain types of legislative history. A strong argument can be made for the gradual lessening of weight assigned in appellate cases to the floor debates as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless and until the revision and extension practices are radically revamped.

V

There is need for a rule against substantive changes in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and, in the case of the House of Representatives, against extensions which appear as speeches. Changes for the sake of grammar and, perhaps rhetoric should be allowed, with prudence the keyword to apprehensive Congressmen, worried about the possible effects their unexpurgated remarks may have in home districts.

As suggested in the Neuberger article, the RECORD should contain maps and diagrams—and on occasion illustrations—when needed to explain debates. Under the law[53] the Joint Committee on Printing has authority to allow this, and a moderate exercise of that authority appears warranted.

To make the Appendix more meaningful, some thought ought to be given to placing a ceiling on the number of items a Member may insert during any one session; this should cut down the great bulk of extraneous material. There ought also to be a short table of contents to each day's Appendix items.

As noted, it would be helpful to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD's Daily Digest a status table of major substantive legislation worked out by the respective party leaders in each House, since it might prove embarrassing for employees of the Digest to have to make such determination

A weekly digest of the debates reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would be of value to those who seek more than the usual newspaper reports of congressional activity but have neither time nor energy to plow through the RECORD itself. This could be handled as a private publication, although it might be practicable to have it undertaken by the Government Printing Office which has the plates used for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Finally, a certain fiber of moral courage is needed so that Members of Congress will not hesitate to speak their minds on issues of the day. Perpetual doctoring of the primary source of legislative activity is no solution to hasty thoughts and hot tempers.

WE MUST HAVE A MILITARY SPACE PROGRAM—NOW

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, in his state of the Union message delivered to a joint session of Congress on January 7, the President of the United States spoke in part on the status of our missile and space satellite programs.

The President said that the Atlas missile had "entered the operational inventory" during the past year.

The President said that our military missile program "does not suffer from our present lack of very large rocket engines, which are so necessary in distant space exploration."

The President said that we were nevertheless "pressing forward" to develop such larger engines.

The President recited what sounded like an impressive list of satellites under development for research, for navigation, for weather forecasting, for communication. He said that the new budget would call for "practically doubled" space program expenditures.

And the President said that our space exploration program was "Often mistakenly supposed to be an integral part of defense research and development."

Last Sunday night, on a television program, the minority leader in the Senate for the Republican Party, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] made even clearer the basic philosophy of this administration with regard to our space program

Senator DIRKSEN said, commenting on the President's speech:

I think he has put the emphasis where it belongs * * * he (meaning President Eisenhower) divorces the space program from the military program, something he should have done long ago, so that there won't be any confusion as to the accent and emphasis of the space program with respect to our military.

Mr. President, I rise to challenge this philosophy. It is wrong. It misleads the American people, and it misleads them dangerously. It is my purpose today to show why this is wrong, why our military and scientific space programs cannot be and should not be separated. And I rise to do what I can to call the attention of the Senate to the very real, the very great urgency of our developing a military space program just as soon as we can do it.

Mr. President, I have said that our need for a military space program is real and urgent. It is real because we live in the same world, we compete in the same world, with the Soviet Union. It is urgent because we have allowed ourselves to fall behind. We are falling further behind every day. We have not yet started to catch up, not because it is beyond our capability to do so, but because we have not yet made up our minds that it is important to do so.

In his state of the Union message, as I have pointed out, the President has said that in the budget just presented to Congress, expenditures for our space program were going to be "practically doubled." The facts do not support this promise. In the last budget, our combined expenditures for space programs were on the order of $500 million. The new budget calls for expenditures on the order of $825 million, but this includes $150 million appropriated last year for the Army Ballistic Missiles Division, which has now been transferred to NASA, the civilian space agency. The correct comparison is between $650 million last year and $850 million this year. That is a 29 percent increase—almost 30 percent. Not "practically double."

There is only one inference to be drawn from all of the President's statements on our missile and space programs, from the statement I quoted from the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] and from the budget.

This is the inference that our missile programs and space exploration programs are in good shape and that we have no legitimate cause for concern.

Mr. President, this is far from a true picture.

For example, it may be true that the "Atlas entered the operational inventory during the past year," but as I speak today, we have exactly one operational Atlas base. The number of operational missiles on our one operational base gives rise to a few nightmares at the Pentagon.

The administration itself admitted—without ever saying so—that the President's rosy picture of our missile program was incorrect only a few days after he made it. The administration now asks Congress for enough more money to expand our ICBM inventory by one-third. That is, one-third more for the Atlas and one-third more for the Polaris. These are substantial increases.

And we do have a number of space satellites under development. But let me quote from a recent speech by Dr.

---

[50] Ibid., p. 812; see, too, the dissent of Judge Prettyman, pp. 814 et seq.

[51] On the right to punish for contempt, see Jefferson's Manual, sec. III, and the annotations thereto in House Manual, op. cit., sec. 293 et seq. The more normal procedure is set forth in title 18, U.S.C., sec. 192 and sec. 194, without which the House and Senate would be spending a great amount of time debating whether the course of conduct of a witness should be punished and the method of punishment. The law provides for certification of a statement of facts concerning the contempt to the appropriate U.S. attorney for grand jury attention; punishment is authorized up to 12 months or a $1,000 fine, or both.

[52] Christoffel v. United States, 200 F. 2d 734 at 738–739 (D.C. Cir. 1952).

[53] Title 44, U.S.C., sec. 182b.

Eberhardt Reichten, chief of the guidance and research division of the Jet Propulsion Laboratory of California Institute of Technology:

> The other day * * * we were attempting to plan the missions for a set of space vehicles in 1961 and 1962 * * * only to be shocked at the end of our efforts to find that the first half of our fine program had already been done by the Russians.

In other words, in the field of space exploration, we are plodding along slowly behind the Russians. We are losing more ground with every day that passes.

Let me remind you, Mr. President, that only last Thanksgiving Day we attempted a moon shot. We failed. That was bad enough, but understandable. What was far worse, and not understandable, is that we cannot even attempt to repeat that experiment for an entire year. The reason given is that we do not have any more Atlas rockets available for this purpose. Think of what such an admission does to world regard for the technological leadership of the United States of America.

How can we have the Atlas in our operational inventory and still not be able to spare even one to repeat a vital experiment on which so much worldwide prestige depends?

And what is the reason that many people suppose—"mistakenly," according to the President—that our space exploration program is an integral part of defense research and development?

The reason is that this is what it should be. The mistake lies with this administration, which blindly insists there is little, if any connection, between our space program and our national security.

One of the consequences—or perhaps it is one of the causes—of current administration policy is its refusal to admit that we are in competition with the Russians in this field.

The Soviets maintain—and the whole world believes—that there is such a race, and that we are running a poor second. But the administration insists that we are just out for the exercise

I do not wish to labor something I know all of us in this body appreciate—the immense damage to our world prestige resulting from Soviet achievements in space and our failure to equal or surpass them.

Nor will I dwell at any length upon the fact that Soviet successes in space have exploded what used to be one of our better arguments against communism. I refer, of course, to the argument that scientists would not, or could not, produce first-class results under a Communist dictatorship. Some of us still cling to this comforting assumption. But the facts prove it to be wrong.

Perhaps we do not all fully realize how Soviet space achievements have already returned cash dividends far in excess of the program costs. The increase in Soviet technological prestige all over the world resulting from their space achievements was very great. Almost overnight, they became a truly formidable competitor with us in the field of supplying the foreign market with complex technological and engineering installations.

It has been reliably estimated that for a cost on the order of $500 million to launch the first several sputniks, the Soviets got a return on the world market of at least $5 billion, or 10 times the investment—and a good deal of it at our expense.

So there is a race. There are prizes for winning it. There are penalties for losing it. We are in that race. Already we have forfeited some of the prizes and paid some of the penalties. Perhaps we can afford them. There are, however, some penalties we cannot afford to pay, if we choose to remain a major force for freedom in the world, or if we choose to remain a free and unconquered Nation.

We cannot afford to continue to ignore, or even to soft pedal, the military significance of satellites. If we allow the Russians to win the prizes in this race simply because we refuse to admit it exists, or because we refuse to admit past mistakes, or because budget balancing precludes us from allocating sufficient resources to the task soon enough to give us a chance, then, Mr. President, we shall be in very serious trouble, indeed.

Let us examine for a moment some of the reasons why we so urgently need a military space program.

One of the major reasons for our need arises from the difference between the nature of our commitment and that of Soviets.

The United States of America stands for world peace, not world revolution. Our leaders of both parties stand for peace. Our people stand for peace. We covet no new territories. We do not feel any compulsion to force our system of government, our system of economics, or our way of life upon any other nation in the world.

We stand for freedom.

If we were convinced that the Soviet Union shared our aspirations for world peace and for freedom, then we should have no cause to fear the great progress the Soviet Union is making in industry, in science, and in technology.

But we are not so convinced, as our multibillion dollar defense budget proves.

In a military sense, we are committed to a policy of deterrence, as opposed to a policy of aggression. We will not strike the first blow. We will retaliate—if we can—only after the first blow has been struck at us.

This posture—although it is morally the right one—places us at a grave disadvantage against an aggressor nation armed with three ICBM's to our one, nuclear war heads, and superior military intelligence.

Clearly, the most we can hope for from our present deterrent forces, and those planned by this administration, is a stalemate—the stalemate of mutual terror.

If we are ever again to know any real measure of security in this world, we must have a deterrent force which is superior—not just equal, but superior—to the forces of potential aggression which oppose us. If we possessed such a force today, we would be in a really effective position to negotiate steps toward a permanent peace.

Can we create such a superior deterrent force? Yes, we can. The answer lies in space and the uses we can make of it. We can do it, I repeat, provided we abandon the policy fiction that our space program is primarily a civilian scientific undertaking with minor military applications; provided we admit we are in a race, with the Russians, that we cannot afford to lose; and provided we unshackle ourselves, and tackle the job with the urgency it deserves.

I spoke a moment ago, Mr. President, of the superior military intelligence possessed by the Soviet Union. Let me make clear what I mean.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will my able colleague yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to his colleague?

Mr. ENGLE. I am delighted to yield for a question to the distinguished acting minority leader, my able colleague from California.

Mr. KUCHEL. My able colleague has propounded a thesis which I believe worthy of grave consideration by the Congress. In that connection I wish to ask a question. What does the present law in regard to NASA authorize? Does it authorize research and development or the probing generally of the problems of outer space in connection with the military? What is the present statutory limitation under which NASA may conduct its operations?

Mr. ENGLE. So far as I am aware, there is no statutory limitation, except that as a matter of practice NASA has been devoted to the civilian technology in space; and the President made it very clear—and this is the matter about which I am complaining—that he intended to keep separate the military applications and the civilian applications of outer space.

My point is—and later I shall develop the point further—that they cannot be separated, that they should not be separated, and that this administration is asking two or more agencies to do the same thing, thereby creating the duplication, the overlapping, and the wasting of the taxpayer's funds which slow up the doing of the vital things which must be done in this field.

Second, I am saying that military requirements in connection with outer space are being ignored and are being made subservient to civilian applications in outer space, although they should not be.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I say to my colleague that it is my understanding that the outer space legislation which was initiated in the Congress 2 years ago, and in the passage of which the able majority leader played a very prominent part, was designed to provide for the civilian activities in outer space, as distinguished from the military activities. It is my hazy recollection that not only was that legislation so designed, but that there was in the outer space legislation which we passed language which indicated that in the opinion of the Congress there should be that distinction.

Mr. ENGLE. That is the program the administration requested. The idea was—and I mentioned that last August, in connection with the speech I made on the floor of the Senate, in connection with our defense reorganization—that we should have a civilian agency operating in the outer space field, because it would be bad for us psychologically, throughout the world, if that program appeared to be a military one.

But the Russians are not as thin-skinned about the matter; the Russians have their space program operated, as I understand, by the artillery section of their army.

So we set up a civilian operation in the space field; and we also set up a military operation—but very much muted—in the space field.

My complaint is, first, that they should not be divorced; and, second, that higher priority should be given to the military applications of space technology.

I am about to refer to one of those points, and I believe my colleague will find this matter of very great interest.

Mr. KUCHEL. I appreciate what my colleague says. I shall follow with interest his comments.

The only point I wished to inject was that, in relying on my memory, it seems to me that the majority in the Congress and most particularly the distinguished majority leader together were responsible for the outer space legislation—for which I voted, and for which, as I recall, all other Members of this body voted.

It may well be that my colleague is pointing out some ways in which that legislation could be amended, or, at any rate, that consideration should be given to amending it.

Mr. ENGLE. This is the first time I have said this.

As I have already stated, the bill which came through was the one the administration requested.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from California yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina in the chair.) Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ENGLE. I am glad to yield to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to ask my friend, the Senator from California, whether we have been operating for a number of years under the type of program to which he now advocates that we return. In other words, we have had the military engaged in the space business, and we have had the civilians engaged in the space business. Is that not true?

Mr. ENGLE. Since the creation of NASA, we have had a civilian-operated space agency. The military has gotten into that field through the side door, so to speak; and it has been the purpose of the administration to disconnect the civilian applications and the military applications of outer space.

I am saying that both of them should go together. Last August I recommended—because this Space Agency had gotten so far down the road—that we could not very well retreat and change; that we put a military application section inside the National Aeronautics and Space Agency. That has not been done, and I am going to advocate it again. I think it should be done.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Does the Senator recall the confusion that existed in our space work and in our missile work when we had each service in the act, developing, in many cases, one missile, and the civilian agency at the same time, working with the military, was working by itself? I think one of the reasons why our missile solar and lunar work—not our military work—has lagged has been because of the confusion created basically from our setup in the Joint Chiefs, which I have been strongly against. That setup has created confusion and duplication.

I am afraid if the Senator's suggestions are followed, without centralizing authority in one branch of the military or in one committee of the military, we shall see an identical confusion come about again. I hope the Senator will go along with what the President has suggested, because I think the program has improved in the short number of months since he suggested a division.

Mr. ENGLE. The President has made some suggestions with reference to what we call the missile mess. Last August I pointed out on the floor of the Senate that there were 101 separate agencies in the Federal Government which, one way or another, had their hands in this missile business. I suggested at that time that the President clean up that organizational structure. He made a couple of moves to clean it up. For instance, he got rid of ARPA, which was a fifth wheel if there ever was one. Recently he made some more suggestions. I intend to comment on those in a few minutes.

What I am saying here is that we ought to get this military space program off the ground and give it great emphasis, and that we ought to have both the civilian and military space programs together.

In just a few minutes, I intend, in my speech, to go into this matter of having a space vehicle, a civilian space vehicle or satellite, or a military space vehicle or satellite. I am sure the Senator will agree with me it is not intelligent to have two organizations doing the same job, duplicating and overlapping each other.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ENGLE. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is the point I am trying to make. I am afraid the Senator's suggestion will only add to the number of agencies in the field. If his suggestion is to the point that there should be created a central agency, there may be some merit to it.

Mr. ENGLE. That is what I am talking about, putting them together, instead of further fractionalizing them. I want to put them together under one operation, under one man who has the job of directing the whole program, both civilian and military.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Might I point out to the Senator that until we can eliminate the different services from participation in this field, I think the Senator's suggestion is not going to produce the result he would like to have produced. I can say the result which he wants produced is a result which every Senator and everybody else in the country would like to see produced. I think the President has taken a right step. I think we have gotten too confused when we have had failures in the solar or lunar probes and have felt that failure has reflected on the entire missile program and effort. In my mind, that has done the American public a disservice, because our missiles should be classified as weapons or as probes. In the weapons field, our accomplishments have been nothing short of miraculous, to my mind. I have never heard of the Russian equivalent of the CEP, the circle of error probability, but I doubt seriously that they approach our accomplishments. I think we do the American people a disservice if we allow further failures in solar or lunar probes to be associated with our capabilities in the weapons field, our nuclear missiles, or the ICBM. I rise only to raise the point that I am afraid what the Senator is suggesting will put us back in the mess we were in a year ago.

Mr. ENGLE. We were not only in a mess a year ago; we are still in a mess, and anyone who knows those people who are presently either in the field of satellites or missiles will say that what we need most is a better organization in this field.

Mr. President, when I yielded to my distinguished friend from Arizona, I was talking about the military, instead of the satellite, program. I was saying that our democratic system is one in which we maintain a really tight security only about our most vital secrets, and even then not always successfully. It is not a difficult task for a first-rate—or even a fifth-rate—espionage network to gather precise information about the state of our defenses, the location of our missile bases, the number of missiles we have or have under construction, the number of manned bombers, their locations, and whether or not we are on airborne alert, and so on.

Let me stop to emphasize this in the light of what the distinguished Senator from Arizona has said. It is correct to say that we have reached phenomenal accuracy with the Atlas missile. We can shoot it 5,000 miles and hit a bull's eye. But we have got to assume that the Russians can do the same thing. If that is true—and we must proceed upon that assumption—they will be able to knock Vandenberg flatter than a pancake on the first volley, and they will also be able to knock down our other Atlas bases, and we will not have the Atlases to shoot that the President is talking about. On the other hand, we do not know where Russia's bases are.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ENGLE. If the Senator will let me complete this thought I will then yield to him, because I shall make the point I wish to submit.

In fact, to get information about the bases, one does not need to be a spy at all; he only has to be able to read. If he can read the Appropriations Committee hearings, he can do pretty well.

On the other hand—and I say this without meaning any reflection on our CIA—we simply do not have, and cannot get, anything amounting to a comparable body of precise intelligence about the offensive and defensive strengths and dispositions of the Soviet Union. They do not have a government based on separation of powers. They do not believe in arriving at great policy decisions through public debate. They do not have a free press. With them, secrecy and security are a fetish.

Therefore, plainly one of our great needs is to redress the intelligence balance. We can do this with reconnaissance satellites.

From space, we can view at close range all the territories of any potential aggressor. The extent of the information thus available will be limited in the near future only by our ability to place large satellites in orbit about the earth.

Let me emphasize this: A reconnaissance satellite equipped with the Midas infrared sensing detectors would enable us to detect missile launchings almost instantaneously, and with a greater degree of reliability than radar. A reconnaissance satellite equipped with the light-gathering and photographic equipment presently in prospect might—as early as 1962—enable us to photograph objects as small as 7 feet in diameter from 300 miles up. I repeat that: It might enable us to photograph objects as small as 7 feet in diameter from 300 miles up.

And it has been reliably predicted that by the latter half of this decade, such devices will be improved to the point where we may be able to photograph, at night, objects as small as 2 feet in diameter from 300 miles up.

Now I am glad to yield to my distinguished friend, because I have made the point I was driving at; that is, the place where we have the biggest and worst gap is in the field of intelligence. We have a big enough gap in the field of missiles and retaliatory strike power, but we do not know what is going on inside the Soviet Union, whereas all the Russians have to do is to read the newspapers or talk to the construction workers, in order to be able to draw a bead on our Atlas missiles wherever they are perched, sitting up like pine trees on the horizon.

I am delighted to yield, if my friend from Arizona desires to make comment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator got so far past his point, it would be useless for me to reply at this time.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, let me point out, however, that even if we had such a satellite now, all set to go, we would have to borrow the powerplant from the Russians to get it off the launching pad.

In other words, what chiefly limits us in this field is the lack of a powerplant with a thrust on the order of a million to a million and a half pounds.

The President told us that we are pressing forward to develop such engines.

Now, I do not claim to know more about the problem of defending America than almost anybody else in the country. But I do know that one does not press forward on the basis of a low priority, a limited budget, and a 40-hour week. And that is exactly what we are doing on the Saturn cluster and the Nova motor.

I am glad to note that someone in the administration seems to have called this glaring inconsistency to the attention of the President. And I approve of the latest move of the administration which foreshadows a higher priority, more funds, and overtime work for this project.

Surveillance and warning are by no means the only functions which satellites would serve. Space satellites, even at our present level of technology, offer tremendous possibilities for rapid and reliable communication between any two or more points in the world or over it. From a military standpoint, this means that adequate and reliable communication between globally dispersed land, sea, and air forces is possible through space satellites. So great would be the improvement over our present system in terms of our capability, that it would place us in literally another world, according to General Schreiver.

Reconnaissance, warning and communications are primarily peaceful in the purpose they serve. They offer no active threat to any nation. They need be feared only by the nation secretly planning acts of unprovoked aggression. All of them have tremendous scientific and commercial possibilities.

For example, one of these possibilities is worldwide television—live coverage of any event anywhere in the world made instantaneously available to every other point in the world.

Some of us, of course, might consider this to be more a disaster than something to be desired. Nevertheless, it is coming, and the only real question is whether the announcer will speak English or Russian.

But it is not the tremendous commercial and, possibly, cultural dividends of communication satellites with which I am concerned today, it is their military application.

We may be able to endure the next few years without "Maverick in Leningrad," or "Riverboat on the Volga" or "Have Sputnik, Will Travel," but I seriously doubt that the Russians would be willing to make their worldwide satellite communications system available for the use of our Armed Forces.

This is one case where we have to use the "do it yourself" kit.

Space satellites offer us additional possibilities for increasing the effectiveness of our deterrent forces. Chief among these is the possibility of a really effective means for active defense against missiles launched from any place on land or sea. It may even be possible to thwart an attack in such a manner that the harmful effects would be borne only by the aggressor. It appears now that this could be accomplished only from space.

Incidentally, I emphasize this is a field where there is no question about the technical capability of our people to accomplish the result.

Further, we may well be able to establish a strategic force in space, remote from the earth, widely dispersed, constantly alert, and capable of striking an aggressor's targets—following early warning—with such speed and force as to eliminate a large portion of the enemy's force before launch.

Of one thing we may be certain. The Soviets are alert to every one of these potentialities. They have a demonstrated capability in the field. We are years behind them, but not yet so far behind that we cannot catch up. Our beginnings are on a broad front, our resources and our capability are extensive.

The concepts I have described today are the sound concepts and designs of many of the Nation's best scientists and engineers. They are concepts based on the established laws of science, and on a relatively conservative extrapolation of established technological achievements.

Now, Mr. President, the subject I am discussing today is far too important to our national security to be discussed solely as a political issue, or to assess the blame for the mess we are in solely in terms of which political party occupies the White House.

But the fact is that the major impediment we face today in this field is the stubborn refusal of the Eisenhower administration to admit that they have made a whole series of tragic mistakes and to set about correcting them.

On the 28th of last August, I spoke to the Senate on the necessity of reorganizing our Armed Forces in terms of functions and missions. In the course of that address I had occasion to point out the tremendous duplication and complexity which exists in our missile and space program agencies. One effect of this has been to stretch out the time required merely to make decisions to the point where our leadtime in developing air and space projects is twice that of the Russians.

I pointed out then that the National Aeronautics and Space Administration was set up as a separate civilian agency because the administration wanted to negate the idea of our space program being military in character.

I will say to my distinguished friend that this is the matter to which I referred a few minutes ago.

It desired to place the emphasis, as far as the development of our program in outer space is concerned, on the civilian and peacetime use of space and space activities.

I pointed out then that there appeared to be no logical basis for completely separating the missile and space programs.

It seemed clear to a number of us last August, exactly as it is clear today, that all space vehicles—and the ICBM is a space vehicle—have four problems: propulsion, guidance, reentry and payload. Three of these—propulsion, guidance, and reentry—are identical whether the space vehicle is civilian or military; only the payload—that is, what the vehicle carries—is different.

I said also that because of commendable desire to emphasize the peacefulness of our intentions, we were ignoring the fact that the head of the Department of Defense and all his top assistants are civilian, not military. And we were—and still are—by this purely arbitrary distinction, impairing our ability to concentrate sufficient resources on programs in which the requirements of both the military and the scientific programs were very largely identical.

Conceding that NASA was by then too far down the road to stop, I called, among other things, for the establishment within NASA of a military applications division, to operate in similar fashion to the military applications division in the Atomic Energy Commission. I call for it again.

In the interim, some small progress has been made. The operational functions of ARPA—a fifth wheel if there ever was one—have been abolished and transferred to NASA. One single service—the Air Force—has been given the main responsibility for operating the missile and space vehicles.

In the message sent to Congress this January 14, the President proposes to make certain changes in NASA structure. It is not my purpose today to comment extensively on this proposed legislation, pending study and analysis of the proposed amendments by the Senate Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee, chaired by our distinguished majority leader, Senator LYNDON JOHNSON.

But even one reading of the message and the bill is enough to make a few important things about this proposed legislation obvious.

The President proposes to abolish the National Aeronautics and Space Advisory Council, and the Civilian-Military Liaison Committee. Insofar as these actions tend to simplify the administrative structure—to eliminate two of the echelons concerned with the decisionmaking processes, I am for them 100 percent.

However, the President's measure, and proposed bill, are replete with evidence that he is still unwilling to admit that our civilian and military space programs simply cannot be separated.

The President tells us that a single military-civilian space program does not exist and is unattainable. Without ever telling us how to go about it, he assures us that the military and civilian programs are clearly distinguishable. And then, in the very same sentence, he admits that both NASA and the Department of Defense may have similar or identical requirements for launched vehicles.

In fact, about half the message seems to be proposing to get the Department of Defense entirely out of NASA's hair on the grounds that their missions are entirely different, and that the Department of Defense has ample authority to proceed on its own. Then, as I have pointed out, he admits that at the heart of the problem—and the launched vehicles are the heart of the problem—their missions are not different at all, but practically identical. Clearly, this is an open invitation for duplication of effort, authority, and responsibility. This he proposes to avoid by himself assigning development of new launched vehicles to one or the other, regardless of whose program requirements brought about its conception, or to what eventual use it will be put.

It seems to me that what has really happened here is that some of the many voices which have been raised throughout the country about the unsatisfactory status of our missile and space programs have finally been heard. In an attempt to meet this criticism, rather than grapple with the real problem, the President has proposed one more reshuffling of responsibilities, a reshuffling that will not advance us by so much as one single day, and may in fact, retard us still further.

Mr. President, we have had about all of this we can stand. I say, let us freely admit the mistakes of the past Let us candidly admit that we are in a race with the Russians and that we are seriously behind Let us face up to the fact that we have an urgent need of a military space program as rapidly as we can devise, develop, and produce it. Let us hammer together an effective combination of governmental, scientific, military, and industrial resources to do the job—and supply that team with the funds it needs, the direction it needs, and above all, the sense of urgency it needs.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ENGLE. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. My colleague has made some excellent points, and I believe the Congress might well consider the advisability or feasibility of a better integrated activity, both military and civilian, in the field of space exploration.

I am not a member of the committee. I certainly can add nothing in the way of expert advice, pro or con, but I think the point has been well made, and we should study it.

I wish to say, with complete respect, however, that the present space law is and was a product of the Congress. With understandable pride, the Democratic leader of the Senate laid that legislation before us. We passed it unanimously. In the declaration by the Congress as to the outlines of the program it is clearly indicated that the responsibility of the new space agency over control of aeronautical and space activities shall be complete, except for that part which has to do with weapons systems, which shall be the responsibility of the Department of Defense. I say that because I believe we should set about reexamining what we did, to see whether we can make progress in this field.

Mr. ENGLE. Let me comment to my colleague and friend from California that the Space Act did not put anyone in a straitjacket. In the case of a space vehicle, a satellite, we have the problem of propulsion. We must get it up. We have the problem of guidance. We must guide it in the direction it should go, so that it will go into orbit. We have the problem of reentry, bringing the satellite down into the atmosphere and getting it back safely to the ground. Those three problems are the problems of space and space technology. They are identical, whether the vehicle is a military vehicle carrying radar to detect missiles coming from Soviet territory, or photographic equipment for reconnaissance purposes, or a communications system, which would be purely civilian in character. The difference lies only in what we put into the satellite.

What I am saying is that a program does not make sense which says that the military should develop their own propulsion system, their own guidance system, and their own reentry technology, while NASA, working on the civilian side to develop a space vehicle or satellite, does precisely the same thing. That is the kind of duplication which has cost the taxpayers millions of dollars, and slowed up the program.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. ENGLE. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I remember sitting here and listening to the distinguished Democratic leader when the bill was before us. Let me read from his statement to the Senate on June 16, 1958, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 9, page 11293:

> Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The committee bill states clearly that it is the fundamental policy of our country that aeronautical and space activities should be dedicated to peaceful purposes and the benefit of all mankind. We can today see only a short distance into the future, and we can only speculate upon a few of the ultimate benefits which the space age can bring to the people of the world.
>
> We know that there will be tremendous gains in the economic and physical well-being of people brought about by discoveries in the areas of weather prediction and control, communications, medical science, and transportation.
>
> At the same time we are not unmindful that technological advancement in the space age will have military applications which, if our own capacity to defend ourselves is not maintained, can result in our subjugation and decline.
>
> In order to insure that the progress man makes in the space age produces peaceful benefits rather than military destruction, it is essential that we carry on our scientific exploration and development in aeronautics and space with vigor, and determination, and without injury to our national defense requirements. Without strength to defend ourselves, there can be no peace.
>
> There is no dispute here as to whether we shall have civilian or military control over our aeronautical and space activities. That control will clearly, in the traditions of our country, and in accord with the fundamental principles upon which our form of government flourishes, be civilian.
>
> The committee bill recognizes, however, that such control does not, and should not, involve any change in the traditional power of the Department of Defense over its responsibilities in the defense of the Nation. Aeronautical and space activities which are primarily associated with the development of weapons systems and with military operations will remain under the direction and responsibility of the Defense Department.
>
> The Senate bill establishes a new civilian Space Agency with a civilian Director and Deputy Director, and grants it complete operational authority and responsibility in the field of nonmilitary aeronautical and space activities. Since operating authority and responsibility for military aeronautical and space activities are placed in the Department of Defense, a new overall Space Policy Board is established in the Executive Office of the President.

This Space Policy Board will be composed of seven Presidential appointees confirmed by the Senate. Four members will be the Secretaries of State and Defense, the Director of the new Space Agency, and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. The three other members will be selected by the President, one each from other interested agencies of the Government, with the provision that one of these but no more may come from the Defense Department.

The Board is charged with the duty of surveying our overall space objectives and capabilities, recommending comprehensive programs, designating responsibility for major projects and resolving disputes which may arise between governmental agencies in this field.

It is to carry out the direction of the President as well as apply the jurisdictional standards created in the act. The Secretary of Defense is specifically empowered to appeal to the President whenever any action or inaction of the Board in his judgment adversely affects our national security. A similar right of appeal is implicitly given to every other member of the Board.

The Space Policy Board has no administrative or operational functions. While it is authorized to employ a staff it is intended and expected that such staff will be of modest size, composed of only those experts and clerical assistants necessary to permit the Board efficiently to carry out its limited policy planning, and decisionmaking functions.

Operational authority and responsibility are placed in the civilian space agency and the Department of Defense. It is obvious that many of the projects carried on under the primary responsibility of one agency may also involve the active cooperation and effort of the other. Provision for flexible coordination and cooperation is made in the bill and the bill directs that there be no undue duplication of facilities, personnel and effort.

Also it is anticipated that under the primary direction and responsibility of either the Department of Defense or the civilian Space Agency, other agencies of the Government will be called upon to perform much essential scientific and technical work. At this early stage in our venture into space, the area of our knowledge is so small and the potentialities for progress so great that we will do well to organize our effort so as to utilize as much of our trained manpower and facilities for aeronautical and space activities as other national requirements will permit.

There is a provision in the bill directing the civilian Space Agency to make publicly available all technical information which the security interests of the country will permit. We also recommend the enactment of patent provisions like those contained in the House bill. These provisions are intended to provide protection to the interests of the Government and at the same time permit ample rewards and inducements to inventors to insure their maximum effort. The patent provisions are similar to those in the Atomic Energy Act, and to the regulations used now by the Department of Defense and the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

The committee reported in accordance with the statement I have just made; but in view of the desire of several able members of the committee to give further study to the House section and because unanimous consent would be required to write any new language into the bill if the Senate adopted the identical language of the House bill, I offer an amendment and ask that it be read. The amendment strikes the patent section from the Senate bill in order that the House patent section will be in conference. Then whatever the conferees may agree upon can be done.

I say to my friend that I think we have the responsibility of inquiring into the subject again, to see whether the law which we in the Congress passed with great enthusiasm 2 years ago might now be susceptible to constructive amendment.

Mr. ENGLE. That is precisely what I am saying. The program which was enacted into law was the program of this administration. In his message the President said that our space exploration program was "often mistakenly supposed to be an integral part of defense research and development."

That is precisely what I say it should be. He says it is mistakenly supposed to be that.

Then, to really button the case down further, the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN], in commenting on the President's speech, said:

> I think he has put the emphasis where it belongs. * * * He (meaning President Eisenhower) divorces the space program from the military program, something he should have done long ago, so that there won't be any confusion as to the accent and emphasis of the space program with respect to our military.

That was said Sunday night on a television program. What I am saying today is that that is exactly the wrong direction in which to go. We ought to put the two together.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the role.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COTTON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE BUDGET

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, Congress has now received the President's budget, which, in my judgment, is another "head in the sand" budget which refuses to face up to our national needs and international responsibilities.

I can think of no more pertinent comment than that contained in a recent article entitled "A Dissenting View on National Audit," reprinted yesterday on the editorial page of the Washington Post from the New Republic, in which it originally appeared.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A DISSENTING VIEW ON NATIONAL AUDIT

Welcome to the Age of Damocles. Sorry that thing is hung up there by a hair, but you know what rope costs these days.

The President has given an account of his stewardship, but the greatest, overriding shortage in the national accounts was not mentioned. It arises, we think, from the President's conviction that it isn't the principle, it's the money of the thing. He fails to see that there is more than one kind of mortgage on the future; there is more to a national audit than a counting of blessings and cash.

What is the President's message as the new decade begins? Save now, be strong later. Save now, educate later. Save now, cure unemployment later. Save now, reclaim our towns and cities later. Save now, research later the cause and remedy for mortal disease. Save now, build housing later. Save now, clear the air later. Save now, purge our streams later. Save now, nourish later the people—and the hopes—of new nations.

Along with its fixation on money debits, the President's state of the Union message encourages further default of national responsibility, glossed over by recourse to the doctrine of divided powers and the icy morality of self-help: "The traditional framework of our Federal system * * * has worked effectively for nearly 200 years." The system has evolved for nearly 200 years, to a point where Federal help for States and local communities now invigorates rather than threatens the Republic, politically as well as financially.

To favor dedicating the energies of the National Government to the fostering of economic growth is not necessarily to favor deficit financing on the one hand, or reliance on a theoretical high volume of revenue to the Government from such growth on the other. There is room in a balanced budget for the encouragement of growth if there is a willingness to make necessary revisions in our tax structure and monetary policies; and if there is the courage and intelligence to make sense of the defense budget. Here the soldier President is the most disappointing. He, if anyone, we were told in 1952, could slice away the fat and end the waste of service rivalry, duplication, and a clinging to the old while embracing the ever-more-costly new. But instead of expert reconstruction of the anatomy of the defense budget, we have had only the arbitrary imposition of an upper limit of size prescribed not by the President or any other constitutional officer, but by the Director of the Budget.

But we are less anxious about the possibility of war (although we do not rule it out entirely) than by the effect of this military imbalance upon United States diplomacy. We want our statesmen to be armed by more than the short end of the big stick. Neither our military posture nor our diplomacy is well served by a design of defense which scamps the requirements for conventional war and comes perilously close to committing us to automatic recourse to nuclear weapons if war, any kind of war, should come.

Nor is it healthy for the world to believe, with all too much evidence, that we stand on the verge of shortening our shadow in Europe, for budgetary reasons.

In his message a year ago, Mr. Eisenhower made much of a plan for defining national goals. It sounded good, although it was hard to see why he could not sit down and do the job with a pencil and pad. This year, there was no talk of national goals. Yet this is a subject for deepest concern: Not just the omission by the President, but the evident fact that we are finding no such goals, with or without his help.

In examining the state of the Union, we cannot help remembering George Kennan's savagely expressed doubt whether a society with the empty preoccupations of this society can survive. We recall the forecast of Henry James 73 years ago in "The Bostonians," where he anticipated "a reign of mediocrity of the feeblest and flattest and most pretentious that has ever been seen."

There is something a President could do about this, and it is not in outer space, or on the far side of the moon, but right here on earth. It is to mobilize the resources, the thought, the idealism of this country, and of the world for the task of helping toward a decent existence the people now denied it by accidents of history and environment. If the public response to the mobilization were to be what we are sure it would be, there would be no reason for doubt as to the state of this Union.

Mr. CLARK. The key statement in the article is:

What is the President's message as the new decade begins? Save now, be strong later. Save now, educate later. Save now, cure unemployment later. Save now, reclaim our towns and cities later. Save now, research later the cause and remedy for mortal disease. Save now, build housing later. Save now, clear the air later. Save now, purge our streams later. Save now, nourish later the people—and the hopes—of new nations.

Mr. President, the history of how the President placed himself in his current fiscal predicament, and how he is perpetuating that predicament, is well outlined in a column which appeared this morning in the New York Times under the byline of that outstanding reporter, James Reston, under the title, "More Money, More Woe." It is this predicament, rather than a realistic facing up to national challenges which has moved the President to present a budget which in a year of prosperity proposes the cutting back of our military procurement and total military expenditures in the face of the growing power of the Russian and Chinese Communists.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Reston's article may appear at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORE MONEY, MORE WOE—PRESIDENT'S BUDGET TROUBLES ARE CALLED SIMILAR TO THOSE OF MOST AMERICANS

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON, January 18.—Like most Americans who look over their financial accounts these days, President Eisenhower is confronted by a familiar dilemma. That is to say, he took in more money than he ever expected to get, but had more financial worries than ever before.

Even if he gets the $4,200 million surplus predicted in today's Federal budget, his financial accounts for the 8 years of his administration will show a deficit of at least $15 billion.

Again like most Americans, the President didn't plan it that way, but he is, to a large extent, the victim of events beyond his control.

"Our goal," said the Republican platform of 1952, "is a balanced budget."

Senator Robert A. Taft, of Ohio, was more explicit in the famous statement he issued from Morningside Heights in September of that year just before the election. He said:

"General Eisenhower emphatically agrees with me in the proposal to reduce drastically overall expenses. Our goal is about $70 billion in fiscal year 1954 and $60 billion in fiscal year 1955. Today we are up against the guns. Government is taking one-third of the people's income and thereby one-third of its freedom."

PLEDGE REPEATED

In the campaign itself, General Eisenhower repeated the pledge, "My goal, assuming that the cold war gets no worse, is to cut Federal spending to something like $60 billion within 4 years," he said.

Starting with the budget of fiscal year 1954, here is the financial summary in billions of dollars, of his 8 years in office:

	Receipts	Expenditures	Surplus or deficit	Public debt
1954	64.7	67.8	−3.1	271.3
1955	60.4	64.6	−4.2	274.4
1956	68.2	66.5	+1.6	272.8
1957	71.0	69.4	+1.6	270.5
1958	69.1	71.9	−2.8	276.3
1959	68.3	80.7	−12.4	284.7
1960 (estimate)	78.6	78.4	+0.2	284.5
1961 (estimate)	84.0	79.8	+4.2	280.0

An incident took place in the presentation of that first Eisenhower budget that explains a great deal about the figures above. On April 30, 1953, the President called Senator Taft and other Republican congressional leaders to the White House to hear an explanation of the budget.

As related by Robert J. Donovan, Washington correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, who was later given access to the minutes of the President's Cabinet and other White House meetings for an official history of the first Eisenhower administration, the President explained that he had cut the Truman budget but that heavy military spending would continue, that more deficits lay ahead and that the first Republican budget would be out of balance.

Senator Taft denounced the budget as a violation of their private agreements and public statements.

"The one primary thing we promised the American people," he said, "was reduction of expenditures. Now you're taking us right down the same road Truman traveled. It's a repudiation of everything we promised in the campaign."

From that day to this, the President has been caught between those members of his own party who wanted expenditures cut even at the expense of the military budget, and those Democrats who are now blaming him for spending too little and allowing the defenses of the Nation to fall behind the offensive power of the Soviet Union.

In this battle the President has defended the concept of collective security overseas and of social security at home. His deficits are largely the result of the military, political, and social revolutions in the world and of the requirements of a population that rose from 155 million in 1952 to just under 180 million today.

It is interesting in this connection that associates of the President who look sadly on this overall deficit now mention three things in explanation of the record.

First, the Soviet sputniks, which boosted the budget.

Second, the recession of 1958–59, which led to additional expenditures.

And, third, the President's three illnesses of 1955 and 1956.

ECONOMY NOT PUSHED

On this last point, it is now conceded here that after the President took ill in September of 1955, the administration's careful plan to cut about $3 billion of expenditures was never followed through.

Looking back on that period now, officials concede that the absence of the President produced a kind of administrative untidiness. The President himself was not able to enforce economy on the departments as he might have done if he had been active. The direction of the Bureau of the Budget was not forceful, and even those in the Government who saw the deficits mounting hesitated to bother the President with the problem.

In addition to this administrative untidiness, some officials here believe that there was also intellectual untidiness in dealing with the recession. The recession, they note, could have been dealt with by cutting taxes or increasing expenditures.

Some officials argued for a tax cut, on the ground that once expenditures go up in the Federal budget, they tend to remain on the new higher plateau. This course, however, was rejected, and while there was no actual decision to increase expenditures they were allowed to go up piecemeal, adding once more to the size of the budget.

OTHER CAUSES, TOO

It was this difference of opinion on expenditures that led to the extraordinary spectacle of former Secretary of the Treasury George M. Humphrey condemning his own administration's budget just before he retired.

In the last analysis, however, the deficits were not caused primarily by these differences within the administration, the farm program, which the administration inherited and did not solve, the rising interest on the debt and inflation all contributed to the administration's disappointments.

They could have cut the cost of defense and put solvency ahead of security, or rejected new programs for highways and airports, but if they had taken this course, the outcries of protest would have been louder than those being voiced here today.

Mr. CLARK. The article gives, year by year, national receipts and expenditures. It shows that deficits have occurred in 4 of the first 6 years of the Eisenhower administration, the last deficit of $12,400 million being the largest deficit in a peacetime year in our history, and shows how the public debt has increased from $271 billion to more than $280 billion.

It shows rather optimistically, to my way of thinking, the small estimated surplus for fiscal 1960 and a somewhat unrealistic surplus of $4,200 million for fiscal 1961, which appears in the President's budget message.

I am appalled that the President proposes to terminate the college housing program, to cut back on aid for hospital construction, to rock along with the present minimum level of urban renewal, and to propose only $10 million in expenditures to create jobs in all of the many areas of longtime, heavy unemployment, a subject with respect to which a subcommittee headed by the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota will soon make a report. The President proposes no expenditures at all for aid to education. I hope very much that the Senate will see fit to disagree with the President during the next few days and pass a substantial aid to education bill.

As the Washington Post notes in this morning's lead editorial:

The President said it all in his first sentence. "With this message, transmitting the budget of the United States for the fiscal year 1961, I invite the Congress to join with me in a determined effort to achieve a substantial surplus."

Mr. President, the editorial continues—and I am paraphrasing—that from the beginning to the end of the budget message it looks as if nothing else matters in our national economy and our national posture at home and abroad except to achieve this substantial surplus; and to this end the final energies of the administration are apparently to be devoted.

I suggest that it has been very seldom in our history that so narrow a view of the economic responsibilities and of the Nation's real priority needs has been more unabashedly acknowledged.

I concur in the President's view that a surplus would be both appropriate and helpful in 1961; but it should not be the focus of the Government's planning, as Mr. Eisenhower has made it.

This budget, as the Washington Post points out, calls for reductions in the overall weapons procurement, extensive cutbacks in the Strategic Air Command, and a 47-ship reduction in authorized naval strength. It calls for only a snail's pace of modernization of the Army—and our boys in Berlin are still equipped with World War I type machine guns.

The President's aid-to-education program is no more realistic and workable than it was a year ago. Yet this is where a substantial increase in Federal spending is not only desperately needed but would also pay enormous dividends in many other fields.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this leading editorial published in today's Washington Post may be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 19, 1960]

THE CALL THAT NEVER CAME

The President said it all in the first sentence. "With this message, transmitting the budget of the United States for the fiscal year 1961, I invite the Congress to join with me in a determined effort to achieve a substantial surplus." From beginning to end it is as if nothing else mattered nearly so much. The administration's final energies apparently are to be consecrated to the attainment of a budget surplus. Seldom has its narrow view of Federal economic responsibilities and of the Nation's priority needs been more unabashedly acknowledged. A surplus would indeed be appropriate and helpful in fiscal 1961—but it ought not to be the focus of the Government's planning, as Mr. Eisenhower thus has made it.

It is difficult to see how or why the President thinks his budget attests to the strength of America's economy. The Treasury estimates of gross national product and of corporate earnings on which the $84 billion revenue forecast is founded are plainly ultraconservative. If there is any expectation—as there ought to be—that the Nation can or will experience relatively full employment in the next 18 months, receipts should be measurably higher. (Despite the steel strike, revenues this year are now expected to run $1.5 billion higher than foreseen a year ago, and it is likely that the Treasury again is playing it safe.)

As for spending, the President's expenditure estimates hardly constitute an affirmation of faith in the Nation's capacities. The figures are the lowest of all the Eisenhower years in terms of national income—even if the conservative official forecasts are accepted. The $79.8 billion spending program would amount to just 18 percent of the national income, compared with 19 percent for the current fiscal year and an average of 20 percent for the years since 1954. Spending in the coming year could be increased by as much as $9 billion and not exceed the Eisenhower average, in these terms.

Thus a budget more in keeping with national needs in defense, education, research, public health and welfare, and foreign economic assistance would seem easily within reach on the only terms that count: the Nation's ability to pay for it. At truly full employment and with a minimum program of tax reform—including the postal rate and gasoline tax increases which the President properly insists upon—such a budget could be balanced and might well include a surplus for debt retirement.

Spending this year was depressed in so many areas of Federal activity that it is not surprising to find instances in which outlays for 1961 show slight increases. Given last year's policy of "no new starts" on water resources projects, for example, the 42 projects for which initial funds are proposed in the new budget look like progress. Measured against national needs, this is a faltering half step. The increased outlays for basic research of various kinds are extremely modest.

The aid-to-education programs contain little that is more realistic or workable than the proposals of a year ago. Here among all the challenges to national enterprise is where a substantial increase in Federal spending is not only desperately needed but also would pay enormous dividends. And so on through the dreary recital: still no significant acceleration of nuclear power development, of urban renewal projects, of stream pollution control, of public housing and of many other programs in which the national shortfalls are evident and growing.

The defense budget calls for reductions in overall weapons procurement, extensive cutbacks in the Strategic Air Command's bomber strength, and a 47-ship reduction in authorized naval strength. The snail's-paced modernization of the Army is to be slightly accelerated, it appears, but nothing is projected for more adequate airlift or for the other requirements of an ample limited war capability. The increased procurement of intercontinental ballistic missiles is heartening, but regrettably the major emphasis in the next 2 or 3 years must be on missiles relatively vulnerable to a surprise attack.

The reductions in bomber strength may simply be an accommodation to the realities of improved Russian defenses. But it ought not to be imagined that missiles are yet ready to take over the bomber's role. The budget begins to reflect the imminence—perhaps indeed the presence—of the much-advertised gap in American strategic power. A 50-percent increase in authorizations for the civilian space agency's programs may ultimately help to shorten the long Russian lead in this field, but this is by no means a "crash program" to achieve American parity in space exploration.

The proposed foreign economic aid programs add to impressive totals, but far too small a sum is yet being committed to the basic development programs which the have-not nations so desperately require to achieve the breakthrough to self-sustained growth. This makes all the more desirable the plan to focus economic aid in a few areas. Military aid appropriation requests are somewhat higher, but a decline in actual spending next year is forecast. The recommendations of the Draper Committee for more expeditious modernization of NATO forces seem finally to be receiving recognition, however.

Few of the President's legislative recommendations are new. We have previously supported many of them, such as the proposal to equalize military retirement pay, to repeal the American reservation on the jurisdiction of the World Court and to remove the interest ceiling on Government bonds. These and several others deserve the close attention of Congress.

As for the budget itself, Congress has already greeted it on the familiar pattern. Representatives TABER and CANNON, of course, promise that it will be further reduced. A disappointing number of Democrats have contented themselves with observing that the postal rate and gasoline tax increases cannot be approved and that therefore the budget surplus may prove illusory. A few have suggested that urgent programs may get more funds, but last year's reduction in the funds for space exploration is not an encouraging omen. Until the vast sum of unmet national needs is faced, limited goals like the achievement of a surplus or the reduction of an indicated deficit will probably continue to shape Federal budgets.

The call to a peacetime greatness of national purpose comes hard. In President Eisenhower's 7 years it has not come at all. Now, with the outlines of the final chapter written there is little to do but frame the great issues anew for national reappraisal and, hopefully, a fresh start next January. In this budget message, the Republicans presumably have taken their ground. The appeal is narrow—and in these times, exceedingly dangerous.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I wonder why the President of the United States, who tells us that he is more knowledgeable about defense than anyone else in the country, is so niggardly with the military phase of the budget. In this regard, the Washington Post this morning has published what is, to my mind, one of the greatest of the many great columns which that distinguished commentator, Walter Lippmann, has written over the course of the years. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Lippmann's column, entitled "The Second Best," may be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECOND BEST

(By Walter Lippmann)

The President has been true to the principle he laid down in his first budget, which was submitted on January 21, 1954. "We will reduce," he said 6 years ago, "the share of the national income which is spent by the Government."

He has done that. Although the Federal Government is spending on the purchase of goods and services more than it did 6 years ago, this is a smaller share of the much increased national income. Even when we add the very considerable increased amount spent by local and State governments, the total is still a smaller share than it was in 1953, when the President was preparing his first budget.

So the President is entitled to say that he has been faithful to the principle he laid down when he began. During his term of office, the American people have been enjoying a larger share of a greatly enlarged national income. Never before in all history have so many people in any country had so much money to spend privately and as they saw fit.

This would be an unalloyed delight were it not for the disturbing fact that during these years of private prosperity the President has been presiding over the loss of American primacy among the great powers of the world.

There is no doubt that this country is still much richer than the Soviet Union. It may be, although no one knows, not any weaker than the Soviet Union. But we have fallen behind and are not holding our own in terms of national power, in overall military capacity, in the competition to pioneer in outer space, in the comparative rate of economic growth, and in education, which is the life-giving principle of national power.

Why has this happened? Why are we challenged in this way when, in fact, the Soviet Union has a gross national product which is less than half of ours and a standard of living about a third as high as our own? Why is this richer country being pressed by a poorer country?

The reason, at bottom, is that in this period of cold war, the President has adhered to a principle which would probably no longer be suitable even in a time of total peace. He has adhered to a principle which puts private comfort and private consumption ahead of national need. The President has spent his 7 years in office reducing the share of the national income devoted to public purposes. The challenge of the Soviet Union has been demanding an increase, not a reduction, of the share of the national income devoted to public purposes. We are falling behind in the race because we are not allowed to run.

The Soviet economy is growing at a rate which, estimated conservatively, is 6 percent per annum. Our economy has been growing at a rate of less than 3 percent. The Soviet economy is half as big as ours but it is growing twice as fast. This means that this year's increment of increase is about $12 billion in the U.S.S.R. and about $15 billion in the U.S.A.

But, and this is the crux of the matter, the U.S.S.R. will use most, not all, of the $12 billion increase for national purposes, for armaments, for productive investment, for foreign aid, and for national education. We, on the other hand, are acting on the Eisenhower principle, and are spending a greater share of our $15 billion increase for private purposes, for the making of consumer goods and of the factories and facilities connected with the making and use of consumer goods.

That is why the national power of the Soviet Union is forging ahead of the national power of the United States.

I have taken this analysis of the figures from several sources but chiefly from the brilliant and notable testimony before the joint committee of Congress given last autumn by Prof. W. W. Rostow of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The analysis is confirmed by the testimony of Mr. Allen W. Dulles based on the findings of the Central Intelligence Agency.

The concluding paragraph of Mr. Dulles' statement is one that we must all ponder and take to heart. It says "the major thrust of Soviet economic development and its high technological skills and resources are directed toward specialized industrial, military and national power goals. A major thrust of our economy is directed into the production of the consumer-type goods and services which add little to the sinews of our national strength. Hence, neither the size of our respective gross national products nor of our respective industrial productions is a true yardstick of our relative national power positions.

"The uses to which economic resources are directed largely determine the measure of national power."

I emphasize the last sentence of Mr. Dulles' statement because it states, so it seems to me, the fundamental issue which the country must meet. The President's controlling principle—that the Government should spend a smaller share of a growing national income—has as its consequence, in this age of cold war and national rivalry, that the country will have a smaller position of influence and power in the world. While it may be that the days of our primacy, which were brief, are ending, what must not be allowed to come to an end is our parity with the greatest powers. For on it depend many of the dearest hopes of mankind.

Nobody can say as yet when the Nation will become aroused to the realization that national duty must take precedence over private indulgence, that it is not possible to preserve our society by private affluence and public complacency.

The voices that will serve this country, and indeed save it, will be those of stern men demanding hard things. They may not as yet do well in the Gallup Polls. They will be listened to sooner or later. For they will shatter the belief, now so prevalent among us, that affluence is greatness. It is not. In the history of human societies it has not seldom been the case that when riches were devoted to luxury it was the mark of their decline.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, Mr. Lippmann points out that never before in our history have so many people in so many different countries had so much money to spend privately as they saw fit. This would be fine if we were not using this unexampled period of prosperity to sit back on our national and collective haunches and watch the President preside over the loss of American primacy among the great nations of the world. In short, as Mr. Lippmann says, the President of the United States is putting private comfort and private consumption ahead of national need. Mr. Lippmann says:

> The President has spent his 7 years in office reducing the share of the national income devoted to public purposes. The challenge of the Soviet Union has been demanding an increase, not a reduction, of the share of the national income devoted to public purposes. We are falling behind in the race because we are not allowed to run.

Mr. Lippmann says that most of the $12 billion increase which is anticipated in our national economy will not be used in the public sector of the economy, to rehabilitate obsolescence in that section of our economy at home, to shore up our defenses and increase our foreign aid, or to rehabilitate our national educational system, which is badly in need of help. All this increase is to be used for private purposes, for the making of more consumer goods, such as whisky and cigarettes, for advertising, and a host of activities included in the computation of our gross national product which are either downright harmful to the moral and spiritual well-being of Americans, or which, at the very best, are useless.

As Mr. Lippmann says:

> That is why the national power of the Soviet Union is forging ahead of the national power of the United States.

Mr. Allen Dulles, the head of the Central Intelligence Agency, has put it as well as anyone else, if not better. He has concluded, as Mr. Lippmann relates and as others know, that—

> The major thrust of Soviet economic development and its high technological skills and resources are directed toward specialized military and national power goals.

Whereas the major thrust in our economy is directed merely into the production of more consumer goods and services which add little, if anything, to our national strength. Indeed, it was less than a year ago that the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers had the effrontery to tell the public that the aim of our economy was the production of more consumer goods. When he was criticized on the floor of the Senate for that comment, he defended it. He said the aim of our economy is the production of more consumer goods.

I suggest that the aim of our economy is to eliminate misery at home, to strengthen our national resources, to play our part in the world of today and tomorrow in international affairs, and to assure to every American man, woman, and child the opportunity to live in freedom, with appropriate civil liberties, in order to pursue his or her opportunity to advance by some little bit the Western Civilization and its spiritual growth, of which we are a part.

Mr. Lippmann italicizes, in his column, a sentence of Mr. Allen Dulles' which sums up the matter in a nutshell:

> The uses to which economic resources are directed largely determine the measure of national power.

I suggest that they largely determine also the measure of national strength—not merely material strength, but spiritual strength, as well. It is in this regard that one must, unhappily, be critical of the President's philosophy and his method of stating it.

In all the President's emphasis of his notion of fiscal responsibility, we still see the administration practicing fiscal sleight-of-hand. Interest charges on the national debt will be $2 billion higher next year than last; and an additional $500 million is proposed to be spent on the farm program.

I am no expert on agriculture although we have many fine family farms in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. But I have talked at some length with the experts, in and out of this body, on a farm program. I do not hesitate to say that we could have a better farm program than we have today, at a minimum of $2 billion less cost to the taxpayer. Yet no such program has been suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the administration has done everything possible to discourage those who would evolve such a program within this body from pursuing their objectives.

The President says nothing about stronger tax law enforcement and closing the tax loopholes although I am happy to note that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, apparently speaking for himself, proposes to make a greater effort than heretofore to crack down on tax dodgers, an area in which billions of dollars are going down the drain through phony claims for business expense and other like improper expenditures charged off as tax deductions.

The President says nothing about closing tax loopholes through which additional billions of dollars are slipping away. The President is right in saying that we must live within our means, but during his administration our means have been decreased by improper tax cuts, and our potential revenues have never been adequately explored.

Mr. President, if there is one thing that the country needs above all others, in order to put its economy on a strong basis, it is a drastic and complete overhauling of its outmoded, obsolete, unfair, and inadequate tax system. The country certainly needs such a drastic and complete overhauling of the tax system, so as to yield substantially greater tax revenue without having tax rates raised by as much as 1 percent.

I applaud the effort of the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in the other body to bring this to pass. It is unfortunate that it is not likely to be done during the present session of Congress.

But in order to assure the surplus of which the President speaks, and yet enable us to pass the measures necessary for the national well-being and the national security and strength, I hope that, at the very least, we shall close some of the flagrant and inequitable tax loopholes of which I have spoken.

Mr. President, let me close my remarks by referring briefly to an excellent article written by the able British political scientist, Dennis W. Brogan. The article, which is entitled, "Many U.S. Voters Cling to the Past," was published last Sunday in the Washington Post. Perhaps the public attitudes which Mr. Brogan has so well outlined in the article explain why it is that our First Citizen clings so tenaciously to his outmoded thinking.

However, Mr. President, regardless of whatever may be the attitude in the White House, the American people can no longer afford such complacency. It is time for America to wake up and take a look at the world as it is, not as we would like it to be. It is time for all of us to pull in our belts and prepare to do whatever is necessary to be done in order to put our house in order at home and be able to play our proper part abroad.

But, Mr. President, we shall never do that if we follow the philosophy and the recommendations of the state of the Union message and the President's budget.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article written by Mr. Brogan be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MANY U.S. VOTERS CLING TO PAST

(By D. W. Brogan)

When I first went to the United States in 1925, there were tens of millions of American citizens who, Post Office apart, had do dealings with and no interest in the Federal Government. Not only was the income tax low but, given the income level of those times, many didn't pay it. There was no pay-as-you-earn system, and unless for the rich, the direct taxes levied by the Federal Government, which had been quite high during and just after World War I, were minimal.

If you smoked, you helped to pay for Uncle Sam's little luxuries, but if you merely drank, you didn't, thanks to the 18th amendment. Nor did the Federal Government do much for you even if it did little to you. There were national parks, and pork barrel projects, and there was a Navy and an Army that only a minority of the population ever set eyes on.

Washington itself reflected the remoteness of the Union from the affairs of the Nation. The Plaza in front of the station was full of rusty war shacks. That masterpiece of the Grant era, the old State Department, housed not only State but War and Navy. Government offices in that pre-Hoover era were often hidden in shabby office buildings.

Pennsylvania Avenue was lined with shacks that Hollywood would hardly dare to show as background to a sophisticated western. Washington was still a village and, according to repute, many of the diplomatic missions of the minor nations (a third or so of those represented today) were useful to their occupants and their customers as high-class and legally immune bootlegging joints. It was an idyllic time—and it is over.

But, and it is important but, many, many millions of Americans still live, emotionally, in that idyllic world that died in the New Deal and whose grave was bulldozed flat in World War II. Government is all around them; it affects every aspect of their lives. They know this; the tax bite makes that unavoidable, but old and not so old men still dream of a country in which politics will be art for art's sake and government will be confined to keeping the Indians on the reservation.

And a consequence is that the American's attitude to government is ambivalent. He is proud of the Constitution, of the Monroe Doctrine; he is all for Lincoln (deeply misrepresented as being first and last a kindly and ethical type, a sublimated Sunday school teacher). But he is unwilling to accept the fact that for good or ill, mostly for ill, big government and mostly big National Government has come to stay.

"The business of the United States is business," said Cool Cal Coolidge in those days when cool had no musical or artistic meaning. Today the United States is the business of the United States (including business). United States Steel is big but U.S. Government is bigger. There are many reasons for this, but the impact, scale, cost of World War II and the cold war are enough to explain most of the phenomena.

It was all very well for President Eisenhower's first Collector of Internal Revenue to dream of working himself out of a job by abolishing the income tax. But it was a dream, and yet so many millions of Americans live in the dream world of T. Coleman Andrews.

Government is a nuisance that we could get rid of if all good men got together. A strong tendency to anarchy, finding expression in some of the dreams (not in the practices) of Thomas Jefferson, is part of the American way of life. It shouldn't be taken too seriously, but it can be a nuisance.

For example, it bedevils sensible discussion among citizens about the role of the States, cities, counties. A great deal of the current talk about giving power back to the States is nonsense, since it ignores the financial limitations of the States. Sometimes the difficulty could in great part be dealt with by legislation or amending the State constitution, as in Michigan and New Jersey. Sometimes even cities could be solvent and competent if State legislatures extended their boundaries and relaxed too jealous controls. But there are lots of States and still more lots of cities which can't make ends meet, which never will be able to make ends meet out of local resources.

Yet the tradition that I have talked of, as far as it does accept the necessity for governmental activity, wants to pass the buck to the State, the city, the New England town. Let Sam not do it. That way lies fiscal sanity. Maybe, but that way lies a government that denies its responsibilities in the public sector from sputniks to schools.

The tenacity of the idea can be illustrated from an issue of the most serious journal in the United States, a copy of which has recently come my way. (I mean the Harvard Alumni Bulletin, of course.) A member of the class of 1937 takes Senator CLARK, of Pennsylvania, to task for advocating Federal aid to education, asking with crushing scorn "an economically literate explanation of how a dollar raised by Federal taxes differs from a dollar raised by State taxes."

Senator CLARK does not need my help, but the author of the letter might reflect that in his State, which is also Senator CLARK'S, the taxable revenue per head is far greater than in, say, Mississippi. Left to itself, that State and many others can't provide, no matter how willing they are, the minimum social services that not only they want but that they need—and that it is desirable from the point of view of the Nation that they have.

No doubt this means raising money in one State to spend in another, but it is a long time since Lee surrendered and States rights, hostility to internal improvements, etc., have never been the same since.

Of course, the average citizen knows that he needs schools, roads, bridges, and he expects the Federal Government to help pay for them. Schools? Not yet, but soon. I have been struck in my recent peregrinations in areas like upstate New York with the resistance to the rising school taxes, not because they are proof of extravagance, though sometimes they well may be (it depends on how important you think basketball is), but simply to the often unjust effects of the local tax system. Federal aid will come, and it is needed.

Then it is hardly necessary to contrast the theoretical hostility of the embattled farmer to all Government interference, with the sad reality of his no doubt shamefaced and resentful, but still steady, acceptance of those horrid parity payments. Nor, indeed, is business, so much of it dependent on the Pentagon, or the stiff-necked bourgeoisie, who don't necessarily despise the resources of the social security system, really hostile to the Government. And the sturdy, independent striker, member of a big union, does not always remember how much that union owes to Federal patronage.

Back to Jefferson, back to Calhoun, if you like, but only in dreams.

Two souls, as Goethe put it, dwell in American breasts. What are the consequences for politics, for the role of the citizen? As I have said, politics 35 years ago, when I first began to study the system at firsthand, was a game. It was not in Harvard, when I arrived there from Oxford in the golden age of Cal, a popular game. My habit of slinking off to political meetings, listening to former Mayor Curley or former Mayor Fitzgerald, even to Congressmen and Senators, was frowned on by all my friends. Why was I wasting my time like this when I could be in the library or in a speakeasy?

I did get to the library from time to time, but I also got out and about among the politicians, and I should say that today the average American, in his sense of duty as a voter, is not impressive, does take more interest and a more intelligent interest in politics than he used to do. By British standards, he is idle and indifferent, but by the standards of 1925 he is Cato or John Quincy Adams.

But what kind of an interest? In his interesting panegyric of the U.S. Senate, "Advise and Consent," Allen Drury makes the valid point that many Americans, perhaps most active politicians, get their initiation into the political way of life by running for office in high school or college or in some organization. "Heeling," as I believe it is called at Yale, is a political education. But it is a political education of a special type.

It is about people, not projects, about men, not measures. The doctrinal content is nil or fictitious, like near beer in the 1920's. In the spring of last year I ran across one or two college elections, with parties, primaries, pamphlets, campaigns. They provided political education of a kind, but not of the best kind. For the parties were artificial divisions like the Blues and the Greens in Constantinople or like scratch sides of softball got up among more or less willing parents and children.

There may be campuses where there are genuine college issues debated and settled that way, but I haven't been on them. What was decided was the pecking order of the campus elite. What is often decided in local, State, and national politics is the pecking order of the political elite. There are other issues in politics; they are neglected, on the campus and on Capitol Hill.

I rush in to say that I am not demanding and would be horrified to get that panacea of so many political scientists, a rational political system. Parties based on defined and deeply dividing doctrines are what the United States, luckily, hasn't got. When she did get such a system in 1860, she got a civil war thrown in. But it seems to me that one reason for the comparative idiocy (in the Greek sense of the word) of the average American is his frustration when confronted with his duties as a voter.

He votes the straight ticket and what does he get? He doesn't know even what to expect, what to hope for. What has the big Democratic majority of 1958 got from this Congress? In State politics, the outrageous gerrymandering at the expense of the cities, at its worst in Georgia but bad in Iowa and existent everywhere, depresses the good or even the sporting citizen. After all, at the racetrack, your horse starts. In politics it often doesn't. The division of powers into three branches accounts for a lot of this frustration; so does the necessary ambiguity of party platforms.

But whatever the cause, boredom, frustration, apathy are not unnatural results.

The American citizen is asked to do more than any other citizen since the great days of Periclean Athens. (And the Athenian had often little else to do and was paid for a lot of his political duties.) There are too many elections, for too many offices. From President through Governor to dogcatcher. From U.S. Senator to selectman. No one has the time, energy, or knowledge to do all that he is asked to do—well.

It is a surprise that so much intelligent cross voting takes place, that primaries and final elections so often make the right choices. Happy citizens of the District of Columbia, who have no rights, duties, or worries.

Nor is this all. In too many States they have direct democracy. They elect practically every public official; they have initiatives and recalls. I remember in the election of 1952 looking at the ballot paper and the accompanying literature issued to the inhabitants of San Francisco County (Calif.). There were propositions for the county and the State and endless officeholders were to be chosen. There were explanatory pamphlets. Altogether, the documentation issued to the voter weighed 14 ounces on this, bad paper and small type. It would have taken an expert a week's exclusive study to begin to know how to vote.

No wonder the American dreams of simpler days, no wonder he forgets to vote or to register, no wonder he doesn't know the name of his Congressman. Yet things have improved.

Everybody knows the name of the Vice President, which wasn't true in 1925 (who was he now? Dawes? Curtis? Marshall?). The presidential is a sporting event that eclipses the world series or the preakness. And that justifies all the ballyhoo that the heirs of Washington and Jefferson are going to go through this year.

Even if millions of Americans won't vote, all will know who is running. In that lies the safety of the Republic.

PRIVATE ELECTRIC UTILITY PROPAGANDA MILL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I very much enjoy reading the Washington Grange News because I find that in almost capsule form it does, in the public interest, a job which needs to be done. I have reference especially to an editorial signed by Ted F. Berry, which appeared in the January 8, 1960, issue of the Grange News.

In the editorial, which is entitled "Doubling in Brass," Mr. Berry quotes extensively from a report which was issued by the Northwest Public Power Association.

I realize that it might be asked why, as an Oregon Senator, I make reference to this Washington State publication. In this instance I would need no further justification than that the editorial quotes extensively from a report issued by the Northwest Public Power Association, a fine organization which in the past has done much to counteract the skillful propoganda emanating from private utility sources.

Mr. President, in addition to that justification, which stands by itself, the material quoted refers to the private utility spokesman E. Hofer & Sons, of Portland, Oreg., whose office supplies free canned editorials to rural and community papers throughout the United States.

Because of the importance to the Nation of setting straight the record with respect to misleading and biased editorial opinion, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial to which I have alluded be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Grange News, Jan. 8, 1960]

DOUBLING IN BRASS

(By Ted F. Berry)

You've probably read, in your local weekly newspaper, certain editorials which surprised you because they were so bitterly warped against public power and virtually all forms of Government activity. It's a good bet that many such grassroots gems did not originate with your local editor—that many of them came from the same propaganda mill, namely, E. Hofer & Sons, of Portland, Oreg.

Largely subsidized by private utilities whose interests it constantly promotes, the Hofer organization regularly circulates its free canned editorials to more than 11,000 rural and community papers throughout the United States. They are designed to save work for busy editors who are told frankly that they do not need to give any credit to the source, Hofer's mimeographed Industrial News Review.

Last November the Northwest Public Power Association published a documented report on the Hofer agency, by Gus Norwood, executive secretary, pointing out that the Industrial News Review has been the subject of investigations since the late 1920's. "The Hofer editorials are skillfully and professionally written," Mr. Norwood said. "They never lose track of the points that they and their subscribers want made. They employ guilt by association, glittering generalities, name calling, half truths, distortion, and sometimes guilt by omission of pertinent facts."

Further, Norwood commented, the Industrial News Review gives no hint as to who's paying for its gratuitous service to overworked editors.

"But readers also have rights," he concluded. "They have a right to know who plants the seeds for this grassroots field of opinion. Who pays for the fertilizer? And who, then, will gather the harvest?"

Private utilities customarily charge their customers with the costs of supporting the perennial Hofer output. But there's a serious question now in the mind of the Internal Revenue Service as to whether they should be allowed to deduct such propaganda expenditures from their Federal income taxes. The utilities have cried "foul" on the ground that IRS is interfering with the processes of free expression. Somehow, in their thinking, the ratepaying public is benefited by being brainwashed.—B.

PRIVATE ELECTRIC UTILITY RAPID TAX WRITEOFF WINDFALLS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am sure that many Members of the Senate have noted in the mass media of publications, advertisements, sponsored by private utilities, deploring the Federal investment in the great multipurpose dams erected to provide power, flood control, and agricultural benefits, at reasonable cost to the citizens of our Nation.

What many who read the skillfully worded advertisements may not realize is that the private power companies themselves receive substantial tax benefits.

The Oregon Grange Bulletin in its January 5, 1960, issue helps to set the record straight, and comments upon the rapid tax writeoff windfalls of the private utilities. The editorial is entitled "Private Power and Taxes."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Oregon Grange Bulletin item of January 5 be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oregon Grange Bulletin, Jan. 5, 1960]

PRIVATE POWER AND TAXES

(By Elmer McClure)

If we don't watch out we are going to drown in the crocodile tears the private power companies are shedding for the poor victims whose heard-earned tax dollars are being used to build hydroelectric dams for the benefit of public power customers. We can hardly pick up a magazine or newspaper any more that isn't soggy from the power companies' crybaby ads about the poor victimized taxpayers in non-Federal power areas.

If we may be permitted to emit one last squeak as we go down for the third time, we should like to point out to these bereaved private power companies that the customers of the Federal hydroelectric projects are not being subsidized by the rest of the Nation's poor deprived taxpayers. They are, in fact, subsidizing these same taxpayers most handsomely. The customers of the Bonneville grid system have paid into the general fund of the United States in interest alone on the Federal money invested in the Bonneville grid system, $219,599,782 as of June 30, 1959.

Speaking of something to cry about. How about a few tears for the poor Federal taxpayers who are going to have to pay additional taxes in the amount of $36¼ million to make up for the windfall the stockholders of just eight private power companies got when they were issued some $72,548,754 in tax-free dividends in 1958 as a result of accelerated amortization.

The December 21, 1959, issue of "News for Electric Consumers" gives this account of the windfall received by the wealthy investors of just eight private utilities:

"The December 3 issue of Public Utilities Fortnightly advises investors to consider 'the available returns from tax-free dividends on stocks of some private companies. Last year three companies paid dividends which were entirely tax free—California Oregon Power Co., Detroit Edison Co., and Pacific Power & Light.

" 'It appears likely that the dividends on California Oregon Power will remain fully tax free in 1959 and 1960, but after 1960 the percentage may decline and it is uncertain whether any part of the dividend will be free of income tax after 1963, when accelerated amortization will run out,' says the magazine."

Emphasis added, for this points up what consumer groups have been saying: that private power companies have been reaping a windfall through rapid writeoff gimmicks in the tax laws. They charge consumers regular taxes—paid for in electric bills—but then pay only part of the tax take to the Government.

They retain the remainder, listing it as deferred taxes, and apparently do with it as they see fit—including paying out some of it as tax-free dividends to their stockholders.

The PUF piece continues: "Pacific Power & Light preferred and common dividends * * * will probably remain fully tax free for about 5 years, due to accelerated amortization in connection with the company's large hydro projects."

Lest wealthy investors run out of private power firms in which to invest, the magazine notes that other firms paid dividends last year which were "substantially tax free." They were: California Electric Power, 79 percent tax free; Hartford Electric Light, 78 percent; Niagara Mohawk Power, 77 percent; Portland General Electric, 78 percent; and Washington Water Power, 89 percent.

What these percentage figures mean in terms of dollars is readily seen in this table:

Company	Dividends declared, 1958	Percent tax free	Amount tax free
California Oregon Power	$3,663,202	100	$3,663,202
Detroit Edison	25,543,546	100	25,543,546
Pacific Power & Light	8,403,585	100	8,403,585
California Electric Power	3,600,971	79	2,844,767
Hartford Electric Light	5,035,046	78	3,927,336
Niagara Mohawk Power	26,650,562	77	20,409,283
Portland General Electric	4,230,000	78	3,299,400
Washington Water Power	5,008,579	89	4,457,635
Total	82,135,491		72,548,754

OREGON'S ACHIEVEMENT IN BRUCELLOSIS CONTROL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Oregon Veterinary Medical Association has strongly urged me to do all I can to have adequate funds for the brucellosis eradication program appropriated in this session of the Congress.

I take great pride in the fact that Oregon has achieved a standard which permits the U.S. Department of Agriculture to certify the State as having less than 1 percent of its cattle infected and less than 5 percent of its herds affected.

However, the goal toward which we should point is one which in the interest of public health we should attempt to achieve. It is my hope, and also that of the dairy industry of my State, that Oregon can become brucellosis free. To do this, money will be needed. The curtailment of Federal funds for this program in 1959 hampered the program. If there is an additional curtailment of funds in the remainder of this year, it will be a most discouraging thing.

Let me say, Mr. President, that I am not simply making a plea for the appropriation of funds to be used to eradicate disease from cattle; I am making a plea for the appropriation of funds to be used so that, by means of the eradication of disease from cattle, hundreds of little boys and girls in this country can be saved from suffering from undulant fever. The distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], who presently is presiding over the Senate, has been one of the victims of undulant fever in this country.

There is no question about the medical data in regard to this subject. Much of undulant fever can be traced directly to cattle infected with Bang's disease. I think I speak as somewhat of a competent witness on this matter, for I happen to be president of the Devon Cattle Breeders Association, and for many years I have raised cattle.

I say we have to do everything we can in the interest of protecting the health of the people of the country; and by eradicating this serious disease in cattle, we can take a long step in that direction.

However, Mr. President, this problem is a national one. The funds which I shall urge to be appropriated are not needed in the selfish interest of the cattle breeders or the cattle industry; but they are needed from the standpoint of taking action in the best interests of the health of the American people. As all of us know how important it is that dairy products be available for food, and we must make certain that the milk that is served to the young people and the adults in this country is free from brucellosis infection.

I have urged that the Agricultural Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations give thoughtful and favorable consideration to this matter in connection with the fiscal year 1961 budget, and that a supplemental appropriation of $3½ million be provided in this fiscal year for this most worthwhile and important disease-prevention program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter dated December 29, 1959, from Dr. O. H. Muth, and the accompanying resolution of the association, be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and the resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OREGON VETERINARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION,
Corvallis, Oreg., December 29, 1959.

The Honorable WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: In Oregon, the reservoir of brucellosis is in the cattle population where it takes its economic toll. As long as this reservoir remains, brucellosis presents a public health problem in the human population where it occurs largely as an occupational disease.

Oregon has gone a long way toward eradication of brucellosis. Twenty years ago, the disease was widespread and common. Up to 15 percent of the cattle in the more densely cattle areas were infected. On September 11, 1959, there was a Brucellosis Day celebration in Salem because on July 1 of this year, Oregon became officially recognized by the U.S. Department of Agriculture and by the U.S. Livestock Sanitary Association as a modified certified area, signifying that less than 1 percent of the cattle and less than 5 percent of the herds remained infected.

It would be a shame to waste this investment in disease control. Yet, disease knows no compromise. As soon as eradication and control measures relax, disease spreads.

Oregon, like a number of other States, may find it difficult to finish this job. It may not even be able to hold its present hard-gained position without Federal assistance; assistance such as it has received in the past.

You are urged to give this problem your interest and your support.

Sincerely,

O. H. MUTH,
Secretary.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING EMERGENCY FUNDS FOR FEDERAL-STATE BRUCELLOSIS ERADICATION PROGRAM

Whereas much progress has been made in the eradication of brucellosis and the brucellosis eradication program was encouraged and expedited by Federal disease control authorities and by congressional allocation of $20 million for the program in 1954, followed by the allocation of comparable moneys in the succeeding years with the aim of completion by mid-1960's; and

Whereas many States in a spirit of cooperation with the Federal program accelerated their effort resulting in the certification of 21 entire States, although some States, through no fault of their own, have been unable to complete the objective to date; and

Whereas the unexpected curtailment of Federal funds in the fiscal year 1959 has hampered completion of the program, and further discouragement because of another 25 percent curtailment in funds for 1960 is obvious, although the urgency of the problem remains unchanged; and

Whereas the already planned and initiated brucellosis eradication program with a goal of early completion will now be delayed in many counties in several States; and

Whereas curtailment of Federal support will result not only in loss of planned progress in eradication, but further actual extension of the disease, resulting in eventual greater economic loss to the cattle owners, especially those who move their animals interstate, and to the general public: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon Veterinary Medical Association, That the 2d session of the 86th Congress, convening January 1960, be requested to take immediate and positive action to effect the passage of supplemental legislation appropriating approximately $3½ million for continuation of the brucellosis eradication program on an aggressive and progressive basis in keeping with intent and assurances of Federal cooperation implied when the prgram was offered originally; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this recommendation be forwarded to each Senator and Congressman representing the State of Oregon with a letter explaining the effects of reduction of the current appropriation on the program in the State of Oregon.

IMPORTATION OF LAMB AND MUTTON

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, my attention has been called by a number of Oregon sheep breeders to the difficulty they foresee facing their important industry, should there continue to be a heavy and increasing importation of lamb and mutton into the United States.

Mr. S. A. Jackson, secretary of the Oregon Purebred Sheep Breeders Association, of Corvallis, Oreg., has informed me, for example, that—the importations make it difficult and a financial hardship for sheep producers and those serving the sheep industry to compete with foreign lamb and mutton imports. The two mentioned imported items have increased about 10 times in the last 3 years to a present annual volume of about 40 million pounds.

It is my sincere hope that those interested in presenting their viewpoint to the Tariff Commission during public hearings on March 22 will be able to marshal their evidence in a persuasive manner, so that such relief as is justified by the facts can be given.

Mr. President, because it is my feeling that Senators from other areas of the country also have a deep interest in this subject, I ask unanimous consent that certain of the correspondence and supporting data addressed to me on this topic by Oregonians be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the correspondence and the memoranda were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OREGON PUREBRED SHEEP
BREEDERS ASSOCIATION,
Corvallis, Oreg., January 6, 1960.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: After giving importation of lamb and mutton considerable study, the Oregon Purebred Sheep Breeders Association opposes the heavy importation of lamb and mutton into the United States. The importations make it difficult and a financial hardship for sheep producers and those serving the sheep industry to compete with foreign lamb and mutton imports. The two mentioned imported items have increased about 10 times in the last 3 years to a present annual volume of about 40 million pounds.

We shall appreciate your help in protecting the American sheep industry. A public hearing will be held March 22, in Washington, D.C., by the Tariff Commission on the subject. You may wish to write or appear at the hearing.

Yours truly,

S. A. JACKSON,
Secretary.

ROSEBURG, OREG.,

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
Washington, D.C.:

If the opportunity should arise when you would be able to use your influence toward stopping or reducing the importing of sheep or carcasses from countries outside the United States it would be appreciated very much.

With conditions as they exist now it is hard to "make it" with a flock of sheep.

With kindest regards I am,

Respectfully.

ARTHUR BOYER.

ROSEBURG, OREG.,
January 3, 1960.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: In regards lamb and mutton imports: This enclosed statement is an opinion from the Douglas County Farm Bureau Federation and the Douglas County Livestock Association.

If some point needs clarifying, or some local condition is not clear to you, please feel free to write and some of us will try to let you know what we think.

One point was not included because there was a difference of opinion among us. I think this point is important. It is: That since there is a surplus of field crops, of corn, wheat, etc., since there is a shortage of wool and also according to the importers of lamb and mutton a seasonal shortage of that kind of meat, it would seem foolish not to protect and encourage sheep farming, because sheep farming is an actual income-producing way of taking cropland out of competition. It would seem better to protect domestic sheep farming than add to the tax-supported soil bank.

We hope this will receive your careful consideration. Thank you.

Very truly,

DON OLLIVANT.

IN REGARD TO LAMB AND MUTTON IMPORTS

Imports affect livestock raising in general. However, lamb is our main crop and we are very close to the ports of entry for New Zealand and Australian lamb and mutton.

We believe certain premises must be assumed as true and argued later to readily reach an understanding.

First. The U.S. farmer, generally, unless supported by an artificial economy in the form of Government programs, is unable to keep a balance with labor and capital.

1. Farmers' living costs and necessary services climb steadily.

2. Returns to the farmer drop consistently.

Price rises caused by added services are not shared by the farmer.

Price declines are not absorbed by labor or the processor, or seldom so, but are assessed against the farmer. In the case of our local improved pasture sheep economy, technical advances bid fair to keep us almost even with the cost-price squeeze if our prices are not too suddenly depressed. We still must have time to adapt to these improved methods.

Second. Likely these extra and higher service charges in packaging and manufacturing will discount the advantages of skill and volume supposedly always found in American enterprise. This will surely happen in that part of agriculture supported by Government guaranteed prices. However, it seems an injustice for the part of agriculture that has always wanted to and largely has avoided Government support, to be the one to suffer first from a system that is not realistic.

Third. U.S. farm products cannot be expected to compete with a foreign import produced with cheap labor.

Fourth. In competing with the imports of lamb and mutton from New Zealand and Australia, the U.S. farmer is at a technical disadvantage.

1. Sheepraising is the basic economy of Australia and New Zealand. The New Zealand and Australian sheep farmer receives government aid of an enlightened and energetic nature in the form of large research and marketing programs. Therefore, it has been developed faster than in the United States. Incidentally the U.S. sheepman borrows methods and techniques from Australia and New Zealand.

2. Land leases used in the Australian grazing system makes the owned-land system of the average American farmer a decided disadvantage in a meat price competition.

Fifth. It seems unlikely any of us would want to launch another Government subsidized agricultural commodity (meat in this case). Our only protection seems to be some form of tariff or quota system administered as a protection to our own farmers and not just as an aid to other sections of the national or international economy.

Parenthetically, we the small grazing farmers of Douglas County believe we are about to be sacrificed to further free trade in subsidized manufactured goods and crop surpluses. (Our farmers cannot and do not want to participate in the subsidized programs.)

The only argument so far advanced in favor of New Zealand and Australian lamb and mutton imports is that a sesonal period of low domestic supply is remedied. (We question the validity of this reasoning and are prepared to argue this point.)

We do know that a source of income to those of us having a method of operation that allows us to winter over and fatten late feeder lambs has been lost. This will be reflected in a lower price for feeder lambs to the growers who cannot fatten their own.

Our local early lamb prices have in the past been strongly affected by, if not controlled completely by, supply and quality of the California crop of lambs. With the steadily increasing imports depressing the price of California lamb, we will soon be fighting for our last margin of profit on our early and best paying lambs.

COOPERATIVE EXTENSION WORK IN AGRICULTURE AND HOME ECONOMICS,
STATE OF OREGON,
Roseburg, Oreg., September 25, 1959.

WAYNE MOSHER,
County Agent,
Roseburg, Oreg.

DEAR WAYNE: As per your telephonic request September 21, attached are data on lamb and mutton imports for the year 1958 through July 1959.

Also enclosed are data on lamb and mutton imports as a percentage of domestic production during the same period, and midmonth slaughter lamb prices for 1958–59 on all weights Choice grade at Portland and Denver.

These data are pretty much self-explanatory. However, I want to emphasize the price data in relation to imports and domestic production. As you can see in table III prices on Choice grade live slaughter lambs at Portland and Denver this year lagged behind a year earlier most of the time. The higher level of prices at Portland in May and at Denver in April, May, and June, reflect the domestic spring lamb supply situation. California had an exceptionally poor pasture season last spring and more than the usual number of spring lambs failed to develop into slaughter grade at that time. Notice how U.S. lamb and mutton production and prices in April and May this year compare with a year earlier (table II). That is when imports were the heaviest, especially in April.

As slaughter volume increased in July, prices on live lambs dropped below a year earlier. During August and so far this month lamb and mutton production (data available on federally inspected only) also was substantially heavier than a year earlier.

So the price differential between the two periods in comparison in large measure reflects domestic production trends, not only of lamb and mutton but also poultry, beef, and pork, especially the latter two, which are in larger supply this year.

It is difficult to weigh the true impact of this year's heavier imports on the domestic lamb market. There is some evidence that they have had some measure of downward influence. Certainly domestic lamb prices would have been some higher last spring if we did not have the imports adding to total supply of lamb and mutton for fresh market and processing and the seasonal decline may not have been as great. I would evaluate the effect of live imports in about the same way.

Very truly yours,

STEPHEN C. MARKS,
Extension Agricultural Economist.

TABLE I.—Monthly U.S. lamb and mutton imports by country of origin, 1958–59

[Thousand pounds]

Year and month	Australia	New Zealand	Canada	Others	Total		Year and month	Australia	New Zealand	Canada	Others	Total
					Month	Cumulative						Month	Cumulative
1958—January	421	68	33	17	539	539	1959—January	4,135	419	44	1	4,599	4,599
February	620	455	28	----------	1,103	1,642	February	1,413	238	43	36	1,730	6,329
March	189	184	4	114	491	2,133	March	1,625	674	9	----------	2,308	8,637
April	733	904	5	220	1,882	4,015	April	8,346	3,259	3	578	12,186	20,823
May	2,525	701	----------	----------	3,226	7,241	May	3,552	1,066	1	17	4,636	25,459
June	2,454	829	----------	370	3,653	10,894	June	5,226	1,186	4	519	6,935	32,394
July	284	383	3	143	813	11,707	July	3,731	928	2	----------	4,661	37,055
August	1,949	1,781	4	----------	3,734	15,441
September	1,863	176	372	----------	2,411	17,852
October	1,405	140	405	155	2,105	19,957
November	1,184	169	238	131	1,722	21,679
December	1,088	173	73	41	1,375	23,054

Source: Livestock Division, Agricultural Marketing Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture. Prepared by OSC extension specialists in agricultural economic information, Sept. 24, 1959.

TABLE II.—Lamb and mutton imports as a percentage of domestic production [1]

Year and month	U.S. production (million pounds)		Imports (thousand pounds)		Imports as a percent of U.S. production		Year and month	U.S. production (million pounds)		Imports (thousand pounds)		Imports as a percent of U.S. production
	Month	Cumulative	Month	Cumulative	Month	Cumulative		Month	Cumulative	Month	Cumulative	Month	Cumulative
1958—January	59	59	539	539	0.9	0.9	1959—January	75	75	4,599	4,599	6.2	6.2
February	53	112	1,103	1,642	2.0	1.5	February	62	137	1,730	6,329	2.8	4.6
March	56	168	491	2,133	.9	1.2	March	65	202	2,308	8,637	3.5	4.3
April	65	233	1,882	4,015	2.9	1.7	April	62	264	12,186	20,823	19.6	7.9
May	62	295	3,226	7,241	5.2	2.4	May	55	319	4,636	25,459	8.4	8.0
June	55	350	3,653	10,894	6.6	3.1	June	55	374	6,935	32,394	12.6	8.7
July	53	403	813	11,707	1.5	2.9	July	58	432	4,661	37,055	8.0	8.6
August	50	453	3,734	15,441	7.4	3.4
September	55	508	2,411	17,852	4.3	3.5
October	60	568	2,105	19,957	3.5	3.5
November	48	616	1,722	21,679	3.5	3.5
December	59	675	1,375	23,054	2.3	3.4

[1] Domestic production includes federally inspected and other wholesale and retail but excludes farm slaughter.

Source: Livestock Division, Agricultural Marketing Service, USDA. Prepared by OSC extension specialists in agricultural economic information, Sept. 25, 1959.

TABLE III.—Midmonth slaughter lamb prices at Portland and Denver, 1958–59

[Dollars per hundredweight, Choice grade [1]]

Month	Portland			Denver			Month	Portland			Denver
	1959	1958	Difference 1959–58	1959	1958	Difference 1959–58		1959	1958	Difference 1959–58	1959	1958	Difference 1959–58
January	[2] 19.22	23.62	−4.40	19.15	23.90	−4.75	July	20.00	21.47	−1.47	22.52	23.72	−1.20
February	[2] 17.75	23.25	−5.50	18.88	23.32	−4.44	August	20.25	20.88	−.58	22.85	23.50	−.65
March	19.00	23.38	−4.30	20.40	22.70	−2.30	September	19.83	20.44	−.61	21.25	23.10	−1.85
April	[3] 23.25	[3] 23.34	−.09	[3] 23.02	21.08	+1.94	October	----------	----------	----------	----------	23.50	----------
May	23.16	21.84	+1.32	25.20	23.20	+2.00	November	----------	20.33	----------	----------	22.31	----------
June	22.38	22.38	(4)	24.38	23.62	+.76	December	----------	[2] 19.03	----------	----------	20.48	----------

[1] All weights.
[2] Shorn.
[3] Spring lambs.
[4] No change.

Source: Livestock Division, Agricultural Marketing Service, USDA. Prepared by OSC extension specialists in agricultural economic information, Sept. 25, 1959.

[From the Oregon Farm and Market Outlook, Sept. 3, 1959]

SHEEP STEADY TO LOWER

Price prospects are mixed for sheep and lambs in the year ahead. Slaughter price patterns probably will be moderately higher this winter but the same or lower next spring and summer. A May-to-July price drop on spring lambs is almost certain. Feeder lamb prices probably will stay under the past year through 1960.

Slight rise in domestic lamb and mutton supply seems likely. The Nation's 1959 lamb crop was 2 percent larger than last year. The 1960 crop will increase again if the gradual increase in ewe numbers continues and if the number of lambs per ewe resumes an upward trend. It slipped slightly in 1959.

Imports may be less of an unstabilizing factor than in the past season. The market apparently has made most of its adjustment to the shock of changed policies in Australia and New Zealand. Foreign suppliers will continue testing U.S. lamb and mutton market. They have found it rather thin and easily depressed; but shipment to United States continue much heavier than in the past year, although still small compared to domestic production.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1959.

P.S.—Wayne: I might add that imports are not entirely against the best interest of U.S. sheepmen. More abundant supplies have tended to benefit the producer in terms of maintaining ample supplies before the consumer. So, in this way, the lamb market has been less likely to lose favor to other red meats in greater abundance.

MARKS.

TABLE 1.—Monthly U.S. lamb and mutton imports by country of origin, 1958–59 [1]

[Thousand pounds]

Year and month	Australia	New Zealand	Canada	Others	Total		Year and month	Australia	New Zealand	Canada	Others	Total
					Month	Cumulative						Month	Cumulative
1958—January	421	68	33	17	539	539	1959—January	4,135	419	44	1	4,599	4,599
February	620	455	28	----------	1,103	1,642	February	1,413	238	43	36	1,730	6,329
March	189	184	4	114	491	2,133	March	1,625	674	9	----------	2,308	8,637
April	753	904	5	220	1,882	4,015	April	8,346	3,259	3	578	12,186	20,823
May	2,525	701	----------	----------	3,226	7,241	May	3,552	1,066	1	17	4,636	25,459
June	2,454	829	----------	370	3,653	10,894	June	5,226	1,186	4	519	6,935	32,394
July	284	383	3	143	813	11,707	July	3,731	928	2	----------	4,661	37,055
August	1,949	1,781	4	----------	3,734	15,441	August	1,259	1,209	74	----------	2,647	39,702
September	1,863	176	372	----------	2,411	17,852	September	1,933	1,096	234	----------	3,263	42,965
October	1,405	140	405	155	2,105	19,957	October	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------
November	1,184	169	238	131	1,722	21,679	November	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------
December	1,088	173	73	41	1,375	23,054	December	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------

[1] In addition to the figures shown, about 25,000 head of live lambs were imported in July and another 25,000 in November.

Source: Livestock Division, Agricultural Marketing Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture. Prepared by OSC extension specialists in agricultural economic information.

TABLE 2.—Lamb and mutton imports as a percentage of domestic production [1]

Year and month	U.S. production (million pounds)		Imports [2] (thousand pounds)		Imports as a percent of U.S. production		Year and month	U.S. production (million pounds)		Imports [2] (thousand pounds)		Imports as a percent of U.S. production
	Month	Cumulative	Month	Cumulative	Month	Cumulative		Month	Cumulative	Month	Cumulative	Month	Cumulative
1958—January	59	59	539	539	0.9	0.9	1959—January	75	75	4,599	4,599	6.2	6.2
February	53	112	1,103	1,642	2.0	1.5	February	62	137	1,730	6,329	2.8	4.6
March	56	168	491	2,133	.9	1.2	March	65	202	2,308	8,637	3.5	4.3
April	65	233	1,882	4,015	2.9	1.7	April	62	264	12,186	20,823	19.6	7.9
May	62	295	3,226	7,241	5.2	2.4	May	55	319	4,636	25,459	8.4	8.0
June	55	350	3,653	10,894	6.6	3.1	June	55	374	6,935	32,394	12.6	8.7
July	53	403	813	11,707	1.5	2.9	July	58	432	4,661	37,055	8.0	8.6
August	50	453	3,734	15,441	7.4	3.4	August	53	485	2,647	39,702	5.0	8.2
September	55	508	2,411	17,852	4.3	3.5	September	62	547	3,263	42,695	5.3	7.8
October	60	568	2,105	19,957	3.5	3.5	October	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------
November	48	616	1,722	21,679	3.5	3.5	November	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------
December	59	675	1,375	23,054	2.3	3.4	December	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------

[1] Domestic production includes federally inspected and other wholesale and retail but excludes farm slaughter.
[2] In addition to the figures shown, about 25,000 head of live lambs were imported in July and another 25,000 in November.

Source: Livestock Division, Agricultural Marketing Service, USDA. Prepared by OSC extension specialists in agricultural economic information.

TABLE 3.—Midmonth slaughter lamb prices at Portland and Denver, 1958–59

[Dollars per hundredweight, Choice grade [1]]

Month	Portland			Denver			Month	Portland			Denver
	1959	1958	Difference 1959–58	1959	1958	Difference 1959–58		1959	1958	Difference 1959–58	1959	1958	Difference 1959–58
January	[2] 19.22	23.62	−4.40	19.15	23.90	−4.75	July	20.00	21.47	−1.47	22.52	23.72	−1.20
February	[2] 17.75	23.25	−5.50	18.88	23.32	−4.44	August	20.25	20.88	−.58	22.85	23.50	−.65
March	19.00	23.38	−4.30	20.40	22.70	−2.30	September	19.83	20.44	−.61	21.25	23.10	−1.85
April	[3] 23.25	[3] 23.34	−.09	[3] 23.02	21.08	+1.94	October	----------	----------	----------	----------	23.50	----------
May	23.16	21.84	+1.32	25.20	23.20	+2.00	November	----------	20.33	----------	----------	22.31	----------
June	22.38	22.38	[4]	24.38	23.62	+.76	December	----------	[2] 19.03	----------	----------	20.48	----------

[1] All weights.
[2] Shorn.
[3] Spring lambs.
[4] No change.

Source: Livestock Division, Agricultural Marketing Service, USDA. Prepared by OSC extension specialists in agricultural economic information.

TABLE 4.—Comparative production, availability, and prices for lamb and mutton, 1958 and 1959

[In percent]

	Difference in U.S. production 1959 versus 1958	Difference in total lamb and mutton available 1959 versus 1958 [1]	Theoretical price change		Actual price change [2]		Difference in U.S. production 1959 versus 1958	Difference in total lamb and mutton available 1959 versus 1958 [1]	Theoretical price change		Actual price change [2]
			Based on U.S. production change	Based on total change					Based on U.S. production change	Based on total change
January	+27.0	+33.0	−13.5	−16.5	−19.2	August	+6.0	+3.5	−3.0	−1.8	−2.8
February	+16.9	+17.7	−8.4	−8.9	−21.3	September	+12.7	+13.8	−6.3	−6.9	−5.5
March	+16.1	+21.3	−8.0	−10.6	−17.2	October	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------
April	−4.6	+10.9	+2.3	−5.4	+4.1	November	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------
May	−11.2	−10.1	+5.6	+5.1	+7.3	December	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------
June	[3]	+5.6	[3]	−2.8	+1.6
July	+9.1	+16.5	−4.5	−8.5	−5.9	Total	----------	----------	----------	----------	----------

[1] U.S. production plus imports.
[2] Simple average of Portland and Denver.
[3] No change.

THE DECLINE IN FAMILY SIZED FARM INCOME

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the master of the Washington State Grange, Mr. A. Lars Nelson, in an editorial entitled "Agriculture's Need: Bargaining Power," published December 11, 1959, in the Washington State Grange News, has stated with clarity a position upon the solution of the problems facing our farmer-citizens which deserves careful attention and, in my judgment, favorable acceptance.

Not only does Mr. Nelson put forth the legitimate claims of farmers persuasively; he bolsters his arguments by quotations from responsible labor union spokesmen, who have the best interests of agriculture at heart. He is, by implication, stressing a most important point. It is one that I have frequently made here upon the floor of the Senate. It is this: If we are to have a healthy and prosperous economy, it is necessary for us to provide an adequate economic reward to the family-size farm operators. The small farmer ought to have a parity of income with men and women engaged in other economic sectors of our population.

It is, I believe, undeniable that in recent years our farm families have subsidized, through low food costs, the expansion of the remainder of our economy. This cannot continue indefinitely, and it ought not to be tolerated further. I have said before, and I repeat it today, parity of income for the farmer at the farm gate rings the cash registers in the main streets of America. It would contribute to a high level of national income prosperity, which would enable labor to continue to have high wages while permitting investors a security of dividends.

We each are dependent upon the other. In the end we can either increase the level of goods and services available to each and every segment of our economy or we can expect to stand in grave danger of falling together into an era of unemployment and poverty. A static economy, like the floodtide, will surely ebb. Our economy must expand, and one of the best methods by which we can see to it that it does expand is to give to agricultural workers and the owners of family-sized farms returns on their work and their capital investments far better than those they now receive.

Mr. President, because of the importance of the subject matter, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial by Grange Master A. Lars Nelson, to which I have referred, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Grange News, Dec. 11, 1959]

AGRICULTURE'S NEED: BARGAINING POWER

Agriculture in our State and the Nation still produces in excess of need. Surpluses continue to pile up, prices in many instances are declining and the cost-price squeeze tightens as inflation continues to roll unabated.

So-called checks on inflation, such as increased discount rates and the hard money policy, have only intensified agriculture's woes. Now belatedly, businessmen and consumers are increasingly feeling the pinch. Surplus investors, Wall Street and commercial banks have never had it so good.

The farm parity rate which is opposed by some of the leaders and farm organization contemporaries is now at 75 percent compared with 82 percent in June 1959 and 85 percent in July 1958. How would agriculture compare its position economically with business and labor if it weren't for the parity yardstick? None of its opponents has suggested either a better device or a substitute for it, possibly because they would like to leave us in an indeterminate position.

Index of prices received by farmers was 242 percent of the 1909–14 base period in July 1959. On September 15, 1959 it stood at 239 percent. This same index was 250 percent a year ago. Net farm income is down from 9 to 17 percent, depending on who is making the estimate. Net realized farm income for the last three quarters of 1959 was running at the rate of $11.5 billion. A further decline in purchasing power, with continuing and increased inflation, are almost inevitable.

Despite these facts, agriculture has been tarred with a vicious brush. Those who have painted with tar or other clinging substances know how difficult it is to remove the substance and the stains. False impressions, half truths about agriculture, farm programs, subsidies, surplus bogies are equally difficult to correct once they have been enumerated by editorial writers, certain agricultural leaders and high placed officials.

The top spokesmen of the USDA recently said agriculture had never had it so good, with the highest per capita income in history of $1,027. Contrast this with a $2,040 average per capita income for nonfarm people. Realized net farm income per farm averaged $2,767; for Washington, $3,027.

Some months ago the editor of Successful Farming came to agriculture's defense. This editorial said that of the total Federal subsidies paid to all comers, farmers drew a measly 10 percent. If Public Law 480 were arbitrarily included it would reach 19 percent. Where did the remaining 90 or 81 percent go? I have no alternative but to assume that it went to industry, labor and commerce.

Could it be that an attack on agriculture was being used to bring drastic changes in agriculture—and perhaps also to direct attention away from what someone else was receiving willingly?

It might be appropriately asked, "How long or why should the American farmer continue to subsidize American consumers with continually lowering raw food prices at the farm gate when returns to industry and labor continue to spiral upward?"

Agriculture is determined that there must be an end to confusion induced in agriculture itself and about agriculture to its friends. The National Grange says, "We emphasize parity of income, not parity prices. Parity income should provide farmers a return for their labor, management, risk and investment in reasonable relation to that returned for other segments of the economy."

In a recent convention the AFL–CIO said, "We seek an American standard of living for farm proprietors who by their skill, labor and investment produce our food and fiber. In particular, we wish to aid the family operated farm through measures to increase its efficiency and its income, so that the independent farmer may efficiently compete with corporation farming and remain the predominant producer in American agriculture."

May industry and business soon be constrained to join in such an objective. To gain it, I believe every legitimate tool used by any other segment of the economy should be made available to agriculture. This means that we will need to employ marketing agreements and orders on a State, regional, and National basis. It means that enabling laws, not on the books, will have to be enacted to permit agricultural industries to control quality, quantity and negotiate for a price which provides cost of production plus a reasonable profit.

The National Grange at Long Beach said, "We believe that farmers are entitled to bargaining power comparable to that enjoyed by labor and business. Farmers are both. Through legislation, Government has helped develop the bargaining power of organized labor. Other Federal laws often enable business to regulate and control production and marketing of products and services. Government should provide the framework for producer-managed commodity marketing programs where necessary to enhance producer bargaining power and to deter accumulation of price depressing stocks in the hands of Government or other nonfarm groups."

I would remind all of us that the line between surplus and scarcity is a thin one. Our present surplus of all commodities taken together ranges between 4 and 6 percent of all production. Ray Reiman says the big problem 15 years from now may be scarcity instead of food surplus in 1975. According to Carroll Downey, USDA economist, farmers at that time, with a population estimated at 230 million, will need to produce 58 percent more beef and veal, 41 percent more pork, 40 percent more milk, 35 percent more eggs, 18 percent more poultry.

We must be aware of other trends, including expanded vertical integration. We should weigh carefully the Packing House Workers' warning: "Freeing the farmers from Government controls means that giant food processors and other corporations take over completely the job of control." Farmers have experienced less and less competition among buyers for their products. The price of eggs in New York City is determined by one man.

We in the Grange will continue to stress the commodity by commodity approach to self-help programs. We must and will continue to foster and defend the family type farms in order to provide for a stable rural America for the benefit of both urban and rural people.

FAITH AND SCIENCE—ADDRESS BY AMBASSADOR CARL W. STROM

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask that there also be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, an able address delivered by Ambassador Carl W. Strom, Ambassador of the United States of America to Bolivia, at the University of San Francisco in Bolivia.

Speaking as chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs of the Foreign Relations Committee, I wish to say a word about Ambassador Strom. I spent some time in Bolivia last November, and I take pleasure in saying, in behalf of Ambassador Strom and the personnel of our Embassy at La Paz, that here is a great Foreign Service officer, one who is performing a remarkable and dedicated job for the people of the United States.

Bolivia has been one of the trouble spots of Latin America so far as U.S. relationships are concerned. I found when I was there in November a great change of attitude, not only on the part of the people within the Bolivian Government, but I found it among the rank and file people of the country with whom I communicated. I think no little credit is due to Ambassador Strom and the work of our Embassy personnel.

As one reads the speech Ambassador Strom delivered in Bolivia, he sees ample evidence to justify the high commendation I have made of the Ambassador.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAITH AND SCIENCE

(Address delivered by Ambassador Carl W. Strom, Ambassador of the United States of America to Bolivia, at the Major Royal Pontifical University of San Francisco Xavier of Chuquisaca at Sucre, Bolivia, August 18, 1959)

It is a signal privilege to occupy the podium of this illustrious university, an institution consecrated to the pursuit of knowledge and the center from which radiated the vital ideas of the South American war of independence, ideas whose splendor illuminated and gave lustre to an entire epoch of the history of the continent.

The historic and outstanding role that the Major Royal and Pontifical University of San Francisco Xavier of Chuquisaca has played in the life of this Republic is not unknown to me. During the period of the viceroys, this cloister of science and thought was the center where the most important resolutions, of vast and profound influence in the political development of South America, were conceived, discussed and formulated. The ideas which, in the fire of debate, were born in these halls, kindling spirits and developing movements of public opinion, extended their sway beyond the lecture hall and the faculty to penetrate deeply into the consciousness of the people and to set the course for many generations of Americans. The most notable successes of that epoch whose influence transformed the structure of the society of the South American Continent has as their place of origin this most notable house of learning. The illustrious men who nourished their wisdom in these venerable halls and who achieved the highest positions in legal, literary, and social arenas went forth from this center to ennoble with their inspiration and erudition the thought of all America.

Graced by its learning and its doctrine throughout the colonial period, Chuquisaca continued to exercise its primacy in the Republic as the nation's capital. The fame of its university went beyond the frontiers of Bolivia to extend throughout the entire continent and to stamp it with culture and refinement.

As a citizen of the United States, I am proud to think that the democratic principles which the men of the University of Chuquisaca spread throughout the continent were inspired in part by the ideals of the leaders in the achievement of the Independence of the United States: George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and Thomas Jefferson, champions of our democracy. The inspiration, which in times past shaped for our people identical ideals of freedom and equality, today continues to find its expression in the solidarity and friendship which unite our two nations, because the ties between us had their origin in the similarity of our ideals and of our aspirations to achieve the material and spiritual greatness of our peoples.

If I were appearing before this distinguished assembly this evening primarily in my capacity as a diplomatic officer, representing my country and my President in your country, I should feel obliged to speak on some feature of international affairs. Such a political subject of general interest would be eminently appropriate since our two countries share the same objectives in international policy, especially in questions touching relations within the Western Hemisphere where we stand side by side in the effort to promote the solidarity of our Americas. This latter theme would be particularly fitting at a time like the present when the Ministers of Foreign Relations of our 21 sister Republics are assembled in the fair capital of one of them to discuss matters relating to our common, glorious destiny.

However, I should this evening like to explore with you other interests which I am sure we have in common, namely, the relation of faith and science. If you will pardon a personal reference, I may be permitted to explain my personal involvement in this problem. My father introduced me at an early age to the Bible and the classics with all their spiritual, moral, and esthetic values. When I started a career as a university teacher, I continued this early interest in classical studies by teaching classes in Greek grammar and literature, including the Greek New Testament. However, mathematics displaced the classics as my main field of interest as I progressed in my university career and I specialized in pure and applied mathematics, with special emphasis on algebra, geometry, and theoretical mechanics. I started my work as a university teacher with the idea that it should be my life work but after 16 years I entered the Foreign Service of the United States and now for 24 years I have served my country as a consular and diplomatic officer in 12 foreign countries and in Washington.

However, during these 24 years I have retained a lively interest in the spiritual and esthetic values that are inherent in religion and in the classics as well as a firm conviction concerning the integrity of the sciences with respect to the things they teach us about the nature of the physical universe around us. It is with this background of 40 years of interest in two fields of major importance to the intellectual community that I venture to address you this evening. I do not flatter myself that I shall be bringing new information to this learned audience. Everything I shall have to say will certainly be unknown to some among you and some will probably be familiar with all the facts I shall present. At most, I shall hope to be able to demonstrate a relationship among these facts, that may be new to some of you and may lead you to new conclusions or at least stimulate you to further thought. It is with this modest objective that I ask as the basis of my discussion the question, "Is there room for faith in the modern world of science?"

The dictionary defines faith as "Unquestioned acknowledgment of the existence of a Supreme Being and the reality of a divine order." The definition given in the Bible in the Epistle to the Hebrews is "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Faith is therefore a concept that belongs entirely to the world of the spirit. My question is whether or not there is room for such a concept as faith in a civilization characterized by scientific concepts whose nature is primarily materialistic.

The background of my question is twofold. It is first of all the tremendous expansion of scientific knowledge that has taken place during the era that was ushered in by the researches of Galileo in the 17th century. It is secondly the emergence during the latter part of this era of a new force that claims the allegiance of millions and which asserts with religious fervor that life contains no spiritual values; that all of life can be explained in terms of matter and motion; and that faith is a delusion of weak minds that do not have the courage to face boldly the force of the material universe.

Among the early achievements of the new age whose precursor was Galileo were Newton's announcements of his laws of motion and gravitation. These are so familiar to us now that it is difficult in looking back to realize what fundamental changes they caused in science and, later, in philosophy. Together with the simultaneous discovery of the differential and integral calculus, they gave men of science hitherto unknown tools for observing and studying physical phenomena. Before the time of Newton, knowledge of a physical phenomenon was limited to what could be learned from actual observation. The methods of analysis provided by the calculus made it possible to extend the results of observation beyond the interval in which data were collected. For the first time in history, scientists were enabled to predict the course of a phenomenon beyond the period during which its period was actually observed. In effect, Newton's discoveries gave scientists the gift of prophecy.

This gift of prophecy had most important consequences for the philosophers. In every age philosophic thought has had to accommodate itself to the observed facts of science as they were known at the time. The results that were obtainable by the use of Newton's discoveries gripped the imagination of the philosophers. To cite a simple example, it was very easy to observe and describe the flight of a lead ball, which was dropped from an altitude of 150 feet. But Newton's laws enabled the scientist to describe with a high degree of accuracy how the ball would fall if dropped from 10,000 feet or from any other altitude. Spectacular results were achieved by the application of Newton's laws, among the most notable of which was the discovery of the planet Neptune in 1846. For years it had been possible to predict the position of the inner planets with precision. However, Uranus, the outermost one that was known at that time behaved in an eccentric fashion. Sometimes it arrived at a given position in its orbit at the time predicted but at other times it was either early or late. It was reasoned that there must be some unknown planet in the solar system beyond Uranus which was affecting its movements. Unknown to each other, an English mathematician, Adams, and a Frenchman, Leverrier, attacked this problem as an exercise in pure mathematics. Neither one knew that the other was working on it but they arrived at the same result at about the same time. Leverrier wrote to an astronomer friend of his in Berlin saying that he would find a new planet if he would direct his telescope at a certain point in the sky at a stated time. The planet was found at almost exactly the point predicted by Leverrier. Subsequent observations have shown that Leverrier and Adams both not only predicted where this unknown planet would be found, but, before anyone had ever seen it, they described its size, its mass, its orbit, and its velocity in its orbit, all with a very high degree of accuracy.

Newton stated his laws of motion and of gravitation for particles of matter and Leverrier and Adams treated Neptune as a particle in making their calculations. They demonstrated in a sensational manner the ability of the scientist to predict the future course of a particle under certain conditions. It was an easy assumption that an equation is associated with every particle in nature and that the future behavior of the particle could be predicted if its equation was known.

The next step in the reasoning was that man's body is made up of particles, each of which has its equation. It was reasoned further that a given man's future could be predicted, given a master mathematician capable of writing down the equations of all the particles that make up his body and solving these equations simultaneously. It was freely admitted that there were obstacles in the way of writing down the large number of equations that would be required and of solving them, but it was held that the obstacles were all of a practical kind. Theoretically, the equations could be written and solved and their solutions would reveal what was going to happen to the man in question in the future. This reasoning led to the conclusion that a man's future is determined entirely by his present State. It left no room for such a thing as free will and it ruled out completely such a thing as faith or the directing hand of God. It led to a deterministic philosophy and a materialistic conception of the universe. In spite of the practical difficulties involved in applying the reasoning to a specific person, the reasoning itself was considered unassailable and determinism held sway in many circles throughout the 19th century and the first quarter of this one. Materialism was not a new concept, but the results achieved from the application of Newton's discoveries to an ever-increasing variety of physical phenomena gave the doctrine vastly increased authority.

We now come to the second part of the background of my theme question, namely, the emergence of a new, materialistic force in our world. When Karl Marx was composing the dogma on which modern communism rests, he found this deterministic and materialistic view of the universe ideally suited to his purpose. Stalin was for many years the spokesman for international communism. In his "Problems of Leninism," which was published in Moscow in 1953, he wrote:

"Dialectical materialism is the world outlook of the Marxist-Leninist Party. It is called dialectical materialism because its approach to the phenomena of nature, its methods of studying and apprehending them, is dialectical, while its interpretation of the phenomena of nature, its conception of these phenomena, its theory, is materialistic."

The main elements of this materialistic view of nature are succinctly set forth in a recent glossary of terms associated with communism, as follows: (1) Matter is the basic reality and God does not exist; (2) the universe and all life in it can be explained in terms of motion and matter; (3) human values should center around material considerations, sensations, and pleasures; and (4) the interpretation of human history must rest on material elements.

The incorporation of the materialistic, deterministic view of the world into communistic dogma makes it of the greatest importance to examine how the philosophy of determinism has fared in the light of most recent scientific knowledge. Since the lives of nearly 1 billion inhabitants of the earth are governed by Communist dogma, it is a vital matter for every thinking human being to decide in his own mind whether or not the theoretical basis of communism is tenable in this modern world of science.

Discoveries made during the last 30 years have given us a most profound insight into this problem.

A little over 30 years ago the German mathematical physicist, Werner Heisenberg, published his "Principle of Uncertainty." Heisenberg showed that the application of Newton's laws of motion to the elementary particles with which modern mathematical physics deals involves entirely different problems from their application to particles of discrete magnitude with which the calculations of classical physics had were concerned. Heisenberg's theory does not question our ability to write the equations that describe the course of many physical phenomena. However, when the particles involved in a phenomenon have the magnitude of electrons, protons, neutrons, etc., a situation arises that was not encountered in classical physics.

A complete discussion of this problem would be long and difficult. However, the crux of the situation is the fact that no prediction can be made about the future course of any particle unless its position and velocity are both known at some specific time. This is strictly in accordance with what has long been known about classical mechanics. It is easy to do this when the particle is, for example, a rifle bullet. Numerous methods of making observations of the flight of the bullet are available and its position and velocity at a starting time and starting place are determined without much difficulty. The apparatus for making the required observations may employ light or it may depend on an electrical mechanism. Electricity is, of course, a form of energy and light is known now to be a form of energy also. The important thing is that no matter how the apparatus is constructed, it works by impinging some form of energy on the particle. The mass of the bullet is so great in comparison with the amount of energy that is required to determine the starting position and velocity that the observations do not affect the flight of the bullet within the limits of our ability to observe it.

However, an entirely different situation arises when the particle involved is an electron or one of the other ultimate particles of matter and this is the point that was overlooked in formulating the philosophy of materialism. The smallest amount of energy that can be made to impinge on an electron is a photon of light and its energy is comparable in magnitude to the energy of an electron. Hence, it is impossible to observe the position and velocity of an electron at a given time without changing one or the other. In an article published in the Saturday Review of Literature on January 3, 1959, the distinguished American mathematician, Warren Weaver, makes a very graphic exposition of the situation. He says that the scientist is able to ask the electron, "Where are you?" The electron can reply, "Here I am" but the energy expended in making the reply changes the electron's position. Dr. Weaver adds that it would not be misleading to say that what happens is a little like asking questions of an exceedingly delicate and sick person through a crack in the door to his room in the hospital. You call in, "How are you?" He answers, "OK." But, if he is very weak, indeed the effort of making that answer may result in his death, so that the reply completely and automatically invalidates its own meaning. Dr. Weaver continues by saying that when a physicist asks an electron, "Where are you?", the electron replies but the effort of replying always moves the electron—and unpredictably—into a new location so that the answer is automatically invalidated.

The practical difficulty of solving simultaneously a very large number of equations, each one describing the motion of a particle in a man's body, which we noted in the basis of deterministic or materialistic philosophy, is, therefore, not only a practical difficulty but a theoretical one as well. It is not even theoretically possible to carry out the calculations on which determinism as a philosophy is based and from which resulted a materialistic view of life. A man's future course cannot be determined from his past. Heisenberg's Principle of Uncertainty has completely destroyed the scientific basis on which determinism rested. It has, moreover, provided room for free will and for spiritual elements.

More recent discoveries in mathematics have supported this conclusion. All of you have been accustomed to hearing all your lives that, whatever weaknesses other scientific theory may have, mathematics is one field in which everything is certainly either true or not true. Three or four years ago the Hungarian mathematician, Kurt Gödel, shattered even this citadel of certainty by the publication of certain results that have become known as Gödel's theorem.

An understanding of the proof of Gödel's theorem requires a very considerable degree of mathematical sophistication. However, it is not very difficult to explain his results. To do this let me take you back to your school days when you first approached the study of Euclid's Elements of Geometry.

Geometry brought many new concepts into the range of the knowledge of all of us, the most novel of which was probably the concept of the axiom. We were next introduced to Aristotle's method of reasoning with the use of the syllogisms, which incidentally played such an important role in the philosophical speculations of the authors of independence at the University of Chuquisaca. This method of reasoning, known as the deductive method, enabled us to derive new results, called theorems, from our axioms. We learned to define geometry as the collection of theorems that could be derived from our axioms by means of Aristotle's rules of logic.

Euclid was one of the great intellectual giants of the ages and for centuries his system of geometry was regarded as a unique creation. However, in more recent years it was discovered that Euclid's set of axioms was not the only one on which a mathematical system could be based. In fact very many sets of axioms were presented by mathematicians from which theorems could be derived by the use of Aristotle's rules of logic. Each new set of axioms together with its theorems was a new mathematical system.

As mathematical systems proliferated, axioms themselves became the object of intensive study and certain conditions were laid down to which a set of axioms would have to conform if it was to form the basis for a mathematical system. This intensive study of the axiomatic method, originally invented by Euclid, fortified the conviction of mathematicians that a set af axioms that satisfied the conditions that had been established furnished a sure and secure foundation for the development of a mathematical system. the result was to strengthen the conviction, so long held not open to question, that mathematics is the one science in which everything is either true or false; that is, in which there is no element of uncertainty. However, Gödel's Theorem has changed all this.

One of the conditions to which a set of mathematical axioms must obviously conform is that the axioms must be consistent; that is, one axiom may not contradict another one of the same set. The necessity of this condition is clear. Obviously, a set of axioms that contains a contradiction within itself cannot be useful in a mathematical sense. It has been assumed for over 2,500 years that Euclid's axioms were consistent, the one with the other, and the same has been assumed about many other sets of axioms.

However, quoting Dr. Weaver again, Gödel obtained two results, each of which is of the most massive importance. He proved first of all that it is impossible—theoretically impossible and not just unreasonably difficult—to prove the consistency of any set of axioms which is, so to speak, rich enough in content to be interesting. The question, "Is there an inner flaw in the system," is a question which is simply unanswerable.

All our lives we have made use of an infinity of results derived from Euclid's axioms. They have been useful and are still useful. They have not been vitiated by this first portion of Gödel's Theorem. Euclid's axioms may be consistent. The point is that there is an element in the proof of their consistency (or lack of consistency as the case may be) that is beyond man's intellectual powers. Hence far from being able to explain the universe in terms of matter and motion, as the dialectical materialism of communism asserts, we are not even able to establish the consistency of the theoretical foundation on which all our studies of matter and motion rest.

Gödel's second result is even more startling than the first one. To quote Dr. Weaver once more, Gödel proved that any deductive logical system has a great limitation. Such a system is essentially incomplete. Within the system it is always possible to ask questions that are undecidable, again, not just unreasonably difficult to decide but actually and definitely impossible to decide.

This portion of Gödel's Theorem puts an entirely new light on the science which has always been considered not to admit of any uncertainty. There are many questions in mathematics that have been unreasonably difficult to decide and which have, in the course of time, been decided. The question of how to construct a square equal in area to a given circle was such a one as well as the question of how to trisect an angle using only ruler and compass. These questions are familiar to every schoolboy. For centuries it proved impossible to answer either one of them but as mathematical knowledge expanded and new methods were invented, both were answered in the negative.

In a certain sense, the answers were unsatisfactory. When we ask a question concerning a construction in mathematics we like to obtain an answer in the form, "Yes, you do the construction as follows." In the two examples I have just given, the answers were, "The construction is impossible" but the answers were found. However, many similar questions remain unanswered and, until Gödell published his theorem, it was assumed that they all had answers also; that the problems represented by the questions could all be solved or that they could be proved impossible to solve. We now know that among these unanswered questions there are some that will never be answered since they belong to the area of mathematical uncertainty where answers do not exist. You ask me to give you an example of such a question. I can only speculate on this point, since it is obviously difficult to distinguish between questions that are unanswerable and those that have merely not yet been answered. However, I can cite the following problem as one which probably belongs to the category of unsolvable ones.

You are all familiar with the definition of a prime number, namely a number which has no divisors except itself and one. In one of the most brilliant pieces of mathematical reasoning on record Euclid proved over two and a half thousand years ago that the number of prime numbers is infinite.

It was noticed at a very early age in the history of mathematics that some prime numbers are separated by a single even number, for example, 1 and 3, 3 and 5, 11 and 13, 17 and 19, 29 and 31, and so forth. These primes have been given the name, "prime pairs." After Euclid proved that the number of primes was infinite, the question naturally arose as to whether or not the number of prime pairs was also infinite. An enormous amount of the time and energy of countless mathematicians has gone into this question for over 2,000 years and so far no one has even discovered any promising method of taking hold of the problem. The problem is, of course, of no practical importance whatsoever. It has been to the mathematicians what Mount Everest was to the mountain climbers. Everest represented a challenge until it had been climbed. In the same way this question concerning prime pairs represented a challenge to mathematicians. Until Gödel published his theorem, it was assumed that the question must have an answer, either yes or no. It is now realized that it probably belongs to the category of questions whose existence was proved by Gödel and which simply do not have answers.

The result of Gödel's theorem is, therefore, the same as that of Heisenberg's principle of uncertainty. Both of them tell us that there is a definite limit to what we can learn about the physical universe. There is a paradox here and possibly the most extraordinary paradox of all history. The paradox is that useful results can be obtained from the study of the average behavior of very large numbers of very small particles without any knowledge of how any single particle will behave. Using the theory of probability, the scientist can assure himself that enough neutrons to support a chain reaction will impinge on a given body of uranium whose mass exceeds the critical size. However, he has no way of determining whether a given neutron will collide with any atom of uranium. In fact far from being able to predict that a given neutron will have a collision, he has no way of determining even where it is at any time. We can go even further and say that it really does not make any sense to speak of a given neutron, since it surely makes no sense to speak of a given object if one will forever be unable to present it for inspection.

Dialectical materialism asserts that the whole universe can be explained in terms of motion and matter whereas modern science states that we can make no assertions at all concerning the motion of individual particles of matter. In fact, modern science shows us that in a period in which we have been expanding our knowledge of the behavior of physical phenomena almost infinitely, we have been forced to the startling conclusion that we have no hope of eventually acquiring an understanding of objective reality. Communism has made a god of science but science has now betrayed those who have committed indolatry in its name. Dialectical materialism is therefore not only bankrupt; it is obsolete. Scientifically, it has been lost behind the advancing front of knowledge and its intellectual foundation has been destroyed beyond all hope of reconstruction.

I might pursue the consequences of this conclusion at great length but I fear I would try your patience unduly if I spoke much longer. However, you may well ask what communism has become now that it has been robbed of its philosophical basis. The answer is given in eloquent terms by one who once rode the crest of the Communist wave but who has seen its fallacy and incurred the mortal danger of testifying against it. I refer to the former Vice President of Yugoslavia, Milovan Djilas, who gave his witness in his notable book, "The New Class." Djilas points out that communism has lost whatever idealistic motivation it may once have had. Karl Marx's doctrine of dialectical materialism is used at present merely to conceal the opportunism of a new ruling class which, endowed with unlimited and autocratic authority, is more imperialistic in its designs than any system has ever been in the history of the world.

To conclude these reflections on the theme of "Faith and Science," I return to my original question, "Is there room for faith in the modern world of science." We have seen that the answer to this question is a resounding "Yes."

As the light was dawning over Ancient Greece, Homer wrote in the Odyssey, "All men have need of the gods." Throughout the history of mankind, men have believed intuitively that there are two factors in life, the material which we can see and the spiritual which we cannot grasp with our physical senses. Man's conscience testifies that man is responsible to a higher power outside himself. In these latter days, science has added its testimony that "man does not live by bread alone."

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I turn now to the subject matter before the Senate, and would like to have the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] for just a very few moments, because I want to put certain questions to him.

First, Mr. President, I wish to say that I support the Hennings-Keating amendment. I have taken this position for years here in the Senate. It will be found in the so-called clean elections bill Senate bill 466, which I cosponsored last year with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. It, too, included jurisdiction over primary elections.

In speeches which I have made on several occasions in the Senate in the past, Mr. President, I have expressed the view that we will never get anywhere, in my judgment, in cleaning up elections in the United States—and they sorely need it—until the Federal Government takes jurisdiction over primary elections involving the election of Federal officials.

In the past, as today, I have based much of my argument on this tenet, Mr. President, which I repeat, that in a democracy there is no substitute for full public disclosure of the people's business. Now, one can make that a cliche. One can make that a politician's glittering generality, or one can breathe meaning into it. It is a principle of Government, and, in my judgment, the Congress of the United States should both protect and implement it.

I repeat, Mr. President: There is no substitute in a democracy for public disclosure of the people's business. And the election of Federal elected officers is the people's business. Their election does not take place only in a general election. We have to face a reality. The reality is that the condition precedent which determines, in the last analysis, who is going to be elected, is in the primary elections in many States. And, so far as I am concerned, I wish every State had a primary.

NO CONFLICT WITH STATE JURISDICTION

Mr. President, I come from a State which I suppose is considered to be among those with the purest of primary election laws, in the sense that it has wide open election laws. But those laws still have their shortcomings.

As one who comes from a primary election State, may I say to the Senator from Missouri and to my colleagues in the Senate, I see no interference at all with States' rights in connection with the Hennings-Keating amendment. To the contrary, I think the Federal Government has a clear duty to exercise jurisdiction over every step of the election process which finally results in sending a Federal official to the Congress of the United States or the White House.

I also enunciate, or repeat, another tenet I have been heard to express before, probably to the point of boredom.

Nevertheless I think it is important to repeat these immutable principles of democratic government from time to time as one makes a plea for their protection and their implementation. I have been heard to say many times that no man sits in the Senate of the United States from his State for his State. I know many do not share my point of view in regard to this tenet.

Mr. President, my study of the history of our Government, my teaching of the constitutional debates, my analysis of what the constitutional fathers definitely had in mind, and I think said so very definitely when they set up the Senate of the United States, establish that a man is elected from his State to the Senate of the United States for the Nation.

Therefore, Mr. President, I say most respectfully, that, in my judgment, placing the Nation first, recognizing that which is best for the Nation, must necessarily be best for each individual State.

The Federal Government has an obligation to see to it that the procedures adopted for the election of Senators and other elected Federal officials are procedures that can withstand public scrutiny; and the only way we can give assurance of that is to adopt a principle of full public disclosure.

I turn now to the fourth general principle. I want to repeat it, although Senators have heard me say it before, to the point of boredom, I am sure. It is directly applicable in this case.

In the matter of the election of officials, the substantive results will be dependent upon the procedures we adopt which lead to the substantive results. The kind of men elected, the final result of the election, cannot escape that irrefutable logic line of reasoning. We will get no better men than the procedures by which we elect them, by and large.

With those four general principles as sort of an introduction to the remarks I desire to make, I now proceed to apply the principles in terms of certain questions which I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri. First, however, I think the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] wants me to yield for a moment.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Oregon. I embrace this opportunity to state that I shall vote for the Hennings amendment.

I think it is important for us to realize that the Senate and the House of Representatives, with the concurrence of the President, placed upon the statute books in the last session the reporting and disclosure law affecting the labor unions of this country. It seems to me, in line with the purpose of the Congress of the United States in that legislation calling for reporting at the local level that Members of this body should vote for this meritorious proposal. We should be willing to do that which we have required of other citizens and their organizations, The primary is an integral process in the election of a Senator in all but a few States.

Mr. MORSE. I am glad the Senator from West Virginia has raised that point. That was to be covered in one of the questions I was going to ask. It was not to be my first question, but I will make it my first question, so that there will be a continuity of discussion and argument on the floor of the Senate, in view of the point the Senator from West Virginia has made.

My first question to the Senator from Missouri is this: It is true, is it not, that the Federal Government, in the Taft-Hartley law, has proceded to exercise some jurisdiction over elections in the several States by including a prohibition against the expenditure of any union funds in any Federal election in any State?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to have the assurance of my old friend, with whom I served in the House of Representatives in the 1930's, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, that he will vote to support the amendment.

I am equally glad that the able Senator from Oregon, who is one of the best lawyers and students of the Constitution in this body, has undertaken to address himself to this problem and is also supporting the amendment. Some of us have been working in terms of reforming elections procedures for something like 7 years. In my case it has been 6 years of hard work and experience as a member of the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, and during part of that time I have been chairman of the subcommittee and have conducted and been a part of inquiries relating to senatorial elections.

Anyone who has had that experience, anyone who has studied the problem, anyone who understands the basic elements, which are, indeed, very simple, can come to but one honest conclusion, in my own judgment, which is that the present law, the so-called Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, is absurd, ridiculous, without meaning, and utterly impotent as it affects modern-day elections and campaign practices.

To turn to the interrogation of the distinguished Senator, yesterday, as shown at page 636 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I made this statement:

> It has also been argued that it would be a paradox if primaries had to be conducted under both State law and Federal law. If such is a paradox, that paradox exists today, because under existing law, the Corrupt Practices Act, the Hatch Act, and other Federal statutes control phases of general elections. However, each State also has laws controlling who can vote and where. Even in primary elections today we have dual control. Certainly, the Taft-Hartley Act, relating to contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations, is the law pervasive throughout all States of the Union.

I then asked unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD section 610, title 18, of the United States Code, relating to contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations. The Senator will find that set out fully at page 636 of the RECORD.

So, in answer to the Senator's question, of course, it is palpably true, beyond cavil, that we do undertake to regulate primaries in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator very much. I did not hear his discussion yesterday afternoon because I spent the entire afternoon in an executive session of the Committee on Foreign Relations, where we listened to Mr. Allen Dulles give us a very valuable report.

Mr. HENNINGS. I have long appreciated the Senator's interest in the type of legislation represented by the pending bill, and his ideas and suggestions with respect to it. The Senator, with others, has been in the forefront and has been one of the foremost advocates of truth telling, not only about general elections, but also about primary elections.

The Senator knows full well there is no good reason why the people should not know about the sources of moneys and the amounts contributed in primary elections. Why should the Senate not take some moral leadership in this matter? We are very pious about a great many things. We are, indeed, very self-righteous about a great many things. I have heard many, in sonorous voice, intone that this is the greatest deliberative body in the world. Why cannot we be more honest in matters as simple as this? There is nothing complicated about it. The constitutional provision is clear and unequivocal.

The Landmark case, United States against Classic, in 1941, is clear and unequivocal.

I feel that I am repeating myself constantly in this debate, since this is now the third day we have been discussing one amendment.

As the Senator and others who are legal scholars and who have directed their attention to matters relating to elections cases know, there are innumerable cases contained in the books which I have heretofore mentioned a good many times and from which I have read time and again. There are presented various cases which have occurred throughout the country. I refer to the Senate elections cases, 1913 to 1940, which is an official document of the Senate.

I do not like to single out any one section of the country, but we know that there is great resistance to the primary provision in the South, where nomination means election. We need not elaborate upon that point. It is very evident and obvious, so it does not require any statistical data.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have the floor, I will say to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. MORSE. I shall be glad to accommodate the Senator from South Dakota if he will permit me a moment to reply to the Senator from Missouri. I want to assure my friend from South Dakota that as soon as I get through with a brief commentary I shall yield to him.

I will say to the Senator from Missouri that he has saved me a great deal of time, because the very points he has made, without exception, with one or two others which I shall now make, are points which I had prepared to make.

My position can be summarized by saying that in my judgment there is no question whatever about the legal authority of the Federal Government to lay down rules, regulations, and procedures for the conduct of primaries in respect to the election of Federal officials.

The cases which have been set forth in this debate make it very clear that the Supreme Court has ruled that the jurisdiction of the Federal Government goes to the grass roots, so to speak, in connection with any phase of a Federal election. A primary election for a Federal office is, in that sense, a Federal election.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, another way of putting it is that it is a part of the electoral process.

Mr. MORSE. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. The primary and the general election are both parts of the electoral process.

Mr. MORSE. The next point I was prepared to make, and which the Senator has made even better than I could, is the point in regard to the degree to which we have laid down, in both the Taft-Hartley Act and the Hatch Act, rules and regulations in connection with elections held within the State. There is no question about their legality. There is no question about the fact that the courts have sustained those provisions, which, again, is reinforcement of the proposition so ably made by the Senator from Missouri, that the Federal Government has jurisdiction.

SENATE CONSIDERS PRIMARIES IN JUDGING CONTESTED SEATS

The third point I was prepared to make has been alluded to by the Senator from Missouri without reference to specific cases. He has made use of the same reference work which I used in the preparation of my remarks, namely, the book which is on the Senator's desk, which gives us an analysis of the contested election cases upon which the Senate has acted in connection with candidates who sought to be seated. The Senate itself had no hesitancy in passing judgment on whether or not they should be seated, or in going into great detail regarding what happened in their primary campaigns.

Mr. HENNINGS. If the Senator will yield for a further observation, it is exceedingly interesting, I think, to note that the first two cases in this compilation, extending from 1913 to 1940, are cases from Alabama.

Among the last cases in the same volume are Heflin against Bankhead, another case from Alabama, in connection with which it was said by some that there should be no regulation of primaries—I do not refer to present Senators, because I do not know how they intend to vote on this amendment—and the case of Pritchard against Bailey, in North Carolina. Another case related to Senators from Louisiana.

Next, from the State of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, comes the case of Hatfield against Holt, which I am sure he remembers, although he is from a border State, as it is commonly described.

The point I seek to make is that representatives of the Southern States who have sought election to this body have brought contests before the then Committee on Privileges and Elections, which was a standing committee of the Senate before the Reorganization Act, and have submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of a standing committee of the Senate. How can they now be heard to say that, after all, the Senate has no jurisdiction over primaries, when the Taft-Hartley Act was not challenged upon that basis; when the case of United States against Classic defines a primary as an inherent and integral part of the electoral process, and when we have a large body of precedents embraced in the book to which the learned Senator from South Dakota referred yesterday, cases in which the Senate was asked to pass upon matters relating to primaries? It seems to me that we cannot have it both ways. There is some virtue in consistency, even among lawyers and Members of the Senate.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, before I yield to the Senator from South Dakota, I wish to summarize my position on the point which the Senator from Missouri has developed at greater length than I had intended to develop it.

On various occasions the Senate recognized its responsibilities in regard to doing what it could to protect the voters from corrupt practices in elections which involved primary races, because we have taken jurisdiction in the Senate over contested cases which involved corruption in primary elections as well as in general elections—and in some instances in both.

Mr. HENNINGS. The able Senator is eminently correct.

Mr. MORSE. If the Senate is to do that—and it should—we have the further duty of adopting procedures which will afford a greater inducement to honesty in the conduct of elections. After all, one of the reasons we enact laws is to help to make it easier for people to be more honest. We have a tendency to take the attitude that we are passing laws to catch crooks, but there is a therapeutic purpose for laws, too. That purpose is to provide legal procedures which make it easier for people, with all the human frailties which tempt us all, to be more honest. I do not believe that we should wait to sit in judgment until some wayward brother goes wrong. Our purpose should be to keep politicians honest.

Mr. HENNINGS. We do not necessarily sit in judgment only whenever, as the Senator has put it, a wayward brother goes wrong. We are compelled to sit in judgment when his opponent, or others in a given State, ask the Senate to take jurisdiction. The Senate must then determine, through its committee, which makes recommendations to the Senate, what the facts and circumstances are in a given primary election or general election.

Mr. MORSE. We do sit in judgment as to what the candidate did.

Mr. HENNINGS. We do, indeed.

Mr. MORSE. Let me say that, in all fairness, we should provide election procedures which will be preventive of the kind of conduct we all deplore when it is brought to light in some of the contested cases.

I now yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, the questions which I had in mind to ask have largely been answered, so far as the attitude expressed by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Missouri is concerned. However, for purposes of emphasis, I shall ask some of the questions I had in mind.

First, is it not true that the contested cases which have offended the Senate the most, and in which it has made some of its sharpest pronouncements, have been those in which the offenses to decency occurred in the primary rather than in the general election?

Mr. MORSE. The answer is "Yes."

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am thinking of cases which have embarrassed the Republican Party—for example, the Newberry case in Michigan, the Vare case in Pennsylvania, and the Smith case in Illinois. Those were all rather celebrated cases in their day.

Mr. HENNINGS. They are three of the most celebrated cases in the volume we have been discussing.

Mr. MORSE. I have that point in my manuscript, and it deals with the three cases which involved corruption in primary elections.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The other day when I was making some remarks on the floor on this subject I had the book, "Election Cases," by Hays, before me. That is the document to which the Senator from Missouri is alluding. I read some of the excerpts relative to those cases. That is the point I was seeking to make. I was doing it from the standpoint of my being a Republican.

I believe the Republican Party, as well as the country, would have been the beneficiary had we had on the statute books a law such as is being proposed now, which would have made contributions in those cases subject to being reported and subject to being made public. Had we had such a law in existence at that time, and had the committees which were set up—not necessarily the individuals involved—been warned about the requirement to make public all contributions received by them, and had they been under the limitations which are proposed in the pending bill, is it not possible that the country and the Republican Party would have been spared the embarrassment in those cases which later had to be experienced?

Mr. MORSE. I do not believe there is any doubt that such a law would have been a preventive measure, and probably would have prevented the kind of conduct that was brought out in those cases.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. In some of those cases the point was not that the law had been violated, but that the sense of what was proper was violated. One of the cases from which I read the other day had to do with an editorial written by Arthur Vandenberg. He was then the editor of a newspaper in Michigan. He was disturbed, and wrote a letter to the then candidate for the Senate, Commander Newberry, and said that he found it difficult to accept some of the things that were going on. That was in August, before the election. It had to do with some expenses in the primary contest between Henry Ford and Newberry. No one today would challenge my belief that Arthur Vandenberg was truly one of the great Senators of the United States. If in August of the year of the Newberry-Ford election he felt that the sense of what was proper was being violated, although not necessarily that anything illegal was being done, it would have been fortunate for the Republican Party in Michigan, and fortunate for the whole country, had we been spared the embarrassment that came with the disclosure of some of the actions of committees supporting Mr. Newberry with respect to exorbitant expenditures.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator from South Dakota for his contribution to the debate. It has been constructive and in my opinion is unanswerable. I am not only going to vote for the Hennings amendment, but I also intend to vote for the Hennings bill. I should like to see a better bill enacted. I should like to have a bill which would do more than the pending bill, and I know the Senator from Missouri would also like to see that kind of bill enacted.

Mr. HENNINGS. There are three additional amendments I intend to propose.

Mr. MORSE. As I understand those amendments, I will support them. I believe the present bill is a constructive first step down the road of cleaning up modern elections that must be walked by those in positions of responsibility in Congress and in the White House, and we ought to take that journey just as fast as we can.

However, I am convinced from my discussion with my colleagues that the bill is probably as far as we have a good chance of going at this time. This involves no compromise of principle at all, because everything we are proposing is something that ought to be adopted. The fact that other things I would like to see adopted are not included in the bill offers no reason why I should not vote for the bill in the form in which it is proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

FULL DISCLOSURE OF PERSONAL FINANCES ALSO NEEDED

The record should show that I believe all expenditures by all groups in connection with Federal elections ought to be public knowledge, and ought to be public knowledge before election day. As the Senate knows, I think the finances of politicians even after they are in office should be a matter of public knowledge. That is why there is pending before the Senate, and has been year after year since 1947, I believe, my proposal for a full public disclosure of sources and amounts of income of Members of Congress and of people holding high Federal office.

However, we cannot cover that point in the pending bill. I do wish the record to show that I believe we must proceed as rapidly as we can to a full public disclosure of all sources of political contributions to a candidate's campaign, both in the primary and in the general election, and require that the information be published at least 10 days before the election.

ALL COLLECTIONS SHOULD BE REPORTED

We do have a gimmick—I believe that is a correct description of it—in the present Corrupt Practices Act. I call it a gimmick because it really is a matter of form without very much substance. It is the requirement that a candidate for the Senate must file with the Secretary of the Senate 10 days before the election a list of the contributions which he has personally received and the expenditures which he has personally made.

Mr. President, that is practically a worthless provision. In fact, I wish to say that there are many sections of the Corrupt Practices Law—and this is one of them—which really in practice function as an inducement for various types of—to use a polite term—evasion, although I think a more ugly and accurate and proper term would be "practices of deception."

However, let us consider the little gimmick I have mentioned. A candidate files with the Secretary of the Senate 10 days before a general election the amounts of contributions he has received as a candidate, and his expenditures. We know that in practice they do not include any money the candidate has spent for travel and meals and hotels and personal contributions. Then, too, it includes only the amount of money that was handed to him personally, and that he accepted personally.

What happens as a matter of practice?

The public ought to be told that candidates just do not take the money. That is the general practice of candidates for the Senate. I will limit myself to the Senate, but that is true of the whole Congress. The general practice is that a candidate running for the Senate does not take the money. It is received by one or more of the finance committees.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. We may find a finance committee set up in each county, in each city, and sometimes in each ward. There can be a whole host of finance committees. The money they receive and the money they spend need not be reported under this section of the Corrupt Practices Act. I ask the question: "Really, now, is that not a form of deception?" I ask, "Is that not a device to keep undisclosed from the public the public's business?"

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. The next amendment, following the pending one, would undertake to make provision for the money received by committees, the fund collecting committees, set up within a State for the purpose of accepting contributions and evading and avoiding and dodging the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925.

Mr. MORSE. As the Senator knows, that provision was in his bill of last year, which I was proud to cosponsor.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is correct; it was indeed.

Mr. MORSE. Let us see the way in which the present Corrupt Practices Act really operates. I have a good sense of humor about it. I wish to tell very briefly the embarrassing position I found myself in in 1950 as a candidate for the Senate. Like all my campaigns, it was not an easy one. I was speaking many times each day, campaigning as hard as I could, and leaving the matter of campaign details to the administration of my central campaign office. One day one of my assistants called me on the phone when I was campaigning on the coast of Oregon and said, "We are already behind in this matter of filing the report with the Senate, unless we can get the report into the mail by midnight and send it by airmail, and get a ruling that if we get it in the mail by midnight it will be considered by the Secretary of the Senate as complying with the law."

A long-distance call was made to the Secretary of the Senate, and my plight was described to him. It was agreed that if I could get the affidavit in the mail by midnight, it would be all right, and that I would at least have met the spirit of the law, although I was in some doubt as to whether it was meeting the letter of the law.

So my assistant, with a notary public, arrived at my speech meeting that night. I thought that would be a good opportunity to do a little political educating of that audience. So in the presence of the audience, I signed and swore to the affidavit and to the accounting which had been prepared for me from the books of the campaign. I went on to use that as an opportunity to discuss the need for an improvement of the Corrupt Practices Act. I thought it was a good joke on myself, because under those circumstances I did not read in great detail the full account that had been prepared for me.

It was sent to Washington. Two days later the headlines in my State were that I led the Nation in campaign contributions and expenditures. Immediately the opposition took up the hue and cry: "You are going to let MORSE buy his seat." What had happened was that my assistant thought that what was called for was a full statement of all money which we knew had been contributed to my campaign through any committee, and all the money that I knew the campaign, up until that time, had spent. So the report which came here to the Senate showed that I was reporting some $50,000 in contributions and a little more in deficits, and was already running a deficit. I shall comment on the deficit point later.

There was a candidate for the U.S. Senate that year in Ohio, and his report showed that he had received and spent a little more than $6,000. There was a candidate for the U.S. Senate in the great Empire State of New York, and his report, filed with the U.S. Senate in 1950, showed that he had received and spent a little more than $7,000. But here was MORSE in Oregon reporting more than $50,000. What we had done was to include in our report money which we had received and spent in the primary and in the general election campaign up to that point—contributions received and expenditures made by all the finance committees in my campaign, of which I knew. At least, as I said laughingly, my opposition and the people got the facts about what I actually received and spent. Do you know how much, really, my opponent received and spent through other sources?

I always thought of that experience as a pretty good illustration of the need for giving the public the full story about what is actually received and what is actually spent by all groups working for the candidate, of which he has knowledge.

That is why I am so glad the Senator from Missouri has announced that he has an amendment to follow this one which will deal somewhat, at least, with that point. With that principle, I am in complete accord.

But I come now to the matter of the deficit provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act. In my judgment, those provisions tend to induce corruption, rather than to end it. I think the whole procedure in regard to deficits ought to be exactly the same as the procedure in regard to reporting contributions, in the first place.

When I ended one year with a substantial deficit, I was visited by a committee of members of my party at that time in Oregon, who said to me, in effect "You know, you have been elected for 6 years. We are going to do the best we can to defeat you in 1956, but we do not think you ought to hold your seat from 1950 to 1956 with a heavy campaign deficit hanging over you. We are going out, if you give us permission to do so, to raise that deficit."

I said, "I welcome it. Fine. I appoint you. But you will have to raise it on the basis of the same terms that contributions had to be made during the campaign." There were three conditions which I made. First, no money would come to me; second, no commitments were to be made; third, there was to be a public record made of the contributions.

They ask, "Could you not dispense with that last condition, because there are those who will be perfectly willing, from a party standpoint, to help to wipe out the deficit, but they would not want the record to show that they ever gave you a dollar by way of a political contribution?"

I said, "Then I do not want their money."

Why should it not be a matter of public record? Why should the public not know how deficits are raised, just as they know how campaign contributions, in the first place, are raised? Yet under the Corrupt Practices Act, when deficits are raised, it is not necessary to make any report.

It is a pretty good rule that if any particular procedure invites wrongdoing, invites corruption, invites injustice, that procedure had better be corrected.

The provision in regard to deficits invites, in my judgment, a lot of chicanery. I think the present procedure in regard to deficits is not an inducement to clean elections. It invites a running up of deficits. It encourages deficits.

The effort is to get the campaign going and get it won. The idea is to wait until the election is over and then go out and get money under the table. I think that practice ought to be cleaned up and cleaned out of the Corrupt Practices Act.

The last point I make is that I think we have a responsibility and ought to be happy to do something about the whole matter of raising funds for the election of free men to a free parliamentary body representing free people. The present Presiding Officer of the Senate, the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], has pleaded time and again on the floor of the Senate for the adoption of the principle that there ought to be some assumption of governmental responsibility in connection with the raising of the contributions necessary for election. I have always supported that principle and shall support it again.

My colleague, the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], is the author of, and I am a consponsor of it, a proposal which, if passed—and I shall be a cosponsor again—will provide for a portion of the cost of the election to be borne by the Federal Government. Such a procedure follows the English system. It is not a total answer to the question, but it is a part of the answer to the question.

I say to the American people: You have a great stake in the procedure of electing your Governors, your representatives in Congress, and the occupant of the White House.

When the taxpayers come to an understanding of the pertinent objectives of the Douglas proposal and of the fine objectives of the Neuberger proposal, which I have supported in the past and shall support in the future, we will get their approval of such a procedure.

If we continue the present procedure of campaigning for Federal elections in the United States, we greatly endanger the freedom of the persons elected. Those who are elected to office must be men and women free of debt, who can act on the merits of the issues, on the basis of the evidence, and in accordance with the facts presented. They should never be placed in a position where they may be tempted to look the other way in regard to some issue or even go further and vote for some issue against their better judgment.

We should look for means of freeing a candidate from the necessity of raising funds for his campaign.

It is a delicate thing, and it involves a rather ugly thought. Nevertheless, it is one of the cold realities of American politics. If and when I get out of politics and begin to write my book, the chapter on the subject of political financing will cover one of the greatest causes of corruption in American politics today.

Mr. President, by means of this bill we have an opportunity to bring about some improvements by emphasizing public knowledge of campaign contributions. Let this bill be the first step in the march of Congress down the road toward the goal of a clean election procedure.

GREATER PUBLIC SERVICE SHOULD BE EXPECTED FROM RADIO AND TELEVISION

Mr. President, my last point involves the entire matter of the use of television and radio. Consider the use of the public's airways which television and the radio companies receive from the American people, and yet the very little that those companies return to the people, by way of public service. When one takes into account the fact that, after all, the air waves belong, not to the television or the radio companies, but to the American people, I wonder why we are so hesitant to pass a law which some of us have been proposing for some time—a law which will require, as part of the right to operate under the licenses of those companies, the setting aside of reasonable amounts of good time to be used as a public service, without charge, for the benefit of the American people, in the election campaigns.

There are many problems to be worked out in connection with the implementing of such a principle, Mr. President; but I say this job lies ahead of us, because the American people are entitled to have an opportunity to hear from the candidates for major posts in their government, and are also entitled to hear them under circumstances which do not destroy the freedom of the candidates before the elections even occur.

It is true that, today, if a man does not have substantial funds or if those who support his candidacy cannot raise substantial funds, the cost of the use of television, alone, makes it impossible for him to run for election to the U.S. Senate. I speak on this point from knowledge, because in 1950 television was not in use in the State of Oregon, but by 1956 television was in use there; and the television costs of my 1956 campaign were more than double the costs of my entire campaign in 1950.

Even so, Mr. President, I come from a small State; and I hate to think of the amounts of money that a candidate for election to the U.S. Senate who comes from one of the heavily populated States has to spend for television costs alone.

Mr. President, is it in the interest of good government to let this condition continue unabated? Is it in the interest of good government to pull our cloaks over our eyes and try to hide ourselves from the reality of American political campaign problems? Today, do we who serve in the U.S. Senate not have the responsibility of speaking against the very bad practices which are developing in the American campaign system; and do we not have the duty of striking some blows in favor of the adoption of some procedures which will clean up American elections and protect the public from the growing danger of corruption in American politics?

Mr. President, I leave that challenge with the Senate. We now have an opportunity to come to the aid of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], who is urging the passage of this bill. He does not claim that it is a perfect bill; but certainly the bill, if enacted, will produce some improvements. I believe we should proceed to work on the bill, and should try to improve it as we go along, even at this time. We should make perfectly clear that we shall not end our action on this subject matter by whatever final action we take on the bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I have undertaken to discuss this bill in particularity; and I have been available here on the floor of the Senate for the better part of 3 days, to answer all questions which may be asked in regard to the constitutionality of the bill or in regard to the court decisions relating to the authority of the Federal sovereign over primary elections as well as general elections, as evidenced by the decisions of U.S. courts and by the other authorities in this field, including the precedents established by the Senate itself.

I believe that the distinguished present occupant of the chair, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and also the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who only a moment ago made so able and moving a plea on this subject, and I am thinking along the same lines when we consider what we shall do in the future.

Sometimes, perhaps with some chauvinism, but nevertheless with great pride, we like to describe our Nation as the most powerful on earth. Mr. President, power does not reside merely in military might; neither is it derived solely from economic and productive capacity.

In that connection, there are certain things which we place in the general classification of public morals and public decency. And, Mr. President, I believe that one of those things is enactment of the pending bill, which would include primaries, in order that the people of the country may have the full and unadulterated truth, not only as to whom are the contributors, but also as to what amounts of money they contribute, in both primaries and general elections.

I have stated to my brethren from the South that a majority of the cases to which the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections has had recourse between the years 1913 and 1941, have arisen in southern primaries.

Now we have an opportunity to demonstrate that we are not going to cower behind an unrestricted license, as is presently the case if we live within the terms of the 1925 Corrupt Practices Act. This matter involves the self-respect of the Senate, and it also involves our respect for the people of the country.

The next amendment which I propose to offer will relate to intrastate committees—that is to say, committees within a State. The amendment would prevent what the Senator from Oregon has just described as a proliferation of committees set up with the sole purpose of evading or, to use a euphemistic expression, avoiding the terms of election legislation.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HENNINGS. We know there are no limits upon the number of committees which may be set up in a given State for the purpose of collecting money, and we know that these committees, under present law, do not have to report to the Secretary of the Senate, and we know that they do not.

Does anybody believe when Samuel Insull gave $125,000 to the late Frank L. Smith for his primary in the State of Illinois, that he, Samuel Insull, was interested simply in good government? And so we could go on down the line, and we could go up the line, in terms of dollars.

Do we believe that some of these contributions, disproportionate to the interest of an individual in a candidate or in a party or in his government, should not be restricted and restrained, not only as to amounts, but that the full glare of publicity be put upon what is done, so that the people may know?

We prate in this body about our righteousness and our greatness. I have great respect for my colleagues. I think the Senate is a great body of men. I just hope that in this instance we can grow up in terms of our own problems, and come to grips with what is a very basic issue in this country today, How are people nominated, by what interests are they supported, and how are they elected?

Mr. COOPER and Mr. LONG of Louisiana addressed the Chair.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, is it a shameful thing that people should know? What are the substantial arguments against this proposed legislation? The silence of this room has been broken very seldom by any constitutional question, any question relating to precedents. The general attitude of the Senate seems to be, as evidenced by the debate, "Well, there is nothing really wrong with it, except some of us do not want to have to tell. We do not want to have to tell what happens in primaries."

I may say to my colleagues, the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Kentucky, that I shall be glad to yield just as soon as I have completed this thought.

There is nobody in this body who is so immured in the fastness of an Alice-in-Wonderland sort of world as not to know what happens in primary and general election campaigns when it comes to contributions. As the Senator from Oregon has said, it takes a strong and rugged man, of inflexible will and character indeed, to overlook the pleas and the urgings and the petitions and the visitations of a $5,000 contributor, when the one who may not have contributed at all, or who may have been in opposition to the elected Senator, has a matter also to present, adversely to the matter presented by the large and substantial contributor.

In a sense, Mr. President, this body is composed of judges. True enough, we are not a part of the judicial system, but it comes within the purview of our duties, day in and day out, to exercise our best judgment and the best conscience that is available to us upon matters affecting the States we represent, the Nation, and the entire world.

To me it has always been a source of deep embarrassment to ask my friends to form committees and organizations and go out and solicit money for my campaigns. I have been through 12 of them. In one I had the opposition of the then President of the United States, the then Governor of my State, the then chairman of the Democratic National Committee, the then national committeeman, the then mayor of St. Louis, the then chairman of the State committee. I refer to the campaign in the year 1950. These gentlemen actively campaigned against my nomination. My opponent may have been a better man. Far be it for me to say he was not. The fact is that I was outgunned in the primary by $1,000 to $1, and I knew money was coming in from Washington, from New York, from the foreign ambassadors, and others. I later learned a great deal about what had been done in that campaign.

Still, Mr. President, I had no basis upon which to challenge any one of three opponents on the ground that money was being sent into my State for the purpose of supporting my opponent, and, as everybody had a right to do, to work for my defeat.

So I say, Mr. President, it is a little more than an academic matter with me. The great President of the United States campaigned actively in the State for another nominee, as he had every right to do. The Governor and the State employees were all on the other side.

I sent $25 into a county to help some of my friends. Lord only knows why they were for me in that county, because when I went there I found some had business in Washington, some had business in the State capital, others had business in an adjoining town. I encountered great difficulty in finding anyone on whom to call, because they seemed to be exceedingly busy with other business. When I sent $25 into a county, which was about all a few friends of mine and I could afford—I spent virtually all I had readily available to spend in the campaign—I found the other side had sent $3,000 into the county. I refer to a county in northwest Missouri where the pony express originated. I do not know how I happened to carry that county. I did not know anything about that money. Nobody told me anything about it until much later, when they expressed regret at having done what they did and were honest enough to say so.

So I say, Mr. President, some of these things come right down to us. We are talking about what happens to us.

I have thought of going out, if I should seek reelection 3 years hence, to say to my friends, "Get me some contributions, but get only $5 from each person. I do not want to be under an obligation to anybody for a contribution of $1,000. If a man should contribute $5,000, he might influence my judgment, so I should not take that contribution."

I might say to my friends, "Do not take contributions from an officer, be it an officer of a labor organization, of a manufacturing concern, or of a bank or other business organization. Do not take that money, because something may come before the Committee on the Judiciary in which that man will be interested. He may have an interest in the Alien Property Custodian matter, now before the committee."

It seems that many lawyers and lobbyists of my acquaintance have expressed an avid interest in that matter in the last 4 or 5 years. I refer to the Trading With the Enemy Act, which we have had under consideration.

Are we going to say, Mr. President, that I am not going to consider, at least with some human degree of mental hospitality, what a man who has contributed $10,000 to my campaign might have to say about what his client wants in regard to dipping into the fund, since there are millions and millions of dollars involved? I hope I would be strong enough to withstand the pressure, but, as the Senator from Oregon well said, why can we not make it a little easier for ourselves to not have to be quite so strong in all matters? Why can we not begin by telling the people what it is we really are doing, rather than engaging in this shadowboxing, by saying, "Oh, well, the primary is a State matter. We have State primary laws."

The State of Illinois does not have State primary laws or laws relating to reporting in the general elections. That State is wide open. That is why the late lamented Frank Smith, who was elected to the Senate on the face of the returns, but who was not seated, was able to take $125,000 from the late utilities magnate, the then powerful and mighty Samuel Insull.

It happens that Mr. Smith was at that time also the Commissioner of Public Utilities for the State of Illinois.

The minority leader made quite a speech the other day about States' rights, stating he did not think he should be subjected to any legislation because the legislature in his State had not seen fit to enact any regulations relating to primaries or general elections. I do not find the distinguished minority leader always quite so subservient or quite so amenable to what State legislation provides, whether it be his own State or other States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks in the RECORD a number of editorials. I refer to an editorial entitled "Clean Elections," published in the Washington Post and Times Herald of January 19, 1960, an excellent summation of the matter presently before us, and other cognate and related matters; an editorial entitled "Dangerous Campaign Costs," published in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of January 18, 1960; an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 15, 1959, entitled "Inadequate Campaign Bill;" an editorial from the Salt Lake City Tribune of July 18, 1959, at the time the bill was reported, entitled "Push 'Clean Elections' "; an editorial from the Beaumont, (Tex.) Enterprise of July 12, 1959, entitled "In the Name of Realism"; an editorial from the Washington Post and Times Herald of July 13, 1959, entitled "Clean Elections Again"; and an editorial from the Wilmington Morning News of July 15, 1959, entitled "For Cleaner Elections."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENNEDY in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to yield to my colleague the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I should like to obtain the Senator's reaction to the problem which may be faced by a candidate, which is somewhat different from the situation the Senator has described. I refer to the candidate who is faced with the unanimous opposition of the daily press.

That is an experience some of us have had on occasion. I recall that the first time the junior Senator from Louisiana offered himself for office he did not have a daily newspaper for him. There might have been one which was neutral, but certainly there were none for him. Certainly the largest daily newspapers were very active against him.

I am sure the Senator realizes that the problem is not simply one of regulating contributions, but there is a problem of trying to find money to make it possible to be heard, when one has practically every newspaper in the State against him.

Without meaning to criticize anyone, much as I admire newspaper publishers they have a way of being human themselves. Sometimes their newspapers' editorials tend to be consistent with the publishers' own financial positions.

For example, the junior Senator from Louisiana cannot recall that he has ever been urged by a daily newspaper in his State to vote for increased public welfare payments, for old-age pensions, for aid to dependent children, or for aid to the needy blind.

How would the Senator propose that we find a solution to this problem, where a person is simply trying to find the opportunity to reply to what is being said against him? Does the Senator have some idea as to how we could ease that problem?

Mr. HENNINGS. I wish I had found the philosopher's stone or were the repository of all wisdom as to such matters.

Fortunately, in my last campaign I had the support of the Republican paper in St. Louis, the Globe-Democrat, as well as many Republican papers in the State. Of course, the Senator does not have that problem in the general elections in Louisiana, does he?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The problem of being supported by a daily newspaper?

Mr. HENNINGS. In general elections.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. My reaction would be——

Mr. HENNINGS. Is the Senator suggesting that we try to control the press, as to what they say for or against a candidate? Or is the Senator saying that we should give a candidate a means whereby he may meet this so-called scurrilous or unfair or invidious attack? I know of no way to do that except to resort to the ingenuity of which I am sure the Senator from Louisiana is capable and competent, which is to get out and cover the territory.

How many parishes are there in Louisiana?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Sixty-four.

Mr. HENNINGS. We have 114, counties in Missouri, and we have a city of 1½ million or 2 million in the metropolitan area. One has to get out to the people, if the newspapers happen to be in opposition.

The late Franklin D. Roosevelt—as was also true with respect to Mr. Truman, I am sure—found no great handicap in that fact. In fact, I have heard them say repeatedly that the people who worked for the newspapers were generally for them and the publishers and sometimes the editors were against them, but they somehow or other survived, and were elected.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I believe the Senator is familiar with the fact that if a candidate does not have a single daily newspaper for him, and very few weekly newspapers for him, if any, he is confronted with a very serious problem of getting his views across to the electorate. That costs him money.

The point I had in mind is that it is difficult enough to raise money as conditions are now.

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes, it is.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I wonder if the Senator can assure me that it will be any easier to raise money once we start publishing in the newspapers who contributed $5, $10, $100, or more than $100 for the campaign. If the Senator could indicate it might be easier to raise some money, I would be more inclined to support his amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very sorry, I cannot give any such assurance.

I know the Senator is not going to support the amendment. I wish I could give the Senator good counsel on the matter. I find myself totally incapable of so doing.

The Senator has a strong instinct for self-preservation, and his presence here during this long period of time is eloquent testimony to it. He is a good Senator, an able Senator, and a diligent Senator.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. May I ask the Senator this question: Has the Senator not stated that the present law——

Mr. HENNINGS. It is always difficult to raise money. We can always use money for a variety of things in campaigns. I do not believe anyone has ever decided exactly how much money should be spent for the various media, respectively, or for one as against the others. I do not believe anyone has ever decided whether campaign buttons, campaign posters, placards, advertisements in newspapers, and other things, do any good or not. I believe that most of us react, or our opponents react, because one candidate or the other does something. The other side does it because the opponent does it. Those things have never been nicely analyzed or weighed. We do not know.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It surely helps to be heard over the radio or television, as a general rule. I am sure the Senator will agree.

Has not the Senator stated that the present Corrupt Practices Law, so-called, has been a delusion, and that it has been honored more by its evasion and by the failure to accomplish the desired purposes than by compliance with it?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes; I have so stated, and so have all other Senators who have spoken in favor of the amendment, I believe. They have so stated either directly or by implication.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Recognizing the fact that this is a law which has not worked, which has been consistently evaded, and which has resulted in a great deal of hypocrisy, deceit, and misrepresentation in Government, how can we be sure that if we apply the proposed legislation to primary elections the result will be more honesty in elections than has resulted in the past? Why not try it in general elections and see how it works before trying to apply it to primaries?

Mr. HENNINGS. I cannot give the Senator any affidavits or any assurance that human nature will measurably improve within our limited lifetime. I can say to the Senator that there are penal provisions in the proposed legislation which we hope will be enforced and will be effective. I believe that taking big campaign money out of the dark will make for better legislation, better government, and more faith by the people in their elected representatives and representative bodies.

The Senator has many times heard it said that all politicians are crooked, and that everyone knows that politics is corrupt. I have heard it hundreds of times. I never had any intention of becoming involved with politics. It all happened rather accidentally to me, for better or for worse. But that is the common currency of talk about so-called government politics, is it not? Perhaps the Senator associates with and knows better people than I know, but I am talking about the generality of people. They say, "Well, you may be honest, and doubtless are, but there are some fellows who do this, that, and the other thing. We know that such and such a company or corporation owns such and such a Senator. We know that the Senator accepted enormous contributions from this, that, or the other group or interest. We know that this, that, or the other Senator has been influenced by someone who was once his law partner, and perhaps still is."

I have heard that kind of talk all my life. I think we might do something to try to remedy the situation.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The general problem which occurs to the junior Senator from Louisiana is that many people feel—and perhaps sometimes correctly—that as among certain opposing candidates, none of them are completely honest, but that, on the other hand, one type of candidate has the habit of being for the little fellow, and the other does not. The people would like to have the choice of candidates. They may not get it if a candidate finds no way of financing his campaign.

It has been my experience that the average politician is probably more honest than the average businessman. Some businessmen would not like to agree with that statement. A politician does not have the privilege of criticizing businessmen. It is very poor politics. However, it is not necessarily bad for business for a businessman to criticize a politician.

Mr. HENNINGS. As a lawyer, I might observe to the Senator that I have encountered some prospective clients from the business community who did not seem especially concerned about preserving the integrity of the criminal statutes if they could find a way to get around them. We know that many people believe that they are buying influence when they support a political candidate by large contributions, just as we in the legal community know that in spite of repeated assertions to the contrary, many people think they may be buying influence when they retain counsel in connection with a legal matter. That is human nature.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Let me state the point which the junior Senator from Louisiana had in mind, and then the Senator can react to it.

The point the junior Senator from Louisiana had in mind was this: Most newspaper publishers tend to be conservative. Some tend to be very reactionary. While their support is not regarded as a part of the financing of a campaign, or a campaign contribution, it is of great value in a campaign, particularly if it is on a day-to-day basis, when they hammer away from day to day against one candidate and for another.

In a State where the press tends to be extremely conservative, or even reactionary in point of view, reflecting not the view of the men who work on the newspaper, but the man who owns it, it seems to the junior Senator from Louisiana that it is a mistake to make it too difficult to raise campaign funds to fight for a different viewpoint. We cannot regulate the influence of the newspapers, and neither the Senator nor I seek to destroy or undermine the freedom of the press. But when we make it difficult for a candidate to raise funds to make himself heard in opposition to the press, I fear we have scored a tremendous victory for conservatism and reactionism in government.

Mr. HENNINGS. If the Senator has read the proposed legislation, he knows that the ceilings in the case of candidates for both the Senate and the House have been increased five times over the ceilings under the present law.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. As the Senator knows, and as he has testified——

Mr. HENNINGS. The ceilings in the proposed legislation certainly exceed most of the State limitations, within which the Senator would have his domain, if I correctly understand his line of reasoning.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Many people are reluctant to contribute to a campaign because they are shy. They would not want their names to be published in the newspaper. The Senator is perhaps familiar with the situation in which a contributor may approach a candidate and make a cash contribution, saying, "Please do not say anything about this. I do not want your opponent to know that I contributed to your campaign. He would expect me to contribute to his campaign, too, or he might hold it against me."

Mr. HENNINGS. I think we have a rather blunt word for that. When I was growing up as a boy in St. Louis that was called under-the-counter or under-the-table money. I think it is lamentable that some people are so bashful and shy about having their contributions recorded. But that is another matter which rests with the individual conscience under the given circumstances. The fact remains that the present Corrupt Practices Act requires that money received in a general campaign by a candidate be recorded. For the most part the very shy people belong to the gentry who come to the candidate himself. They want him to know that they are contributing. They do not go to the candidate's treasurer.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. That is not my impression. My impression is that the candidate usually has to look up the contributors. From what I have seen of campaign fund raising, I should say that it is often as necessary for the candidate to look up the contributor as it is for the contributor to look up the candidate.

Mr. HENNINGS. That may be.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

EXHIBIT 1

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 19, 1960]

CLEAN ELECTIONS

After 5 years of discussion the Senate is expected to begin voting today on a badly needed clean elections bill. The measure reported out by the Rules Committee is in many respects a disappointment, for it stops far short of what the term "clean elections" implies. Control over the amount of money spent on behalf of candidates has been eliminated, apparently by oversight. The bill would modernize the limitations upon campaign expenditures and tighten up the reporting requirements, but it would apply only to general elections and thereby leave primaries untouched. Even so, it would mark some advance toward bringing the rules abreast of actual practices.

No realist would contend that the chances are bright for passing the Hennings amendment to extend the coverage to primaries. Despite the broad efforts by Senators HENNINGS and KEATING to remedy this obvious injustice, the amendment has been met by vigorous opposition from a coalition of Southern Democrats and Republicans. A bill that did not apply to primaries would of course create a gross disparity by in effect exempting most of the Southern States from its requirements.

The fact that Congress has dallied inexcusably on the matter, and the fact that the eve of a presidential campaign is not the ideal time to make changes in the rules, ought not, however, to influence the basic decision. There is little hope that a law could be made effective this year in any event because of the absence of preparatory work in the House. But the vote will be an important moral test—a test of whether Senators are really concerned about making the electoral process fairer, or reserve their piety to be expressed only when scandals are uncovered. Passage of the bill with the Hennings amendment would be significant evidence of genuine Senate concern with the problem and a strong encouragement to effective action by the House.

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Jan. 18, 1960]

DANGEROUS CAMPAIGN COSTS

Every red-blooded American boy, so the story goes, may aspire to the White House. Rich or poor, makes no difference. To the man born or reared in a humble log cabin, every American youth may nurse the ambition to win political office, even the highest in the land.

This belief is part of the American folklore. And it may have been true once, when the Nation was smaller, society simpler, and elections a much less costly matter. Now it takes a huge and excessive pot of money to get elected.

At one time, a candidate for Congress could visit every constituent in the district and solicit his vote.

Today, the average congressional district takes in more than 400,000 men, women, and children. It's too big an audience to reach, traveling from door to door in a horse and buggy.

When George Washington was elected President, the population of the entire United States was less than 4 million people—or about half that of New York City alone today. Any American who wants to sit in the White House has to reach an audience of 180 million Americans—or at least those over 21 who have the right to vote.

Reaching the voters has become a bigger and bigger job, more and more expensive.

It is estimated the cost of national elections is running as high as $140 million. This is a result not only of the growth of population, but of the appearance of new and expensive ways to woo the Americans for their vote—notably radio and TV.

Representative HALE BOGGS, New Orleans Democrat, and a member of a congressional committee probing the sky-high costs of running for office, once commented:

"The staggering cost of the recent campaign in which these newer media of communications were used has generated considerable public interest in this problem."

In theory, the Republican Party and Democrat Party can spend only $3 million in any one calendar year to elect their members to office. There is a Federal law that puts this ceiling on the national committees of both political parties.

It also limits a candidate for U.S. Senate to $25,000 for his campaign spending, and a candidate for the House to $5,000. But the law is a joke.

In effect, this limit applies to each group that backs a candidate. As a result, the limit is easily evaded. Candidates are backed by a number of independent committees which get together to raise separate funds for a campaign. Each group or committee can spend up to the legal limit.

Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr., has introduced a bill that would put a higher, more realistic ceiling on campaign spending, but make it cover all groups working for the same candidate. His proposal would also apply to primary elections which are now completely exempt from the Federal law.

Southern Democrats have raised the roof over this point. Since the Democratic primary is the important election in Dixie, the lid has been off completely for the Democratic Party down South. That's how they want to keep it.

The Hennings bill addresses itself to a major weakness in our political system. When a party must spend $140 million in a national election, it places itself under too much obligation to contributors who hold the purse strings. Such an election reform should get warm support of Congressmen in both Houses and on both sides of the aisle.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Aug. 15, 1959]

INADEQUATE CAMPAIGN BILL

A clean elections bill should have been adopted long ago. Yet the measure approved by the Senate Rules Committee last month as a complete substitute for the Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 would be an imposition on the intelligence of voters.

It does not go as far as measures introduced in 1955 and 1957 and, as Senator HENNINGS and a number of others complain, it fails to bring primaries—still more important than elections in some States—under regulation. Also it sets no ceiling on individual contributions to the campaign funds of one or more candidates.

Worst of all, it eliminates the reporting requirement for persons who spend $50 or more in any year to influence the election of congressional candidates in two States or more. It also reduces the number of reports on expenditures by the national committees, and it would allow one of these to be made 30 days after an election, instead of before. Thus it actually weakens the reporting provisions of the present law. Information about "slush funds" cannot help the voters after an election has been held.

The least to be expected of new legislation is greater publicity. Voters at least should know who is interested in supporting candidates all over the country, if not why. The many secondary campaign committees, which at present need not report expenditures, also should be made to operate in the open. Higher ceilings on campaign expenditures are reasonable in view of the increased cost of campaigning, but it is important for the voters to know who is putting up the money.

[From the Salt Lake City Tribune, July 18, 1959]

PUSH CLEAN ELECTIONS

A clean elections bill recently approved by the Senate Rules Committee falls far short of the needs but, in the words of Chairman HENNINGS, it is an improvement over the obsolete 1925 Corrupt Practices Act.

A chief weakness in the measure is that it excludes primary election expenses. Primaries are often hotly contested and more crucial than general elections in some States, particularly in the South where they are for all practical purposes the only elections. Another weakness is that reports are required only from the candidate himself and not from the campaign committees that help him in his State. Many campaigns are financed through committees. For example, 7 Senate and 121 House candidates reported no personal expenditures in their 1958 campaigns.

The bill does establish more realistic rules for political spending. It would increase from $4 million to about $12 million the yearly spending limit for national political committees and raise the legal maximums Senate and House candidates may expend. It would also require more strict accounting of contributions and expenditures.

Senator HENNINGS tried to have primaries included in the bill but the committee voted five to four to reject the proposal. He will seek to amend it on the floor to make it conform to his original strong measure.

There is no assurance at present that even the mild bill will be voted on this session. Similar measures have died in two preceding sessions. Congress has an opportunity to assume moral leadership by adopting a real clean elections bill.

[From the Beaumont (Tex.) Enterprise, July 12, 1959]

IN THE NAME OF REALISM

One cannot justify the existence of a law that is completely unrealistic and ignores wholesale the facts of life.

That's why we are pleased with a bill that has been approved by the U.S. Senate Rules Committee.

The measure requires fuller reporting on political campaign funds, but raises spending limits to what was called—and rightfully so—more realistic levels.

It includes a formula for campaign funds based on votes in the last previous election. For a State like New York the limit for a Senate candidate would be about $300,000. The present limit is $10,000, a ridiculous figure.

Chairman THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr., Democrat, of Missouri, is right when he says the measure is a vast improvement over the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925.

Certainly excessive use of money in a political campaign can be a corrupt practice. However, with such costs as expensive television time and use of other communications media to be contended with, a great deal of it has to be spent if a candidate for major office is to be able to fully acquaint the voters with his program.

If he is limited by law to an unreasonable degree there is tremendous temptation to simply lie about expenditures, or at least to find devious and dishonorable ways of getting around the statutes.

Take, for instance, a statewide campaign in Texas. Just to visit half the counties takes a mint of money.

Times have changed a great deal since 1925.

[From the Washington Post and Times Herald, July 13, 1959]

CLEAN ELECTIONS AGAIN

Every Member of Congress ought to have a special interest in the clean-elections bill which has been approved by the Senate Rules Committee. This measure would enable them and their rivals and/or successors to run for office in 1960 without the chagrin of having to flout the intent of the Corrupt Practices Act. It would raise the legal limits on campaign expenditures to reasonable sums that candidates for office could abide by. The present limits are so out of line with the current costs of campaigning that they compel candidates to be evasive if they wish to be elected. Certainly that is an unhealthy situation for every legislator who has to live with it.

The amended Hennings bill, which the committee reported out, would enable candidates for Senator or Representative at large to spend up to $50,000 in the small States and up to $300,000 in the large States. The present ceiling is $10,000. Congressmen would be allowed to spend $12,500 (or more in some instances if they should invoke the 20-cents-a-vote formula) as compared with $2,500 at present. The formula applied to the national committees would enable them to spend about $12 million instead of $3 million. That figure still falls short of covering the cost of a national campaign in these days of television, but it is a substantial improvement.

Other important provisions of the bill would tighten up committee organization and the reporting of both contributions and expenditures. The Rules Committee did not offer any formula for requiring all groups working in behalf of a single candidate to combine their financial reports, but its bill would require every candidate to list the committees and organizations known to be working in his behalf, even though he may have repudiated some of them. Perhaps that is as far as it is feasible to go toward the consolidation of political financing.

Reports would have to be made 10 days before election (in addition to later complete reports), and they would be open to public inspection in Federal courthouses as well as at the Capitol. In other words, the bill relies heavily upon publicity to discourage excessive political spending and reliance on funds from special interests.

There are some glaring weaknesses in the bill, as Senator HENNINGS has pointed out. It would not cover primaries despite the fact that these intraparty contests are equivalent to elections in many States. It does not cover political committees operating in only one State unless they are subsidiary to a national group. Opportunity will arise, however, to improve the bill as it moves through the legislative process. The important task now is to push it to prompt passage through the Senate. The House should also get into action so that the bill will not get caught in the adjournment rush or the political tangle that would likely beset any measure of this sort held over until the campaign year of 1960.

[From the Wilmington (Del.) Morning News, July 15, 1959]

FOR CLEANER ELECTIONS

The clean elections bill approved by the Senate Rules Committee is a sensible attempt at realism. The existing Corrupt Practices Act sets spending limits so low that if there weren't loopholes in the act almost the only candidates who won elections would be those who flagrantly violated it.

The present ceiling on spending by candidates for U.S. Senator is $10,000. It is a safe bet that no Senator has been elected from a large State in the television age who hasn't spent (or had spent for him) several times that amount. Even in a small State, $10,000 is hardly enough to produce a senatorial victory.

This is a problem to which no practical solution has been found. The aim is to keep the limit low enough so that bona fide candidates have a chance, while leaving it high enough so that candidates will have a reasonable opportunity to reach all classes of voters. It is undesirable, of course, for candidates to take office pledged to repay obligations to private interests at the expense of the general public, and yet the alternative—financing political campaigns out of taxes—has never attracted much support.

The present Hennings bill is another stab at the problem. It operates on the same principle as traffic speed limits, which are set at the speed 85 percent of drivers actually adopt on a given stretch of road. And actual campaign spending "speed," as almost everybody realizes, is a good deal higher than the "speed limits" set by the Corrupt Practices Act.

So the Hennings bill would set a senatorial campaign spending limit ranging from a maximum of $50,000 in small States to a maximum of $300,000 in large States. The present limit is $10,000. For Members of the House, who run three times as often, the limit is raised from $2,500 to $12,500. For national committees it goes up from $3 to $12 million.

Raising the limits would not necessarily mean that actual expenditures would be raised. The Hennings bill, indeed, contains provisions designed to make its limits practically enforcible. Candidates would be required to list all committees and organizations working for them, including any whose support they had repudiated. They would have to file reports 10 days after election, with complete reports later. And these reports would be open to public inspection in Federal courthouses, in the hope that the public would know just what financial support each man had received.

This is just the latest attempt to solve a problem which may be insoluble. It won't be the last. It would not cover primaries, though primaries are the real elections in the South, and it leaves other loopholes open. There is room for improvement before passage. But the important thing is that we are trying to get more honest national elections, and that there has been marked progress over the years.

Mr. JAVITS obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield for a question before he yields the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York was recognized.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Before the Senator from Missouri yields the floor I wonder if he will yield for a question.

Mr. JAVITS. I am glad to yield for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Texas to ask the Senator from Missouri a question.

Mr. HENNINGS. I shall try to answer any question put to me by the distinguished Senator from Texas.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. The inquiry I wish to make of the distinguished Senator from Missouri is this: If his amendment should be adopted, would he be willing to accept an amendment reading as follows:

On page 10, after line 9, insert the following new subsection:

"(e) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act reports complying with other requirements of this Act filed with State officials under valid State laws shall be deemed in compliance with the requirements of this section if copies thereof are filed with the officials above named at the time of filing with the appropriate State officials, so long as one report is filed before, and one after, the primary, convention, caucus, or election in question."

In explanation of the amendment I should say that in my State we have very strict primary election reporting laws. There is no limit on the amount which may be contributed by any one person, but it is a penitentiary offense not to report each contribution, and that reporting must be made under oath. It takes page after page of reports. We must report contributions of $5, $10, $12½, and $1. It takes a very large amount of meticulous bookkeeping and a large amount of accurate accounting in reporting these contributions. If we were to have a Federal law on top of that law, it would complicate the situation tremendously. The purpose of my amendment would be to amend the Senator's amendment, in the event his amendment is adopted, to require only one set of those onerous election reports under the State and Federal laws.

In my State we have two primaries. First the primary and then the runoff. In my State a sworn report of all receipts and expenditures, including gifts and loans of property, is required. That means that if someone lends us an automobile, it must be reported. If someone lends us a typewriter, that must be reported as a loan. That report must be made under oath. Such a report is required from 7 to 10 days before each primary, special, or general election, and within 10 days after each primary, special, or general election. Unfortunately, the dates on which these reports are required are different from those proposed in the Federal Elections Act. Therefore a candidate running in my State would end up after a year in a primary, runoff primary, and general election filing six State and six Federal reports.

Since all these reports must be filed under oath, it is naturally very important that the candidate insures their accuracy.

In a large campaign, these reports require many hours of bookkeeping and typing.

I therefore propose the amendment, which would allow reports filed under a valid State law, which complies substantially with the Federal requirement, to be accepted under the bill when filed with the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate, even though the dates may differ from those listed under the proposed act. This at least would reduce the 12 reports to 6 reports, and impose no more onerous a burden than that already imposed by the State of Texas.

I might say to the Senator that we cannot merely say we spent $20,000 for printing. We must give the name of the printer. We must say, for example, "We paid $571.20 to XYZ printer, and $59.30 to this, that, or the other printer."

If we incur debts, we must list every debt we incur, and who the debtor is and how much is owed. All of this requires meticulous accounting and bookkeeping. Formerly, we in Texas had a limit of $10,000 on expenses. No one ever paid any attention to it. So now we make a realistic approach to the whole problem. Under the reform law there is now no limit placed on the amount of contributions, but it is a penitentiary offense if the contributions and expenses are not reported. Under the pending bill, it would require a whole headquarters full of accountants and bookkeepers and typists. The requirements under our State law are already more strict than are proposed under the proposed Federal Elections Act.

Mr. President, I can see nothing to be gained from supporting the proposed amendment, so far as Texas is concerned—I refer to the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] and the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING]—except more burdensome bookkeeping and typing on the part of the candidates. If the distinguished Senators will accept my amendment as a proviso on their amendment requiring financial reports in primaries, I will be glad to join in support of their amendment. The amendment proposed by the distinguished Senators would not add one iota of information to the people of Texas to that which is now required under present law. It would add a terrible expense, and would require the filing of 12 reports instead of 6 reports. The people of Texas already get full information.

Mr. HENNINGS. In trying to answer the rather lengthy question of the Senator from Texas, I should like to inquire first whether the Senator presented his amendment to the committee at any time for consideration.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. No; I have not.

Mr. HENNINGS. The first time, I believe, that those of us who are members of the committee and are supporting the proposed legislation have heard of it is now. I would say that I sympathize with the Senator's position. However, the proposed law requires four reportings each election year by political committees and reporting before and after each election by candidates. Bankers and brokers and investment bankers complain about the great many reports they have to file with the SEC. They do not talk about driving bucketshops out of business. They always talk about the number of reports they have to make. I do not say that in derogation of my friend's suggestion. I only say that under the proposed law in election years only four reports would be required from political committees. Under the 1925 act six reports are required. Therefore, we are cutting down on the reporting process.

As to words "substantial compliance" there we get into very deep water. I do not know just how we could say that a State law is in substantial compliance both as to time and amount, as well as with respect to other factors embodied in the Federal statute, without getting ourselves enmeshed deeply in great controversy in the courts.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am only trying to answer the question of the Senator. I yield.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I merely wish to say to the distinguished Senator from Missouri that I will take out the word "substantial." The reporting would be in compliance with everything that the Federal law requires except as to the dates.

Mr. HENNINGS. Does my friend from Texas understand that the present law provides that these filings may be made with the clerks of the district courts or with any State officer authorized by the State to receive these reports for the purpose of filing and preservation of them? When we get to the point of substantial compliance——

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I withdraw that word "substantial."

Mr. HENNINGS. Our bill provides that a report may be filed in the county with any officer authorized by State law to receive these reports. Therefore it would simply mean the filing of one report with the State officer and a duplicate for Federal purposes.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. My amendment provides that where the Federal law is slightly different with respect to the date from the State law, the filing would comply with Federal law and would be treated as compliance, where all the information is furnished that is required under the Federal act, although the date is slightly different under State law.

Mr. HENNINGS. My first impression is that I believe we must have uniformity. The Senator says that so many reports are being made, or would be made. There are only two reports that candidates would make. I do not know where we part company.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Perhaps this will clarify the situation. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Missouri this question. In a State having a first primary and then a runoff, or second primary, does the proposed act require filing both before and after each primary, or only one report before the first primary and one after the second primary?

Mr. HENNINGS. There would be the requirement for filing reports before the primary election.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. If there were two primaries, first a primary and then a runoff primary, would the proposed amendment of the Senator require four reports or two reports for the primaries? Does it require two reports for each primary or only two reports for both primaries combined?

Mr. HENNINGS. I think there is no question that it requires, as is stated, reporting before and after a primary.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Each primary?

Mr. HENNINGS. I assume it would mean any and every primary. Of course, the Senator has not very much trouble in the general election.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. That would require, then, six reports, if there are two primaries.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not understand why the Senator says six reports. One report would be required before and one after the primary, and one report before and one after the general election.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. There are two primaries. As I understood the distinguished Senator from Missouri, if there were two primaries, there would be two reports for each primary; one before and one after the first primary, and one before and one after the second primary; and then one report before and one after the general election, making a total of six reports.

Mr. HENNINGS. One report would be required before each primary and one after each primary, and one before the general election and one after the general election, if the Senator is referring to the general election.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Under the very strict laws in Texas, requiring full disclosure, I do not know of any additional information which could be given to the people of Texas or to any interested person anywhere in the Nation on campaign finances.

Mr. HENNINGS. Why cannot the Senator file the same statement with the State that he files with the Federal Government?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Our State laws are stricter than those of the Federal Government.

Mr. HENNINGS. If they are stricter, the candidate is then well within the law—well within both the State and the Federal enactments.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. The purpose of the amendment is to reduce the number of reports from 12 to 6. Will the Senator accept the amendment?

Mr. HENNINGS. I have never seen or heard this objection before. As I read the amendment of the Senator from Texas, the candidate would only have to make duplicate reports.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. My proposal would accept very full reports. The only difference is in the dates. Our dates, under the State law, differ. But this amendment, a report filed with the secretary of state, under State law, would be accepted as the filing, even though the dates might vary by a few days.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. Would the Senator mind repeating his question? I was engaged in a discussion.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, who has a question to ask in connection with the proposed amendment.

Mr. GORE. I have a copy of the amendment submitted by the distinguished Senator from Texas. As I understand the amendment, from a careful reading of it, it provides that the filing of reports with a State government, which reports comply with the provisions of the bill now before the Senate, would be deemed to be a compliance with the bill, if duplicate copies were submitted. Is that not correct?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is what I have been driving at. We are all in agreement, then. The bill provides, I may say to the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Texas, that the filings may be made with the clerk of the Federal district court or with any State official authorized under State laws to receive reports on contributions and expenditures.

I believe we are talking about the same thing. I can accept the amendment with the understanding that the legislative history will provide that the reports shall be filed at the same time as the reports are required by the Federal Act. I understand the amendment so provides.

Provision has been made in the bill for filing with a State official; it is not necessary to file with a Federal official. It will be lawful to file with a State official authorized by State laws to receive these statements.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. In response to the statement by the Senator from Missouri, I call attention to the fact that the bill provides:

> Such reports shall be complete as of the tenth day next preceding the day on which an election for the office for which he is a candidate is to be held, and as of the fortieth day following such election, and in each instance shall be filed not later than the third day following the reporting date.

The State requirement in Texas is that they be filed not less than 7 nor more than 10 days prior to the primaries, and that following the primary they be filed in not less than 10 days—I believe it is 10 days.

Mr. HENNINGS. That brings the requirement well within the proposed Federal provisions for the date of filing; does it not?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. "As of the 40th day following such election."

The reporting date in the bill is 40 days after an election. The reporting date under State law is 10 days after an election. In the State of Texas, that is complicated because the primaries are not 40 days apart.

The purpose of the amendment is simply to provide that where a candidate furnishes information required by Federal law, and the report is filed at a time which is in compliance with State law, that date will be sufficient to comply with the Federal law, too.

Mr. HENNINGS. Would it be satisfactory if we superseded that with the dates required under the Federal law?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Provided it meets the State date and gives all the information provided in the Federal law, that will be sufficient under Federal law.

Mr. HENNINGS. If 10 days is provided under State law and 40 under the Federal law, which has been extended to receive a great deal of information which might come in by way of payment of bills, late contributions, and such other things, I do not see how the two can be harmonized. We are talking about 40 days as against 10 days after the election.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. In Texas, as in many other States, the primaries are not held 40 days apart. Generally, they are run within 3 weeks of each other. In my State, it is either 4 weeks or 5 weeks apart, depending on whether the second primary shall be held on the last Saturday of the month. Some States fix the time at 5 weeks, some 3 weeks, some a month.

When provision is made for 40 days, and there is another requirement for the next primary, the situation becomes confused.

Mr. HENNINGS. In that case they would overlap, and reports would be made on both occasions.

I am sure it is obvious to the Senator from Texas that when we deal with the time when the reporting is required, we cannot understake to enact Federal legislation which will meet certain circumstances in all 50 of the States.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. The purpose of the amendment is to avoid a hiatus in the law in the case of a primary. The bill would require that a report on the primary be filed within 40 days, and we also would have the requirement that the report on the second primary be filed 10 days before the report on the first one. That hitatus would make the law unworkable in that respect, unless the purpose in connection with the amendment is to require that the first report be filed before the final one.

As the wording now stands, the second report would have to be filed before the first one, and thus there would be inextricable confusion as between the first and the second reports.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. I inject myself into the debate on this matter only because I wish to be helpful, if possible.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I fully understand that.

Mr. PASTORE. Although there may be a little disagreement in regard to the details, yet it seems to me that the requirements of the Texas law are much firmer and much stricter than the requirements of the pending bill.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. That is true.

Mr. PASTORE. In such a situation, the second primary might be held before the 40 days had elapsed, and thus before having the full amount of publicity intended to be had by means of this provision.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Exactly.

Mr. PASTORE. It seems to me that it will only be necessary for the Senator from Texas to add to the language he proposes a provision that when the time for the filing of the report on the second primary comes before the time for the filing of the report on the first primary, the filing of the report on the date required in the case of the general primary will serve to satisfy the provision.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. That is the purpose.

Mr. PASTORE. But the Senator's amendment does not contain such a provision, although I believe it should. I believe the Senator should add a provision to the effect that the 40-day period shall not be required to be observed if the State requirement is for a shorter period of time.

In other words I think the Senator from Missouri is trying to put the spotlight of publicity on the amounts of money that are being spent for candidates in general elections, after they have been selected in primaries.

Mr. HENNINGS. Exactly.

Mr. PASTORE. If there are sufficient State law provisions, I believe that objective will be attained.

So I believe the Senator from Texas should include in his amendment a provision that when the State requirement as to time is stricter—in other words, when the period of time thus required is shorter—the meeting of that requirement will serve to meet the time requirement under the so-called Hennings amendment.

I think that will be simple to provide, for I believe that both Senators are in agreement.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I very much appreciate the contribution the able Senator from Rhode Island has made.

Since this proposal has just now been dropped out of the sky, so to speak, I wonder whether the Senator from Texas will put in writing the amendment he proposes.

We know that the 40-day period following the election is for the purpose of coming to an understanding and reporting on all promises and agreements; and we assume that compliance with that provision would be effected in 40 days following the election. That is the reason for the 40-day provision.

Our proposed legislation contains such a provision, and that procedure is contemplated by the act.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. The purpose of the amendment is to accomplish that result. The amendment was drawn up with that point in mind—in other words, to avoid the hiatus of requiring that the final report on the first primary be filed some days after the filing of the report on the second primary, inasmuch as in Texas we have the requirement that the initial report shall be filed 10 days before the second primary.

It is believed that this amendment would obviate that difficulty.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Texas had mentioned this matter to me before now. I feel considerable responsibility in connection with this matter, along with other Senators who have joined me in support of the pending measure; and if I were to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas, even though not fully understanding what the amendment would do as regards the entire act, I believe I would be undertaking more responsibility than I should undertake here on the floor.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I appreciate the conscientious attitude of the Senator from Missouri in that regard.

Mr. HENNINGS. I wish to do all I can for all the States, as regards these provisions.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I commend the distinguished Senator from Missouri for the time and work and effort he has devoted to this subject. I regret the inconvenience I have caused him.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not mind inconvenience. I have devoted 7 or 8 years of work to this measure, and I am not at all disturbed by any proposal in connection with it. Certainly, I very much appreciate the interest of the Senator from Texas.

After all, so far as I am concerned, convenience is the least of the considerations involved. We want to pass a good bill which will be fair and just to the American people.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. And I am sure that the Senator from Texas is in agreement with these purposes, for I know his high-mindedness.

On the other hand, we have a serious problem if we try to adjust to the dates of primary runoffs in two-party States in which such primary elections are held. The 40-day provision is for the express purpose of making it possible for a candidate to report on the fulfillment of promises made and agreements entered into and similar matters. I point out that that subject was very carefully considered by the committee, and is covered by the bill as reported unanimously by the committee, insofar as the bill relates to general elections.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I wish to say that I was not attempting to cause delay; my sole interest was in finding a way to avoid the hiatus in regard to the 40-day provision, which causes great difficulty in my State, since the two primaries are never more than 35 days apart.

I certainly thank the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the efforts of the Senator from Texas to be of help to us and to render help in the circumstances, as he sees them. But I am sure he well realizes that there must be at least some degree of uniformity.

As I have stated, we have provided that the reports may be filed with any State officer who is authorized by law to receive reports. That means any authorized State officer of the county in which the candidate resides.

We have eliminated the requirement for six reports a year, as contained in existing law; and we now propose that only four reports, instead of six, be required each election year from political committees.

I have tried my best to simplify the arrangement.

At this time, and without seeing a further modification of the amendment of the Senator from Texas, if he proposes to make one, I would not wish to undertake the responsibility of accepting his amendment solely as a result of the colloquy we have had here on the floor, for I have not seen his amendment in final form, and I would have to compare it with other provisions of the bill.

This is a very complex matter—not in principle, but certainly in draftsmanship; and I do not know how his amendment would impinge on the other provisions of the bill.

I know that the 40-day provision was included with a definite purpose in mind; and I have undertaken to outline that purpose.

But when we come to deal with a 10-day provision, we deal with an entirely different matter; and I do not know how we can serve the purpose of the pending bill by adopting the suggestion that the bill be amended so as to provide for a period of 10 days—if that be the suggestion.

Certainly I have done my best to understand the good purpose the Senator from Texas has in mind.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. The laws of our State require that they be filed 10 days after the primaries and that they be filed under oath. This amendment was proposed to comply with that requirement of State law.

Mr. HENNINGS. Would the Senator object to having the reports filed 40 days after election?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Not if we could get the State legislature to amend the State laws; otherwise we would end up with 12 very extensive reports.

Mr. HENNINGS. Is the Senator basing his objection on the necessity for having to make carbon copies and having to make 12 reports, because of there being runoff elections in the Southern States?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. It was not an objection; it was an inquiry.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do hope the Senator can support the amendment, because it is a truth-telling amendment. The Senator from Texas is one of the most candid and forthright Members of this body. I hope he does not object to the amendment simply upon the basis of having to make a few more reports, which I realize can be burdensome, but, goodness knows, we all make them. I hope the Senator will not depart from the general philosophy and objective of this proposed legislation merely because it may require the copying of a few additional reports.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. May I suggest to the distinguished Senator from Missouri that the amendment which is proposed by me would furnish all the information that the Senator's bill would furnish, but would provide for simplification of reports——

Mr. HENNINGS. If the Senator will present an amendment that will comply with the time requirement and provisions of the present bill, we shall accept it. Anything that is simpler is generally better. I do not know how the Senator's amendment would affect legislation as relating to all 50 States of the Union.

I do wish I had had an opportunity to see the amendment before the hour of a quarter after 4 this afternoon. Perhaps the Senator from Texas and I can work out something better. I offer my services for that purpose, and will stay here until midnight or after to do it.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I thank the Senator. I would not ask the Senator to remain until midnight.

Mr. HENNINGS. I understand the Senator's problem. I am sure he understands a part of ours.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I can thoroughly give sympathy to the objective of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. Three bills have been reported in 7 years, and we have done the very best we can. After three bills were reported, we tried to perfect them by some amendments. Some of us have been interested in this subject for 10 years, ever since we have been on the committee and have become interested in such legislation, which happens to be true in my own case.

This amendment is presented to me. I would like to accept it, but I cannot accept it until I take a look at it, compare it with the rest of the bill, and have some of my able aides of the committee do the same thing.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I shall present it later, so the Senator will have an opportunity to study it.

Mr. HENNINGS. I deeply appreciate it. I thank the Senator from Texas for his spirit of helpfulness and for attempting to assist us in the formulation of forthright legislation.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I thank the Senator for his offer to work with us on it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that my able colleague, who is very much interested in this legislation, and who has been most helpful in making various suggestions with relation to it, and indeed offering legislation of his own and amendments of his own with respect to it, wishes to speak, I am very glad now to yield the floor.

I should like to pay tribute to the Senator from Tennessee, who also served in what some of us have called the rather unrewarding and thankless job of chairman of the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections when, in 1956, I resigned the chairmanship because I was a candidate that year. I tried to resign several years before, but I was not permitted to resign, because certain contests were coming up, and I suppose I had worked myself into that job because I was in so many of these contests, and some Senators were deluded into thinking that I knew more about those laws than other Senators did, which I now disclaim. Like so many other things, we find the drafting of legislation is exceedingly complex, but the basic principles upon which the legislation is based are very simple.

With that thought and my thanks to the junior Senator from Tennessee, I yield the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am indeed grateful for the generous remarks of the able senior Senator from Missouri. It is with the greatest of appreciation that I say to you, Mr. President, that the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri has labored long and diligently to bring to enactment a bill which would throw proper safeguards around our elective process. This is important, because the quest for democracy must never cease. The battle continues from day to day, year to year, from generation to generation, from issue to issue. Today the Senate is considering means of safeguarding, protecting, and making more meaningful the elective process.

The essence of democracy is that each individual citizen have a voice in his government, in its policies, in its administration, and in the selection of parties and persons to see to its day-to-day operation. In the ballot box each voice is equal.

But, Mr. President, there is more to the meaningful exercise of the franchise than the mere right to cast a ballot, important as this is. Not only must the ballot itself be free; it must offer choices and be protected against the undue influence of money in our elections.

In the early days of our Nation, even the right of suffrage was hedged about by many qualifications. Some of these qualifications had to do with the economic status of the individual voter or prospective officeholder.

Perhaps we forget that under our early State constitutions possession of a freehold estate was a common suffrage qualification. The power of the purse was even more in evidence in the qualifications for holding office. In Massachusetts the Governor had to possess property worth at least £1,000, a considerable sum in that day. In Maryland he had to own no less than £5,000 worth of property. It has been estimated that, in the 1780's in Massachusetts, only about 16 percent of the population enjoyed the right to vote. An even smaller percentage was eligible to hold office.

Property qualifications were gradually reduced and removed in one State after another. The direct power of the purse was broken. Such pronouncements as the one by Justice Samuel Chase, of the U.S. Supreme Court, in 1802, sound strange to us now. In referring to proposals to change the constitution of Maryland to provide for universal male suffrage, he stated.

The change in the State constitution by allowing universal suffrage will in my opinion, certainly and rapidly destroy all protection to property and all security to personal liberty; and our republican constitution will sink into a mobocracy, the worst of all possible governments. The modern doctrines of our late reformers that all men in a state of society are entitled to enjoy equal liberty and equal rights have brought this mighty mischief upon us; and I fear it will rapidly progress until peace and order, freedom, and property, shall be destroyed.

That sounds a bit like some dire predictions we hear now ever so often.

There is no point in detailing further developments in the broadening of the suffrage. We are familiar with the 15th amendment and the 19th amendment.

Yes, Mr. President, we have now progressed to the point where most of us are willing to admit that any citizen, not disqualified by reason of insufficient age, lack of sufficient mental capacity, or the like, is qualified to vote without reference to property qualifications, and that all should be permitted and encouraged to qualify to vote and to vote.

But a new menace has arisen. Again the power of the purse threatens the meaningful participation of the individual in the democratic process.

Today, advances in the social sciences, in advertising and merchandising, and the ready access of all individuals to mass media of communications such as newspapers, radio, and television, have combined to present us with a new threat to the proper selection of candidates and the proper decisions on issues through the elective process.

Means of thwarting the public will, means of warping the public will, means of manufacturing public opinion, are readily at hand for those who have the price to pay.

Today the candidate for public office who has access to unlimited funds has many advantages over the candidate who can purchase no forum from which to present his views. Today money can buy Madison Avenue promotional techniques and facilities. Money can give the candidate radio and television time. Money can give the candidate newspaper advertising. A staff of researchers and writers can have quality speeches suitable for all occasions ready at hand and available at a moment's notice.

These things, and others that money will buy, can be helpful to our electorate if used in moderation in reasonably equal amounts by both contestants. But if the big money is on one side a great advantage may be gained.

Now, these ideas are not original with me, although I have had them for a long time. As long ago as 1952, a great Republican statesman, the late Robert A. Taft, understood this.

Perhaps Senators have read the memorandum which was written by the late Senator Taft shortly after his defeat for the Republican nomination in 1952. Mr. Taft gave much of the credit, or attached much of the blame, for his defeat for the presidential nomination by General Eisenhower to the power of New York financial interests.

Here is Senator Taft's own assessment from his memorandum as quoted in U.S. News & World Report:

First, it was the power of the New York financial interests and a large number of businessmen subject to New York influence, who had selected General Eisenhower as their candidate at least a year ago. There was a strong and substantial minority of Taft supporters among business leaders, but they were a minority, particularly in the East.

Mr. President, I think Senator Taft was correct in his assessment of the power of the purse in our political activities today.

In 1956 I served as chairman of the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, and in that capacity conducted an investigation of political contributions and expenditures during the 1956 general election campaigns. My committee cataloged direct expenditures of campaign committees in excess of $33 million.

I repeat—this applied only to the general elections. We made no investigation as to the expenditures in the primaries or in the conventions of the two political parties.

Mr. President, I am convinced that $33 million can influence a lot of votes. I am also convinced that my subcommittee was not able to catalog anywhere near the total amount of money spent to influence voters during the 1956 general election campaigns. But even if this were all the money thus spent, it is entirely too much. And particularly so when it goes preponderantly to one side.

Much of the expenditures we cataloged in 1956 were made in the mass media field. We were able to trace almost $4.5 million in newspaper political advertising. We were able to trace almost $10 million in political advertising by radio and television.

I think it is not surprising to find that those who have fortuitously inherited wealth, or who have, by one means or another, accumulated wealth, are the heavy contributors to political campaign funds. A man who does not have big money cannot contribute big money.

Neither is it surprising to find these people contributing preponderantly to that political party with policies most favorable to large vested interests.

My subcommittee attempted to trace and catalog campaign contributions by various categories. Of course we could not follow all contributions. We attempted to determine who contributed amounts of $500 or more and we tried to find out where the money went.

In running down these contributions some interesting patterns developed. For example, we found that an overwhelming proportion of the contributions from organized labor, though smaller than other mass amounts, went to candidates of the Democratic Party.

We found that officials of the 47 leading underwriters of investment bonds contributed, in individual amounts of $500 or more, a total of $237,800 to Republicans against only $2,000 to Democrats. This, of course, is not surprising. It is, nonetheless, in my opinion, deplorable.

We found $51,600 contributed to Republicans by officials of 37 leading advertising agencies. We were unable to find any $500 contributions from these officials to Democrats.

Checking among officials of the 29 largest oil companies, we found $344,997 for Republicans and $14,650 for Democrats.

Officials of the 100 largest military prime contractors gave, according to our records, $1,133,882 to Republicans and $40,975 to Democrats.

We found, among officers, regional and honorary vice presidents, and directors of the National Association of Manufacturers, 21 individuals who contributed $81,475 to Republicans. According to the information received by the subcommittee, Democrats received nothing whatsoever from this notable group.

The Democrats registered zero with officers and directors of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, too.

It was a matter of concern to me to discover that, among contributions of $500 or more made by individuals, our committee received reports showing that individuals in the State of New York gave almost as much money to the Republican Party as the Democratic Party received from all States, including New York. In fact, individuals listing a Manhattan Island address contributed more to the Republican Party than the Democratic Party got from all such contributions throughout the entire United States, exclusive of Manhattan Island.

I was equally concerned to note the high percentage of Democratic Party contributions which came from New York. As reported to our committee, among contributions of $500 or more from individuals to the Democratic Party, 37 percent came from the State of New York.

This is not to speak in derogation of that State. It is to state a fact—that both political parties lean heavily upon the financial center of New York City for campaign contributions. One party received by far the greater amount, of course, but I wish to give the facts regarding both parties. As reported to our committee, among contributions of $500 or more from individuals to the Democratic Party, 37 percent came from the State of New York. I think it is dangerous and unwise for either party to be thus indebted to, or forced to seek contributions from—or, if that term is not satisfactory, to accept contributions from this tight little group of titans who manipulate our Nation's financial strings from the canyons of Wall Street.

At this point I wish to invite attention to the policies of the Federal Government presently in effect, which operate so greatly to the benefit of this group.

The investigation and report of the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections provided a dramatic illustration of the complete inadequacy of existing law regulating the contribution and expenditure of funds for the purpose of influencing elections. The Congress not only has the power, but it has a clear responsibility and duty, to enact meaningful legislation to protect our democratic processes in the public interest. I am gratified that after long delay the Senate is proceeding to consider a bill on this subject. For 3 years I have undertaken to bring such legislation to the floor of the Senate. Now that the Senate is considering a bill, I hope it will enact an effective measure.

In my view, meaningful and effective legislation governing the use of money in elections must contain certain fundamental provisions.

First, there must be some reasonable limit on the amount which any one individual may contribute for use in political campaigns during a calendar year. The present law is utterly meaningless in this regard. Individuals can and do contribute money to candidates and parties of their choice in amounts which are limited only by the size of their pocketbook and their willingness to contribute. One who contributes upward of $100,000 during the course of a campaign is obviously exercising a degree of influence on the outcome which is far out of proportion to the one vote he is permitted to cast.

One who, over a year or a period of years, spends uncounted thousands, and perhaps uncounted hundreds of thousands of dollars, to influence the election of a presidential nominee of either political party, is exercising an influence over the Democratic or Republican Party to which, in my view, no citizen should be entitled.

Contributions in such large amounts are inimical to the process of representative government, which envisages the election of public officials by the free choice of the entire electorate. Just as I have spoken of the freedom of an individual to contribute whatever amounts he may be willing to contribute, the same is true of certain interests represented by a group of individuals fortuitously situated. This situation constitutes a threat to government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

I feel strongly that there should not only be an overall limitation on the aggregate amount which may be contributed by one individual, but that there should be further and more restrictive limitations upon the amount which an individual of one State may contribute to influence the election of a candidate for the U.S. Senate or the U.S. House of Representatives in some State other than his own.

By what right does a wealthy individual in one State exercise influence in the choice of a representative for the people of another State far and away greater than that which a voter in that State can bring about through the casting of his ballot?

A representative of the people in either the House or the Senate should be selected on the basis of the free choice of the people whom he represents directly, without undue influence from those outside the State who have special interests which they may wish to protect or preserve.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator a question, if I may.

Mr. GORE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Has the able Senator from Tennessee ever gone into another State and made a speech for or against a candidate for the Senate running for election in that State?

Mr. GORE. I have spoken in many States in the course of our national campaigns, in support of candidates of my party.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Does the Senator think that that is a violation of the principle he is laying down today?

Mr. GORE. I do not so construe it, because what I can contribute in the way of a speech is information, ideas, perhaps encouragement, and is perhaps to encourage enthusiasm of the workers and supporters of a particular candidate. It is something that does not cost a great deal of money. My party speeches are always free, I assure the Senator.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I would say this to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee. If a had my choice between receiving a $1,000 contribution from a resident of Tennessee and having come into Oregon the eloquent, persuasive, and influential voice of the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], raised in my behalf, I would much prefer that the latter would be done for me.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate the compliment. I have never had such a value placed upon my feeble efforts. I volunteer now to speak at Klamath Falls, at Eugene, and in as many cities as the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon wishes me to speak in Oregon in his behalf.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I appreciate immensely the very generous offer of the junior Senator from Tennessee, and his kind offer is taken up herewith by me. I know that we sometimes speak rhetorically in the Senate, but I hope he did not so speak just now.

I do wish to say in all seriousness that I feel we should not compartmentalize ourselves too much. We are 50 States, but we are also 1 Nation. I have the feeling that I have much more interest, for example, in who the two Senators from Tennessee are than in who is the Governor of Tennessee. It makes very little difference to me who is the Governor of Tennessee. He can only pass upon laws which prevail in Tennessee.

However, the two Senators from Tennessee can have a voice in making laws which apply equally in Oregon as they do in Tennessee.

I wonder if we should say we will adopt a provision which proclaims that a resident of the Tennessee Valley has no interest whatever in the presence in the Senate of a man who believes the Tennessee Valley Authority should be dismembered. In other words, the TVA is a part of the very lifeblood of the area which the distinguished Senator from Tennessee represents so well. Let us assume that a certain other Senator says the Tennessee Valley Authority should be abolished. He would certainly have the right to advocate such a step. Would the Senator from Tennessee say that a person who lives in the Tennessee Valley, who obtains cheap power from TVA, benefits from flood control, benefits through the improvement of his farm, and obtains recreation, navigation, and all the other things which are a part of TVA, cannot make a contribution in a campaign in opposition to the Senator from another State who would abolish TVA?

I just wonder if that is a wise principle to put into law? I again emphasize that although we are 50 States, those who are sent to the Senate from the 50 States enact legislation for the whole country.

Mr. GORE. I believe the able Senator has displayed remarkable ability in raising the question of national interest in the makeup of the National Congress. Undoubtedly all have an interest. However, under our system it is the prerogative of the people of Tennessee to send to Washington representatives of their own choosing.

I would not prevent any individual in Tennessee from making a contribution to the campaign of a candidate for the House of Representatives or for the Senate from another State. However, I do say that there should be a limit. When one candidate receives substantial sums from without the State, his opponent may find it necessary to seek similar assistance. When I am a candidate for the Senate I undertake to encourage enough contributions to keep a headquarters open. I am aware of the fact that it is general knowledge that I am not one who has ever had a great deal of money with which to conduct a political campaign.

Mr. NEUBERGER. The Senator from Tennessee is so able and attractive that he does not need a great deal of money.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Oregon is overly generous. Money comes in very handy, I will say, particularly when television time is so expensive that 1 or 2 minutes cost a great deal of money.

I realize that the people in Tennessee have an interest in the Senator from Oregon. We have a very vital interest in the election of men who will take a national viewpoint, who will regard the development of natural resources in the Tennessee Valley as the development of natural resources of the United States of America.

The people of Tennessee have sent to the Senate for several years now Senators who take a similar view with respect to the development of natural resources in Oregon. It does not necessarily follow, though, that because of our interest in the election of broadminded Senators from Oregon that we should have the right, if we had the funds, to send unlimited slush funds into Oregon to thwart the will of the people of Oregon.

In modest amount, I would permit it. But I should like to point out to the Senator a rather classic example of the type of abuse permitted by present law. I will not use names, because I prefer not to identify the persons. But a very prominent American, who has long been interested in public affairs, and who has displayed a marked interest in America's welfare, told me he went to a very wealthy citizen of Pennsylvania and solicited a sizable campaign contribution for a candidate for the U.S. Senate in Pennsylvania. The reply of the wealthy individual was that the amount requested would be but a drop in the bucket in the campaign of a candidate in Pennsylvania; that we can take that much and buy the election of a Senator in a small mountain State.

I say we need to take these things into consideration. Let an individual in New York, or Texas, or Tennessee, or Maine, or any other State, make a reasonable contribution to the campaign of the junior Senator from Tennessee or the junior Senator from Oregon, or others; but the sky should not remain the limit; there should be some reasonable limitation upon the amount of such contributions, I submit to the Senator.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee that there should be reasonable limitations, not only on contributions made across State lines, but on all political campaign contributions.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I believe the Senator from Tennessee is aware of the fact that I have been the sponsor of a bill which would eliminate all private benefactions and would have the U.S. Government finance all campaigns, as was first advocated by President Theodore Roosevelt more than half a century ago. So the Senator from Tennessee and I are not very far apart in our views.

I call attention to the fact that there is a certain danger to our national cohesiveness in proposing any compartmentalization of campaign contributions. For example—and I know the Senator from Tennessee would not propose this—one could say, with certainly collateral logic, that a resident of the Second Congressional District of Tennessee should be forbidden to contribute to a campingn for the House of Representatives in the First Congressional District of Tennessee, because it is obvious that no one in the Second District of Tennessee can vote in the First Congressional District. I know the Senator from Tennessee would not want to go that far in compartmentalizing this proposal.

We have had the situation where certain exponents of so-called big business have made large campaign contributions across State boundaries to races for the Senate in Oregon on behalf of Republican candidates. On the other hand, to be fair, we also have had situations in which certain trade-union political education funds have made substantial contributions across State lines in Oregon to the campaigns of Democratic candidates for the Senate. This has become a practice.

If I am not mistaken, the last senatorial campaign of the late Senator Robert A. Taft, of Ohio, which was in 1950, benefited by tens of thousands of dollars of contributions from conservatives all over the United States, not simply those in Ohio. They admired Senator Taft.

I know that when a liberal candidate of national reputation runs for office, he receives contributions from liberal-minded citizens all over the United States, to whom he has become a symbol.

I would not want to destroy the national interest which there is in a seat in the U.S. Senate, where so much influence is cast on laws for the whole country.

I think the Senator from Tennessee has done a public service, as he so often contributes in this Chamber, by raising the issue and bringing before us a question which I feel ultimately has to be settled. I simply wanted to be careful that we do not do anything which will jeopardize the status of the Senate as a national body, and cause it to be something which will be divided into many separate compartments.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Oregon has contributed greatly to this debate. I concede that there is great merit to his view, and in that light I wish to call his attention to the fact that if we had a limit of, say, $500 which a person from one State could contribute to a campaign within another State, that $500 might be duplicated by his wife, by his son, by his daughter, and by his daughter-in-law. Some of his friends might be encouraged to make similar contributions.

I do not seek in any way, nor do I desire, to prevent reasonable contributions and the movement of campaign money in reasonable amounts across State lines; but in this day of monopoly, in this period when small business is being pushed to the wall, when the big get bigger and the rich get richer and more powerful, in this day when the tax policy of the U.S. Government is so vital to certain vested interests, there is a temptation, as well as an opportunity, for a few with vested interests to combine their wealth, particularly in the small States, and bring to bear an influence in this Chamber which is inimical to the public welfare.

I may say to the junior Senator from Oregon that I shall now refer to one other provision which is omitted from the bill before the Senate. That is a limitation on campaign expenditures in presidential campaigns. When the able junior Senator from Oregon seeks reelection next fall, he will be on the Democratic ticket headed by the Democratic candidate for President. It is ineffective, it seems to me, to place ceilings and restrictions upon campaign expenditures of candidates for the office of Senator and Representative who are running on the same ticket with candidates for President and Vice President, without imposing limitations on campaign expenditures made on behalf of candidates for President and Vice President. If we want to do this job effectively, we cannot do it piecemeal. We must apply restrictions not only upon the amounts which an individual can contribute, not only upon the amounts which one campaign committee can expend, but we must also impose a ceiling upon the total expenditures which can go into the effort to influence public opinion and bring about the election of a Representative, a Senator, and a President.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Inasmuch as the able Senator from Tennessee has spoken of presidential contests, what about presidential primaries, which have become so important and so symbolic in creating public sentiment for or against certain candidates for President? We all know that the primaries have become so decisive that, in relatively recent years, the fate of national figures like Thomas E. Dewey, Wendell L. Willkie, and Harold Stassen, in their presidential aspirations, has been decided in the presidential primaries in certain States. Yet there is no public record at all of the financing of their campaigns in the presidential primaries.

Mr. GORE. I agree completely with the statement of the junior Senator from Oregon that such a provision is omitted from the bill. I agree that it should be included in the bill. But I am happy to say that the chairman of the committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], has offered an amendment, which is now pending and which I support, which will bring within the terms of the bill not only the primary elections for the nomination of Senators and Representatives, but also the nominating conventions and primary elections for the nomination of candidates for the office of President and Vice President. Is that not correct?

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is entirely correct; that is one of the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I join the Senator from Tennessee in supporting this very worthy amendment, as I stated yesterday, which has been joined in by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from New York.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee, and I desire to congratulate him on them. Unfortunately, I was called out of the Chamber during part of his address.

Will he discuss the desirability of prohibiting contributions by minors who themselves are not entitled to vote? As the Senator from Tennessee knows, contributions of that type have been subjected to great abuse by a number of the wealthier families of the country.

Mr. GORE. I have not yet referred to that point. One would naturally wonder what legitimate political interest an infant would have in the nomination or election of a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives from a State far removed from the playground of the infant, and what moral right there exists for the exercise of such an influence.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Will my good friend, the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the committee, state whether he gave any consideration to the desirability of prohibiting contributions by persons who themselves are too young to vote?

Mr. GORE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HENNINGS. Let me say to my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania—and I do so through the courtesy of the Senator from Tennessee—that this point was considered. Of course we know that as regards tracing the source of a contribution, a minor has no right, as a general rule, to make such a contribution if he is the beneficiary of a trust fund or if his income is in some way or other subject to the influence or control of others.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator from Missouri not agree that the record shows that a number of the wealthier families in the country—for instance, I recall that the Du Pont family was one, although I would not wish to single out only that one family—have made, in the names of their children, contributions to the Republican Party?

Mr. HENNINGS. We noticed that as long as 8 or 10 years ago; and in that connection I might also refer to a very prominent family in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct; and let us name the family—the Pew family.

Mr. HENNINGS. Well, that is not far from it.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Could it be that their offsprings are precocious?

Mr. CLARK. That is a possibility, but I would not think it a probability in that case.

Mr. HENNINGS. This point was covered by the bill as reported in 1957.

Mr. CLARK. I would not pursue the subject further, except to say that in my judgment such a limitation would be a wise one; and that the principle supported by the Senator from Tennessee, although questioned to some extent by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], probably is, on the whole, desirable—namely, that one who is not entitled to vote for a candidate for nomination or election should not be entitled to contribute to the campaign of that candidate.

I realize that such a prohibition might cause difficulties in some of the States in which a preponderance of the wealthy persons in the State are in one political party. But I believe that matter could be handled by strictly limiting the amount of the contributions by any individual or group of individuals, while at the same time providing a tax credit for small contributions, as suggested by the junior Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from Oregon, and myself.

Mr. HENNINGS. We certainly gave that point a great deal of thought—as we have tried to do to every possible development in connection with a primary campaign or a general election campaign, and as we did in connection with Senate bill 2150, introduced on July 3, 1957, and reported by the Committee on Rules and Administration

Mr. CLARK. Is that bill the one known as the Hennings-Green bill?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes. It was reported by the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] on July 3, 1957, and was Calendar No. 585.

The particular provisions were that—

> It shall be unlawful for any person to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election of candidates in any name other than his own; or for any candidate, political committee, or other person to accept or receive any contribution prohibited under this section.
>
> It shall be unlawful for any individual under the age of 18 years to make a contribution or expenditure in an amount exceeding $100, and for any person knowingly to authorize, ratify, or receive any such contribution.

I may say that we have tried in many ways to have the bill reach this floor, and we have offered many alternatives, many of which have been rejected by the committee, and others have been rejected by me.

Mr. CLARK. As a matter of legislative history, does the Senator from Missouri believe that the provisions of his amendment which restrict contributions, directly or indirectly, in excess of a particular amount would prohibit this method of making gifts by minors, from funds given to them, for contribution purposes, by their parents or their grandparents?

Mr. HENNINGS. I believe the phrase "indirectly" would substantially cover the matter, and that is really the amendment.

However, this situation reminds me of the one in regard to the gift tax imposed on any sums in excess of $3,000. Seven or eight years ago we found, to our amazement, that the Bureau of Internal Revenue was not doing anything about undertaking to collect gift taxes on contributions in excess of $3,000. We had officials of the Bureau appear before us and testify in regard to that matter, and that was the substance of their testimony.

So there are many, many ways in which it would be possible to make the proposed legislation better than it now stands, or even better than it would be if all these amendments were to be adopted.

We have tried to present a relatively simple series of amendments in conjunction with the bill as reported so as to make some progress this year in dealing with election legislation.

Mr. GORE. I should like to point out to the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania that Senate bill 440, which I introduced last year, contains on page 24 a provision which would prohibit contributions by persons under the age of 18, and, likewise, it contains a provision which would prevent one person from making a contribution in the name of another person.

Mr. CLARK. Do those amendments contain these prohibitions?

Mr. GORE. No; they do not.

Frankly, I think the action which the Senate takes on the pending amendment which has been offered by the senior Senator from Missouri will determine whether the Senate wants to have effective legislation in this field enacted.

Mr. CLARK. I agree completely with my friend the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Let me say that I agree with both my friend the Senator from Tennessee and my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania, especially on that particular issue.

Mr. GORE. I have some amendments at the desk, and I have discussed them with the distinguished and able senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the chairman of the committee.

If his amendment shall be agreed to, then further amendments will be offered and a serious effort will be made to secure their adoption. But unless the Senate shall agree to include primary elections and conventions and nomination campaigns, then perhaps all other proceedings will be pro forma.

Would the Senator from Missouri agree with that candid observation?

Mr. HENNINGS. I would say that, unhappily, is a doleful fact. Should the Senate fail to face up to its responsibility in this matter and fail to come to the realization that it has a duty to the American people, both in reporting and in compliance, to see that the full light of publicity be allowed to shine on all things that happen in primary as well as general elections, then a great deal of the useful purpose of this bill, as these amendments would, I think, tend to improve it, would be defeated. It would be an occasion of deep regret to me, and I think an occasion of disappointment and dismay to the American people, if the Senate failed to live up to its own moral standards with respect to conduct in our own primaries and our own general elections.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator. This discussion illustrates one other thing. The pending bill, though it makes some improvements on existing law with respect to reporting, is in fact little more than a shell. Provisions offered in the committee which would place effective limits and safeguards upon the aggregate amount which could lawfully be contributed by an individual, the amount which could lawfully be expended in a campaign for election to the House of Representatives or the Senate, or in a campaign for nomination or election to the offices of President and Vice President, were rejected.

Mr. HENNINGS. I might say to the Senator that I offered many amendments which were rejected, one of them by a vote of 5 to 4, in committee. I am now offering these same strengthening amendments on the floor. I wanted to make that fact clear.

Mr. GORE. I hope the Senator understands I implied no criticism of him.

Mr. HENNINGS. I know the Senator did not. I wanted other Senators, who may have come to the floor and not heard all the discussion, to understand that even though the committee voted to report a bill to the Senate, many of us were not satisfied that it was a complete bill, or, I may say, a completely honest bill, in terms of serving the purposes in which some of us believe so deeply.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator. I am glad the bill was reported. I would have much preferred the reporting of a more effective bill, but I am glad that finally the Senate is considering the matter, and that we shall have an opportunity to vote on it.

I wish that more Senators and Representatives were concerned. I wish more of the American people were aroused to the danger of having public opinion molded, bent in certain directions and for certain purposes, by the unlimited use of financial resources.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point for one question?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. During the 3 days of debate on this one amendment, is the Senator aware that there have been no more than three or four Senators who have taken this floor and expressed opposition to the pending amendment relating to primaries? I set forth that statement as a fact, if the Senator is not aware of it, because I have been here most of the time, if not all the time.

Mr. GORE. Then perhaps the amendment can be adopted.

Mr. HENNINGS. The fact that there seems to be no interest, as the Senator has indicated, may or may not be indicative of the disposition of the Members of the Senate to vote one way or the other; but there have been no substantial arguments offered as to constitutionality or as to precedents or as to jurisdiction of the Senate over this subject matter relating to primaries.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I think many of us are aware that the very presence of this bill is a tribute not only to the Senator from Missouri, who has been a leader in the committee, but also to the monumental study of campaign spending in 1956 which was carried out under the guidance of the Senator from Tennessee.

To demonstrate the truth of what the Senator from Tennessee has said about the potential dominance of large campaign contributions, we need only recall that a great Republican President, Theodore Roosevelt, warned us about this matter in 1907, which was decades before the era of television and radio.

Today one single network presentation on TV costs nearly as much as an entire national campaign did half a century ago. Imagine what the views of Teddy Roosevelt would be had he lived until today and could see campaign funds 200, 300, 400, and 500 times the size of what they were back in 1907, when he warned against huge campaign contributions that could be used to shape and control the course of government in the United States.

Mr. GORE. Can the Senator think of a more glaring example than the fact that one political party, in the last presidential campaign, received more campaign money from one small island in the United States than the other party received from all the remainder of the United States and its insular possessions combined? That fact illustrates the dangerous situation to which we have already come. And the memorandum of the late Senator Taft illustrates how these same influences can operate in the selection of our nominees for President who, let me remind my colleagues, is a part of the legislative process, as well as being the Chief Executive.

Effective legislation should contain realistic and effective limitations on the amount which may be spent either by or on behalf of any candidate for Federal office. Here existing law is farcical. The ostensible limits contained in the present law are set unrealistically low and are completely ignored by resort to the presently legal process of having funds spent by committees—one committee after another—of which the candidate is presumed to be legally unaware. Unless the entire sum spent in behalf of a candidate is chargeable against the ceiling which may be established, there is no point in specifying a ceiling at all.

In the third place, legislation should provide for full and timely disclosure to the public of the source and the use made of campaign funds. Present law requires the reporting of only a small fraction of the total sums involved. And such reports as are required are made at times and in a manner which, as a practical matter, preclude timely disclosure to the general public.

The bill reported by the committee makes a start in correcting the conditions which make possible present abuses. I am frank to say, however, that it makes only a start.

The pending bill does contain provisions which would provide a greater degree of public disclosure of the information required by the bill to be reported. This is a step in the right direction. I do not think the bill goes far enough in this regard in that it provides for only one report prior to the election. Furthermore, no provision is made for the automatic publication of the information contained in the reports.

The committee bill contains no effective overall limitation whatever on the amount which may be contributed by any one individual. It would continue the present practice under which an individual may contribute the specified limit to as many different candidates or campaign committees as he may choose, limited only by the amount of money he has available to contribute.

The limitations on expenditures by candidates for the Senate and House of Representatives as contained in the bill are ineffective because they can and will be evaded and ignored by the same procedure which is employed under existing law.

I have referred to the lack of any provision to regulate expenditures in campaigns for the Presidency. The Presidency of the United States is by far the most important elective office for which citizens have the responsibility and the privilege of casting a vote. Indeed, it is the most important temporal office in the world.

I see no valid reason why the presidential campaign should be exempt from reasonable restrictions as to the expenditure of funds and reasonable requirements for the reporting of such expenditures in such a manner as to make possible timely disclosure to the public.

Mr. President, as I have indicated, the bill reported by the committee should be strengthened in the areas to which I have referred, and can be improved in other details. Amendments are at the desk or in the process of being prepared which, if adopted, will accomplish this result.

I congratulate the senior Senator from Missouri upon the strengthening amendments which he has offered.

I say in all candor, however, Mr. President, that no bill on this vital subject can adequately protect the public interest unless the entire elective process is covered.

The amendment of the Senator from Missouri, which is now pending, would extend application of the bill to primary elections for Federal offices.

Unless this amendment is agreed to, in my view, which is shared by the senior Senator from Missouri, even though the bill is otherwise amended along the lines I have indicated, the use of money in Federal elections will in large measure remain subject to no effective Federal regulation.

Selection of nominees of the major political parties is just as important as is the election of one of them. This is true in any State. In many States, as is commonly known, selection of the nominee of one of the major political parties is decisive. And not all of these States are in the South as some appear to assume.

I see no valid justification whatever for leaving completely unregulated by Federal law the use of money in so important an aspect of Federal elections.

I regard the vote on the pending amendment as crucial. By its action on this amendment the Senate will demonstrate whether it is seriously interested in safeguarding Federal elections. I urge the Senate to face the issue squarely and realistically.

Finally, after years of effort, a clean elections bill is before the Senate. Let us not be satisfied with voting merely for a title. Let us make the bill effective. I hope the amendment will be agreed to, and that the Senate will then proceed to the task of perfecting the bill in a manner which will provide adequate protection for the right of citizens to exercise a free choice in the selection of those by whom they are to be governed.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, several days ago, during the debate on the amendment which has just been adopted, the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] attempted to obtain the floor to make a short statement, but he was unable to do so. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be printed before the vote on the amendment just adopted.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CASE OF NEW JERSEY

I want to register as strongly as I can my support of the pending amendment to include primaries within the scope of the reporting requirements of the Federal election laws.

As a member of the Rules Committee when it earlier considered revision of the laws, I am well aware of the difficulties attendant upon revision. The members of the committee in the 85th Congress labored long and hard over a revision designed to bring the laws into line with modern conditions and political realities and also to provide more effective protection to the public interest in clean elections.

The members of the committee recognized that the bill as finally reported was not perfect, but we could say with confidence that it represented a real step forward, primarily because it did include primaries within the scope of regulation.

The inclusion of primaries is a key provision to any meaningful revision of our election laws. From a constitutional point of view, there is no obstacle to making them subject to Federal regulation. The Supreme Court has clearly ruled that Congress has such authority with regard to the nomination of candidates for election to Congress.

From a political point of view, in approximately one-third of the States, the primary is the election. Not to include them is to deny information rightfully in the public domain.

Exemption of the primary makes impossible a fair and comprehensive accounting of campaign practices. The whole purpose of the bill is to make available to the American people the facts as to campaign expenditures and practices on the basis of which they can make their own judgment. This principle of public disclosure as the most effective protection against improper use of money to influence election results has been the basic philosophy of the regulation of Federal elections. The principle is a sound one, but we are not applying it if we provide for only partial disclosure. The American people are entitled to the full story, and only the inclusion of primaries in the bill will assure that.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I wish to express my appreciation for the many contributions which have been made, including the able address by the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] for himself and the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], designated "1–13–60–0." On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is this the amendment which would include primaries in the instant bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS]. If present and voting he would vote nay. If I were at liberty to vote I would vote yea. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PASTORE (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with my distinguished colleague from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], who is confined to his bed with the flu. If he were present and voting he would vote in the negative. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote in the affirmative. I therefore withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] are absent on official business. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] is absent because of illness. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is necessarily absent. The Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] is absent on official business for the Latin American Trade Study Mission as Chairman of the Latin American Trade Subcommittee of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. If present and voting, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] would vote "yea."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]. If present and voting the Senator from Minnesota would vote "yea," and the Senator from Alabama would vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK] is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—50

Aiken	Hartke	Morton
Anderson	Hennings	Moss
Bartlett	Jackson	Mundt
Bush	Javits	Muskie
Byrd, W. Va.	Keating	Neuberger
Carroll	Kefauver	Prouty
Case, N.J.	Kennedy	Proxmire
Case, S. Dak.	Kuchel	Randolph
Church	Lausche	Scott
Clark	Long, Hawaii	Smith
Cooper	McCarthy	Symington
Douglas	McGee	Wiley
Engle	McNamara	Williams, N.J.
Gore	Magnuson	Williams, Del.
Green	Martin	Yarborough
Gruening	Monroney	Young, Ohio
Hart	Morse

NAYS—39

Allott	Dirksen	Johnston, S.C.
Beall	Ellender	Jordan
Bennett	Ervin	Kerr
Bible	Fong	Long, La.
Bridges	Frear	McClellan
Brunsdale	Fulbright	Robertson
Butler	Goldwater	Russell
Byrd, Va.	Hayden	Saltonstall
Cannon	Hickenlooper	Schoeppel
Capehart	Hill	Stennis
Carlson	Holland	Talmadge
Cotton	Hruska	Thurmond
Curtis	Johnson, Tex.	Young, N. Dak.

NOT VOTING—11

Chavez	Humphrey	Pastore
Dodd	Mansfield	Smathers
Dworshak	Murray	Sparkman
Eastland	O'Mahoney

So the amendment offered by Mr. HENNINGS (for himself and Mr. KEATING) was agreed to.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENNINGS. I move that that motion be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion to table was agreed to.

Mr. PROUTY obtained the floor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] without losing the floor in order that he may offer an amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, first I wish to thank all Members of the Senate for the patient consideration they have given to the amendment and, indeed, to our efforts, extending over some 7 years, to improve the present Corrupt Practices Act of 1925.

I express especial gratification and gratitude, indeed, to those who have supported this all-important and basic amendment, which has given the Senate an opportunity to be honest with itself, to be honest with the people of the country, and to further maintain the self respect of this body and to make this body free from taint and, insofar as can be, free from any suggestion of undue and improper influence because of the use of money unreported in primary elections, and for the further realization by this great body that primary elections are, indeed, an integral part of the electoral process, as the courts and the precedents have abundantly held.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate by speaking at length, having done so for the past 3 or 4 days. I should like now, because of the gracious consideration of the Senator from Vermont, who has yielded to me, to have my amendment designated 1–13–60–D stated and made the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, it is proposed to strike out lines 3 to 12, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(3) The term "political committee" includes any committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures in an aggregate amount exceeding $1,000 in any calendar year for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence in any manner whatsoever the election of a candidate or candidates or presidential or vice presidential electors;.

On page 16, strike out lines 3 to 12, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(3) The term "political committee" includes any committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures in an aggregate amount exceeding $1,000 in any calendar year for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence in any manner whatsoever the election of a candidate or candidates or presidential or vice presidential electors;.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to ask the majority leader, while most of the Senators are present, what is proposed by way of business for the remainder of the day?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will say to the Senator from Illinois publicly what I said privately: We have had the bill under consideration for several days, trying to make some progress. I believe more Senators are now on the floor than has been the case during the duration of the debate. I hope that while they are here, we may proceed to dispose of some of the amendments. So long as we are able to accomplish anything, I should like to have the Senate remain in session and do so.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I appreciate the willingness of the Senator from Vermont to yield. At this time, when there is a substantial representation of the Senate present, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment which I have just called up and which is now the pending business.

I may say, briefly, that it is the amendment relating to committees within a State, to the Federal regulation of a proliferation of committees receiving contributions and making expenditures within the boundaries of a State, and to reporting requirements of those committees. The amendment has the same philosophy or the same rationale as the amendment relating to primary elections, which the Senate in its wisdom has just adopted.

Because of the great importance of the amendment, I think Senators should have the opportunity to be recorded upon it. Therefore, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I shall proceed to discuss the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will state it.

Mr. CURTIS. What amendment is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CURTIS. Which one?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is designated as "1–13–60–D."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Who presently has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. The floor was yielded to him by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. HENNINGS. I was not aware that the floor had been yielded to me until I was recognized by the Chair. I do not wish to be discourteous, certainly, to the distinguished Senator from Vermont, who was kind enough to yield to me a while ago, by agreement.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, it was my understanding when I yielded the floor before that I would not lose it; that the distinguished Senator from Missouri intended to offer an amendment, and that the activities of the Senate on the bill for this afternoon would then be concluded, and I would have the floor.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not insist upon anything which might result in any disadvantage to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. I understand.

Mr. HENNINGS. If that was the Senator's understanding, I shall most readily comply with it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am trying to ascertain to whom to direct several questions in regard to the pending amendment. I cannot do so unless I discover who has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). The parliamentary situation is that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] had the floor, and yielded to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], with the understanding that the Senator from Vermont would not lose the floor.

The Senator from Missouri has offered his second amendment, and thus far he has not yielded the floor back to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Then at this moment my queries can very properly be addressed to the Senator from Missouri, can they not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield for a question?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In fact, I wish to ask two or three questions.

First, the bill as reported by the Senator from Missouri defined a political committee as one which operates in two or more States. However, the bill as reported excluded local and State committees, did it not?

Mr. HENNINGS. That was the original bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. And such a provision was also contained in the bill as it was reported to the floor, did it not?

Mr. HENNINGS. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Second, the amendment now pending would change that section of the bill, as reported, and would make every committee—whether a local committee, a county committee, a State committee, a local congressional committe, or any other kind of committee—a political committee if it receives and disburses as much as $1,000 in any 1 calendar year. Is that correct?

Mr. HENNINGS. That is substantially correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to ask a third question: That simply means that every local committee and every county committee which receives in contributions as much as $1,000 and spends that much in an election in which presidential electors or Senators or Members of the House of Representatives are involved will have to make all the reports which are required by this bill to a clerk of a Federal court or to the Secretary of the Senate or to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as the case may be. Is that correct?

Mr. HENNINGS. The amendment is explicit in its terms. The 1959 act defines a political committee as one that operates in two or more States to influence the election of candidates for Federal office; and the definition includes State and local committees which are branches or subsidiaries of national committees excluding duly organized State or local committees of a political party, as the Senator from Illinois has said.

All other intrastate or local committees or organizations which function only within a single State are excluded by that definition.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield for an observation?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The pending amendment reads in part as follows:

(3) The term "political committee" includes any committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures in an aggregate amount exceeding $1,000 in any calendar year for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence in any manner whatsoever the election of a candidate or candidates or presidential or vice presidential electors.

There is not any county committee in any 1 of the 3,109 counties in the Nation that does not come within the purview of this amendment and that will not have to make all the required reports to the district court or to the Secretary of the Senate or to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as the case may be. That is what this amendment provides.

Mr. HENNINGS. Let me add that, in compliance with the amendment agreed to only a few minutes ago by the Senate, they will also have to make reports to the people, who I think have some concern about the nature and manner and means by which candidates are nominated and elected to public office.

I believe that the Senator from Illinois, in speaking in opposition to the preceding amendment, made much of the fact that reports would be required and that, somehow or other, the State law might be subverted.

Of course, in the State of Illinois there are no election laws; so there is nothing to worry about, as regards Illinois, because in Illinois there are no legal requirements in regard to primary or general elections.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield further?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What is proposed is a criminal statute.

Mr. HENNINGS. So is the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I know that; but that act does not touch a political committee.

Under this amendment, a county committee or a local committee will have to report; and then the lawyer of the treasurer of each one of those committees will say to him, "Joe, you will have to look out, because unless you keep a pretty good set of books, you may wind up in jail."

So every political organization in the country will be disrupted, before this process ends.

Two years ago, I testified for 2 hours before the committee. I said then that whoever drew up the bill in the first instance must have had in mind the destruction of all the local political organizations; and this amendment is a part of that destruction.

If the amendment is adopted, I should like to see the Senator from Missouri find any man, way out in Podunk or in Bingville who, when in his right mind, ever would accept the job of serving as treasurer of a local committee, when he would know that he would have to make all these reports and when he would know about all the other things he would have to do under the requirements of such a criminal statute.

Mr. President, that is the long and short of the matter; and I am ready to vote on the amendment right now.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. HENNINGS. First, Mr. President, let me say that the distinguished minority leader, with his great gift for oversimplification, and sometimes his lawyer's gift for misdirection of the issue, has failed to state that one of the great evils in American campaigning has always been the setting up of a number of committees—as the distinguished senior Senator from Maine will attest we found when we investigated the election in the State of Ohio. We found that literally a myriad of committees was set up in that State, for both parties; that neither the treasurer for the one candidate nor the treasurer for the other candidate knew how much had been expended by the various local committees for the candidacy of one or the other of the candidates; and that no means whatsoever exists for regulating or determining how much money is spent in a campaign in any given State, because if limits are exceeded, all one has to do is set up another Committee of the Friends of Jo Schmaltz or another Committee of the Friends of any other candidate; and thus there would again be developed the intolerable situation which has been existing in the country for years. All of us and all other persons in the country who are familiar with these matters know that that is the case; and in such circumstances, that procedure would continue to be followed through the use of such committees.

As a result, when the required report is presented, it is a complete fraud upon the people of the country.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois very glibly said, in his remarks in opposition to the amendment which the Senate adopted a few minutes ago, and with his customary facility in the use of words and phrases, that since the Illinois State Legislature in its wisdom had not seen fit to enact any law relating either to primaries or to general elections, he saw no reason why any such law whatsoever should be enacted. Am I correct as to that?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Missouri not only is incorrect, but he is also wide of the mark.

Mr. HENNINGS. Did not the Senator from Illinois say——

Mr. DIRKSEN. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Illinois did not say anything of the kind.

In the course of the debate, the Senator from Illinois said that if the General Assembly of Illinois wanted to legislate with respect to the primary, that was its business. However, we have all the election laws we need. In addition, we come under the Corrupt Practices Act.

But I should say to the distinguished Senator from Missouri, Mr. President, that it is not necessary for him to speak of the minority leader as being "glib"; he does not have to speak about the "adroitness" of the minority leader; he does not have to speak about "the customary way in which the minority leader goes about it."

The minority leader relies upon the language the Senator from Missouri has included in the amendment he has sent to the desk; and a proper understanding of the amendment requires neither "adroitness" nor "legal skill" nor "glibness" nor anything else of the sort.

Mr. President, I resent the making of any such statements for the RECORD. I do not say such things about any other Senator, and I think the Senator from Missouri has spoken in violation of the rule.

Mr. HENNINGS. Then, Mr. President, may I say that the distinguished minority leader is not glib, and he is not adroit. I will withdraw all the comments I made, although I thought they were customary.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri does not need to treat me in that way. He can treat me as a gentleman, here on the floor of the Senate; that is all I request.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I see no reason to resort to personalities.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But the Senator from Missouri began that procedure. Why did he have to say "with his customary glibness"? Certainly that is no way to refer to any Senator; and in my judgment it is in violation of the rule.

Mr. HENNINGS. Well, Mr. President, I will not say "with his customary eloquence"; but I will say that with his unfailing and transcendant eloquence the Senator from Illinois has said that thus and so is the long and short of a highly complex and controversial amendment which goes to the very heart of this proposed legislation; and if the Senator from Illinois objects to use of the phrase "fobbed off," then I say the amendment cannot be dismissed by a short statement to the effect that "That is all that can be said on the subject," and that the Senator from Illinois is ready to vote on the amendment here and now, because, I suggest to the Senator from Illinois, much more can be said about the amendment, whether with customary eloquence or glibness or adroitness or what not, and with or without appropriate embellishments, all of which the Senator from Illinois—and I admire him for it—is capable of giving us the benefit of hearing on the floor of the Senate. I think it is a highly admirable trait, and I think the Senator takes justifiable pride in his ability as an orator, but I do not see that it has anything to do with what we are talking about now.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the Senator yield for half a minute? I can only say, in my feeble way, I must interpret the English language, and when it comes to putting it in proper form, I can only repeat what was written on parchment many years ago:

> But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. May I ask the Senator from Missouri if the intent of his amendment was to place in the bill a requirement that a committee should either receive or expend more than $1,000 in order to come under the purview of the act?

Mr. HENNINGS. May I say to my good friend from South Dakota that a committee is not required, under the terms of this amendment, to report unless it makes an expenditure of or accepts contributions in excess of $1,000 in any calendar year.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Did the Senator intend to eliminate the additional requirement that it be a committee which operated in two or more States? Did he intend to eliminate that requirement?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes. That was in the bill as reported, may I say to the Senator.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Did the Senator intend to eliminate the requirement that either the committee must operate in two or more States or must be a subsidiary of a national committee?

Mr. HENNINGS. That is right. The purpose of this amendment is to stop the unholy, outrageous proliferation of committee after committee in all the States of the Union, for the purpose of collecting contributions and making disbursements without reporting Let these committees exist, and let there be as many of these committees as any candidate can assemble for his own benefit, but why in heaven's name should not a committee which expends $1,000 or more be required to so report? That has been one of the things that has been plaguing the whole system of elections in this country since the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from Missouri is aware of the fact that I am sympathetic with the broad objectives of the bill, but I would not want a provision included in the bill which would destroy the effectiveness of it. I think the language in the bill could very well have the $1,000 requirement added to it.

I wonder if we ought not to require that a committee be in one of two categories, either one which is an interstate committee operating in two States or more, or that it be a subsidiary of a national committee? It would be very difficult, onerous, and forbidding for local political workers to feel that they came under a Federal law if they merely expended $1,000 and if it were truly a local committee.

Mr. HENNINGS. May I say to the Senator that, the Senate has adopted an amendment relating to primaries, we know that committees formed within a State for a candidate are, by and large, committees within the borders of a given State, existing solely for the purpose of nominating a candidate. For that reason I feel that the Senator's suggestion at this point in the consideration of this proposed legislation is not perhaps accurately directed to any defects which may appear in the bill later, because, having dealt with the primary requirement, we are now undertaking to deal with the superabundance of committees within a State or within its boundaries, and seeking to require that those committees, if they collect or disburse over $1,000, also must make a report of that fact.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I call attention to the language in the amendment which reads, "for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence the election of a candidate or candidates or presidential or vice presidential electors."

The amendment is limited to the presidential and vice presidential campaigns, is it not?

Mr. HENNINGS. I think the Senator has overlooked something. The language reads "the election of a candidate or candidates or presidential or vice presidential electors."

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have a final question, if I may ask it. Would the Senator consider changing his amendment to make a change in the bill to bring into it the $1,000 requirement? That is, on line 5, page 3, if the Senator's amendment were changed so that after the word "expenditures" these words would be added, "in an aggregate amount exceeding $1,000 in any calendar year," would he not accomplish both objectives, and obviate the difficulty which has been suggested?

Mr. HENNINGS. As the Senator may know, under the present proposed legislation any interstate committee must report. We are now dealing with intrastate committees, committees within the State, as the Senator knows.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. I will make my observations very brief. I believe that this amendment should be defeated. It invades States rights. It will destroy the right of a State to govern local intrastate committees. It will tend to drive political financing underground. It will place a burden upon our citizens who take part in politics to file Federal reports or face a penalty. As a result, they will withdraw from political activity.

If the amendment were enacted and the bill as reported adopted with it, it would mean more reports in Washington, doing no good.

I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Missouri how many reports a year these local intrastate committees will have to make to the Federal Government if his amendment prevails.

Mr. HENNINGS. It would require four reports.

Mr. CURTIS. Four reports, filed in how many places?

Mr. HENNINGS. They would be filed in one place, with the U.S. district court, or with any State officer who under the law of the State is entitled to receive and preserve elections records.

Mr. CURTIS. And the reports will have to be filed in Washington.

Mr. HENNINGS. Of course, they are always filed with the Secretary of the State.

Mr. CURTIS. That is eight reports. That would be true, would it not, even though it were a temporary committee which got together and collected money to publish one advertisement, if it spent over $1,000?

Mr. HENNINGS. If it is more than one individual, of course.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish the Senator would withdraw his amendment. The objective which we seek is to have a wide participation in politics, in this business of government, and in the financing of campaigns. This proposal would drive the financing of political campaigns underground. It would compel conscientious but very busy citizens to withdraw from politics for fear they could not comply with filing more and more and more Federal reports.

Mr. HENNINGS. Since the Senator has asked me to yield, I should like to ask the Senator a question. The Senator remembers that during the time of the consideration and passage of the Securities and Exchange Commission Act one of the main objections of the investment bankers and brokers was that they would have to file an inordinate number of reports, and that reporting would become burdensome. I can recall hearing many complaints during those days, in the 1930's, about the great burden placed upon those who had to file reports. Now the banking and investment securities community would not be without the Securities and Exchange Commission, because they know it has driven from the markets and from the exchanges the "bucketshop" operators and salesmen of stocks who have no business upon the stock exchange and stocks which have no business being marketed to the public.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not regard the situations as comparable at all.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator has said that this will drive campaign financing underground. May I most respectfully ask my colleague on the Committee on Rules and Administration, who has been most helpful in the formulation of this proposed legislation, if he thinks that the financing of campaigns is now underground, by and large?

Mr. CURTIS. Is the Senator referring to Missouri, or to Nebraska?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am referring to both States and to every State about which I know anything.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not.

Mr. HENNINGS. I know that when a committee is set up and it does not have to report to anybody anything about the money it collects or the money it spends, I would call that underground. It is subterranean. The actions are not subject to public disclosure. The committee is not subject to the scrutiny of the public, and it is not subject to any regulation whatsoever.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to answer the Senator's question. In the State of Nebraska there is a very rigid statute requiring political committees to report and to continue to report up to election time.

There is not a State in the Union which cannot have honest elections and complete reporting if a majority of the people want it.

I do not subscribe to the doctrine that we have to bring everything to Washington, destroy the States, and add and add to the Federal Government all the time.

Mr. BUSH and Mr. HOLLAND addressed the Chair.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I think it is certainly a good general premise that we should not have to bring everything to Washington all the time. I certainly subscribe most heartily to the doctrine that the sovereignty of the States is a sovereignty which should be preserved. But the Constitution, the courts, and the precedents have held that primary elections are part of the electoral process. We are undertaking to regulate only by holding up to the light of day, to let the people know, how many committees there are operating in a State in a given election, how much those committees collect and from whom, how much those committees disburse and to whom, and for what purpose.

This again enters upon the general and I think broad proposition of the right of the people of this country to know from where the money is coming and how it is being spent, so that they may understand the situation. I do not say that money in campaigns is necessarily an evil thing. Money is a necessary thing.

I am sure no Member of this body would be present today were not some of his friends sufficiently generous to give of their substance to enable him to make a campaign. However, I say that the people are entitled to weigh the factor of a candidate's support and the nature of that support. I repeat, the people of the country should know how many committees there are in a given State collecting money in behalf of a given candidate, from what sources they collect the money, and so on, for it is all a part of the information to which the public is entitled, in my judgment. We may not agree as to that.

I think these factors may be weighed and taken into consideration, together with other factors and the qualifications of the candidates, in order that the people may determine their choice, as they see fit, under our democratic processes.

Mr. CURTIS. I believe that the conduct of elections and the regulation of financing can be handled by the States. The people have shown that over and over again. All we need to do is bring outsiders into a State to interfere, and the people assert their jealousy.

The American people are capable of governing themselves. The sovereign States of the Union are capable of governing their own elections and of requiring sufficient reporting by the committees which are solely within their borders.

I concede that a committee operating in two or more States should file a Federal report.

Mr. BUSH and Mr. HOLLAND addressed the Chair.

Mr. HENNINGS. No one can disagree, certainly, with the eternal verity as stated by the Senator, that the people are capable of governing themselves. That we have been trying to prove for a good many generations, since the founding of this Republic. But we think that the people will be better capable of governing themselves if they know a little bit more about the candidates—who is supporting the candidates and in what amount—and if publicity is given to these facts in every State of the Union.

Again, this is to make sure that the people know, so that they may better govern themselves.

I find myself, of course, in complete agreement with the proposition that the people are capable of governing themselves, but I think it is the duty of this body to enable the people to understand a little bit more about the subterranean processes which are used in the formation of committees in primaries in the several States, for the purpose of collecting and disbursing funds for a candidate.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield to my friend the senior Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator. I refer to the definition on pages 2 and 3 of the bill, and to the substitute definition which is now in the pending amendment. The definition of a "candidate" is given as one "whose name is presented at an election for election as President or Vice President, or Senator or Representative."

The definition of a political committee, under the Senator's pending amendment, deals only with committees that are attempting to influence in any manner the election of a candidate or candidates or presidential or vice presidential electors. What about a Jones-for-Senator committee, or a Jones-for-Congress committee? How would that be covered?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad the Senator raised that point. I refer the Senator to page 3 of the pending bill, the Elections Act of 1959, now pending, beginning in line 3:

(3) The term "political committee" includes any committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence the election of candidates or presidential and vice presidential electors (1) in two or more States, or (2) whether or not in more than one State if such committee, association, or organization (other than a duly organized State or local committee of a political party) is a branch or subsidiary of a national committee, association, or organization;

Mr. BUSH. Let me say to the Senator that, in the first place, his amendment is a substitute for the language he has just read, as I understand.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is true.

Mr. BUSH. I am asking only for information, without criticizing the amendment. This amendment excludes entirely, as I read it, any mention of a "Bush-for-Senator committee" or a "Hennings committee," or a "Jones-for-Congress committee." Is not that true?

Mr. HENNINGS. In the first place, I want the Senator to know that I am very glad he voted as he did on the primary amendment. It indicated a recognition on the part of the Senator of the right of the public to know about these matters in primaries.

This amendment relates to what the Senator has just very aptly and appropriately suggested. It relates to a "Bush-for-Senator committee," a "Labor-for-Bush committee," a "First-Voters-for-Bush committee," or whatever the terminology may be, organized in the State of Connecticut for the purpose of supporting the Senator's candidacy, but only if that committee receives or disburses an amount in excess of $1,000.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator. I believe I understand.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator understands that a multitude of committees exists in every State of the Union. If we run beyond legal limitations we organize another committee, which undertakes to operate still within so-called legal limitations. So there is no limit whatsoever on the number of committees which may be formed. However, we do provide that there shall be reporting and publicity, so that the people may be fairly advised as to who is supporting the candidates, the number of committees, who comprises the committees, and so forth.

I thank the Senator for his inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. A number of Senators wish to attend an official American Bar Association dinner this evening, and they would like to leave the Chamber by 7 o'clock. As I understand, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] is agreeable to having his amendment go over until tomorrow, provided he is recognized tomorrow for the purpose of offering it.

The Senator from Missouri states that he has no further statements to make on the pending amendment, but he is desirous of answering any question which may be asked regarding the amendment.

I wonder if I can have an indication as to how many questions Senators may have in mind, and the length of time which may be required. Does the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] plan to consume much time in connection with the pending amendment? If not, we could vote on it by 7 o'clock.

Mr. KEATING. As the distinguished Senator knows, the Senator from New York will be very brief. I shall take only 2 or 3 minutes.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I should like to make one modification of what the distinguished majority leader stated as his understanding of my statement. I have no extensive speech to make on the pending amendment. In answering questions on in undertaking to elaborate what I think needs to be said on the subject, I may have a few words to say. But I have no lengthy speech to make.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is now 25 minutes to 7. If the Senator from New York wishes to take only 2 or 3 minutes, perhaps we can reach a vote before 7 o'clock.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I approach this amendment, as the Senator from Missouri knows, in a rather friendly fashion. I was the coauthor of the preceding amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator has given substantial and yeoman service to the entire bill, and certainly to the previous amendment. Again I pay tribute to him and compliment him upon his very able presentation of various phases of what is a very simple matter in philosophy, but an intricate matter legislatively, speaking from the standpoint of draftsmanship.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate the Senator's remarks.

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate any spirit in which the Senator approaches this legislation, because I know that anything he would undertake to say or do with relation to it would be for the improvement of it, according to his understanding of it.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate those remarks very much. I do share the philosophy which I believe the distinguished Senator from Missouri has, that if we are to pass a bill we should do as thorough a job as we can.

I am a little concerned about the present wording of the first page of the amendment, because of the difficulty in determining how much of the expenditures made by a local committee may have been for the purpose of electing a candidate for the Senate or House of Representatives, or a presidential or vice presidential elector.

For example, if the local candidate for the State assembly were featured on a television program with a candidate for the House or a candidate for the Senate, or an elector, would that come within the purview of this section? And if it is not intended to—and I do not believe it should, unless we are to raise the $1,000 limit somewhat—I wonder what the Senator from Missouri would think of in-serting in the sixth line of his amendment, on page 1, the word "sole" before the word "purpose," in order to have it limited only to those activities which are directed solely to the election of a Member of the House of Representatives or the Senate, or the presidential or vice presidential elector.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in view of the colloquy in which Senators desire to engage, I announce that I do not believe a vote could be reached before 7 o'clock this evening, so that all Senators may know that we will have no rollcall this evening.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. A parliamentary inquiry has been addressed to the Chair. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] has the floor. He has yielded to the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Missouri has yielded to the Senator from New York for a question.

Mr. KEATING. I have directed a question to the distinguished chairman of the committee, which perhaps he would like to think over in the light of the fact that we are going over anyway on the amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. It might be advantageous to do that, since this matter has been freshly presented by the Senator from New York. Therefore it might be advantageous if the Senator from New York and I had a discussion about it without attempting to rewrite or modify legislation on the floor of the Senate, since that specific point was not considered in committee. I would appreciate the Senator's indulgence. I believe I understand exactly what he is getting at. I am a little afraid that it may impinge upon the purposes of the amendment, but I certainly am most amenable to any reasoning or suggestion, and may see the light as the Senator is undertaking to express himself on it.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator. I believe we can confer on it before tomorrow morning.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HENNINGS. Does not the Senator from Vermont have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri still has the floor, yielded to him by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not know whether we ever straightened out that question. However, I wish it to be straightened out to the satisfaction of the Senator from Vermont, because he was so courteous in letting me have the floor for the purpose of my offering the amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. I was very glad to cooperate with the Senator.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not wish the Senator from Vermont to be the victim of any misunderstanding to which I have been any party whatever.

Mr. PROUTY. Some of my friends have said that I have made the best speech of my life.

Mr. HENNINGS. If the Senator wishes to speak now I shall subside and yield the floor, and the Senator from Vermont can yield as he wishes to other Senators.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Missouri yield to me for a question. Does the Senator assume that every committee which is created acts with the approval and consent of the candidate for Senator or Representative who is running in an election?

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Ohio does not give me much credit for my sense of reality if he thinks that I entertain any such fallacious notion. Of course there may be committees operating without the consent or approval of a candidate. I have done everything I could to avoid endorsement or approval by certain committees or groups. I told them I did not want their support or endorsement.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Missouri undoubtedly has had the experience when individuals have proceeded to collect money under the pretense of acting in support of a candidate, and some of the money was expended in supporting the candidate, but much of it was used for purposes completely dissociated from the candidate. The Senator has heard of such instances, I am sure.

Mr. HENNINGS. I have not only heard of them; I have experienced them time and again.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have experienced them. According to the argument which has been made by the Senator from Missouri, every committee would be required to report, and the public would judge from whom the candidate was getting financial support and other support. Is that correct?

Mr. HENNINGS. No; in the bill there reposes a section which the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Illinois, objected to the other day, which states that a candidate should make a reasonable investigation of the committees supporting him in order to give him an opportunity to repudiate those committees. I will read that section.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I am familiar with it. However, does that not place an undue burden upon the candidate? Would it not be better to provide that the committees which have the approval and consent of the candidate shall report?

Mr. HENNINGS. The provision on page 10 of the bill, may I say to my good friend the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who is a fine lawyer and who sees these things very clearly, states:

> (3) The listing of committees, associations, and other organizations and their officers provided for in paragraph (2) shall not be construed as a ratification by the candidate of any action by them and the candidate may at his option note in any such report a repudiation of the support of any such committee, association, or other organization.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That would cover the situation?

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not have to tell the Senator, who has been Governor of his State and has been elected and reelected, and has been elected to the Senate, and to other public offices, that there will always be such committees. I believe it was my predecessor, Senator James Reed, who said, "I can take care of my enemies, but only the Lord can protect me from my friends." We run into that proposition as one of the occupational hazards of seeking public office. However, we also have available the means of repudiating certain support. I hope I have undertaken to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have one final question. Under the proposal of the Senator from Missouri, every committee expending a thousand dollars or more would be required to report to Congress. That is, if in my neighborhood of St. Clair Avenue a group got together and assembled a thousand dollars, they would have to report that fact?

Mr. HENNINGS. They would have to report the fact that the St. Clair Avenue Frank Lausche for President or Vice President or Senator Club had collected a thousand dollars, so that it would be generally known.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If they did not, they would be told that they would be subject to criminal prosecution?

Mr. HENNINGS. They would be told that they would be subject to prosecution.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. But we would not want to get into a situation whereby a committee friendly to a candidate would be required to report and an unfriendly committee would not be required to report, would we?

Mr. HENNINGS. No. All committees would have to report, but the candidate could repudiate a committee if he did not want its support. Many of the committees are friendly to the candidate, but some of them are like the albatross; we do not want them hung around our necks. I have had that experience. I dare say that the Senator, in his very honorable and considerable public life, has had the same experience.

We do not always want the vocal, blatant, and at times embarrassing support of all people and all elements and all groups who may want to support us.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Would the effect of the Senator's amendment be to wipe out the requirement with respect to the interstate character and affiliation of a national committee, and would he make the reporting requirements purely a matter of receipt and expenditure of $1,000?

Mr. HENNINGS. Do I understand the Senator to inquire whether interstate committees will be required to report under the terms of the act?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The amendment, as I read it, starts by striking out lines 3 to 12, inclusive, on page 3, which would strike out the interstate requirement or the affiliation with the national committee.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is exactly correct. At that point it does. But interstate committees are covered.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. HENNINGS. I hope I am answering the Senator's question in a responsive manner. I wanted to make very clear that it does not in anywise abrogate the requirement relating to interstate committees, but it does make the additional requirement that committees operating within the State, or intrastate committees, beyond the $1,000 limitation, shall report.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. In the definition of the word "candidate" in the bill before us, starting on page 2, I read:

> The term "candidate" means an individual whose name is presented at an election for election as President or Vice President, or Senator or Representative in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, whether or not such individual is elected.

Is it the intention of that language to define "candidate," for the purposes of the proposed legislation, as only a person running for President or Vice President, for either House of Congress, or for Resident Commissioner to the Congress?

Mr. HENNINGS. Or, to use the other term in the bill, "whose name is presented at an election."

Mr. KUCHEL. Very good. In other words, when I refer to them as running, it means those whose names are presented for those offices.

Mr. HENNINGS. I should say they are interchangeable within the meaning of the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. KUCHEL. If a political committee is formed in the city of X, and Representative Jones is a candidate for reelection, let us assume that the city of X political committee receives, from contributions, $1,100. Suppose it purchases $600 worth of newspaper advertising for Representative Jones, and it purchases $500 of advertising for the candidate for Governor.

My question is: Would the language of the Senator's amendment (a) require that the committee report, and (b) would it require the reporting of the moneys expended for the candidate for Governor?

Mr. HENNINGS. Again, we get into the apportionment problem, as the Senator well realizes. That was included in the 1957 bill. We dropped it from this bill because of the great difficulty in determining, where a committee supports a number of candidates, a proper allocation as between the candidate for President, the candidate for Governor, the candidate for the Senate, and so on down the line. In the 1957 bill we tried in every possible way we could, in this very difficult field, to achieve some degree of apportionment and allocation. But none ever met with my complete approval, because I simply do not see how we can separate candidates running as a group, in a primary, when one is a candidate for district attorney, another is a candidate for the Senate, another for the House, and another for Governor. One committee may work for all of them. So we get into a very difficult field.

The original bill of 1955, which I introduced, that was 5 years ago, provided that in the case of expenditures made on behalf of more than one candidate, for printing, advertising, radio time, television time, the statement shall indicate the candidates in whose behalf the expenditure was made and the amount to be allocated to each, such amount to be determined by dividing the total expenditure by the number of candidates in whose behalf it is made.

Mr. KUCHEL. So the Senator from Missouri would say that under his amendment, once the $1,000 figure were reached, either in receipts or expenditures, the amendment would take effect and the requirement to report would be in order.

Mr. HENNINGS. According to my understanding of it, it would. That is the provision relating to the expenditure of in excess of $1,000 for one candidate.

Mr. KUCHEL. The Senator has just said something which I did not understand before. One candidate?

Mr. HENNINGS. If the Senator from California will bear with me, I will try to locate that language. We have had so many papers, authorities, and amendments before us all day, that we have misplaced the amendment we were just talking about.

> The term "political committee" includes any committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures in the aggregate amount of $1,000 in a calendar year for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence in any manner whatsoever the election of a candidate or candidates for Presidential or Vice-Presidential election.

So if a committee which was collecting funds for a number of candidates were to collect $1,000 or more in 1 calendar year, then—as I interpret the meaning of the amendment—the committee would have to report that it had collected "for the following candidates" that sum of money, amounting to $1,000 or more.

Mr. KUCHEL. That is to say, the intention of the amendment is that no matter how many candidates are involved, if one such group of candidates comes within the meaning of "candidate" in the committee bill, then when the receipts or expenditures reach the $1,000 level, the requirement to report is in order?

Mr. HENNINGS. That is my understanding of the provision. I think the Senator is exactly correct, going back to the definition of "candidate" in the bill before us.

Mr. KUCHEL. Once the requirement of reporting were reached, would it be required to report on the expenditures of those moneys which affected candidates other than as described in the Senator's bill—the local candidates, for example?

Mr. HENNINGS. No; it would not be my understanding that it would.

Mr. KUCHEL. So the requirement would be to report those moneys received or expended in support of, in the language of the bill, "an individual whose name is presented at an election for election as President or Vice President, or Senator or Representative in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, whether or not such individual is elected."

Mr. HENNINGS. Is that the question of the Senator from California?

Mr. KUCHEL. It is.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from California has been reading from the bill, has he not?

Mr. KUCHEL. Let me restate the question; I shall begin it again:

Is it the intention of the Senator from Missouri that when the $1,000 level is reached, such a committee will be required to report the receipts or expenditures of the moneys used for a candidate—as the bill describes the meaning of the words "a candidate"—but not for those who are aspiring to election to local or State office?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes; so far as the Federal legislation is concerned.

Mr. KUCHEL. The answer to my question is "Yes," is it?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes; according to the way I interpret the question.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. But in answer to the question of the Senator from California, did not I correctly understand the Senator from Missouri to say that, under the wording of the amendment as it now exists, only if a political committee which were formed spent less than $1,000 solely for any one such candidate, would the committee be relieved from the necessity of complying with the requirement to report?

Mr. HENNINGS. I think that is correct.

Mr. KEATING. In other words, under the wording of this amendment, if a candidate for election to the House of Representatives were running with a number of local candidates—perhaps 20 local candidates—and if a committee spent more than $1,000, under the requirements of this provision the committee would have to report; is that correct?

Mr. HENNINGS. That is my understanding.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I hope the distinguished Senator from Missouri, who has worked so hard and so faithfully over the bill, will consider, during the evening, reinstatement of language something like that contained in his original bill of 1955, so as to permit an apportionment, because I really believe that would greatly strengthen the support for his amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. Certainly any suggestion the Senator from New York makes will be carefully considered, and I should like to discuss the matter further with him.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will state it.

Mr. KUCHEL. Who now has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, following disposition of the pending amendment, I may be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, at this time I yield the floor for today.

DEATH OF PETER HENDERSON, FIRST HEAD OF HOUSE GYMNASIUM

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, it was with deep regret that I read in the Washington Post and Times Herald this morning of the passing of a great friend of the U.S. Congress and a good friend of many Members of this body who have served a number of terms in the House of Representatives. I refer to the death of Pete Henderson, the first head of the House gymnasium, who ministered to the physical needs of many Senators at the time they were Representatives. He was a great friend, I am sure, of everyone who ever participated in the activities of the House gymnasium. Above all, he was a great American.

I believe Pete Henderson was as proud as any human being could be of his connection with the U.S. Congress. He served for 15 years as the head of the gymnasium in the House of Representatives and retired in about 1948 because of ill health.

It was distressing to learn that he has passed away. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to this fine associate of the Members of Congress and to extend to his family my commiserations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that as an attachment to these remarks there be printed at this point in the RECORD the article published in the Washington Post and Times Herald concerning Mr. Henderson's passing.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PETER HENDERSON, FIRST HEAD OF HOUSE GYM, DIES

Peter Henderson, a man whose job it was to keep Congressmen healthy and relaxed, died Saturday in West Palm Beach, Fla., it was learned here yesterday.

Mr. Henderson was the first gym director for the House of Representatives when the new office building opened in 1933. He retired 15 years later.

In early years he found himself as much a gym promoter as director. First, he won additional space from House planners to add a half-court gym floor to the original steam bath layout. This made space for handball and volleyball and solo exercise.

Then, to get Members to limber up, he called on their offices and sent them flysheets promoting his therapy. "It was not easy," says his successor. "The average age here is about 40 and they just don't figure on starting something like that."

But, sport lovers or not, they turned out, more each year. Such spare time athletes as former Vice President Henry A. Wallace and Representative RICHARD NIXON joined in the nonpolitical workouts.

Mr. Henderson came here from the West during the depression. His first job on Capitol Hill was on the construction of the Supreme Court.

Soccer was the gym director's favorite game, a preference going back to his youth in Scotland.

Later he served in the U.S. Army in World War I. His age was unavailable.

Since retirement, Mr. Henderson and his wife, Ellen, spent winters in Florida and summers in Washington.

Services will be held at the James T. Ryan funeral home.

U.S. POLICY AS SEEN IN HONG KONG

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, among the outstanding representatives of the United States in oversea posts whom I had the privilege to visit during my recent trip overseas, none occupies a position of greater responsibility at this particular time than the American consul general at Hong Kong, the Honorable Julius C. Holmes.

I had the distinct privilege of hearing Mr. Holmes speak at the meeting of the Rotary Club of Hong Kong on December 29, 1959.

His remarks were received with great attention and appreciation. I believe they will be of interest to the Members of Congress and other readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD who are interested in, and realize the importance of, what is happening in the Far East and how international events look to an experienced observer there.

I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that Mr. Holmes' remarks may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOME THOUGHTS ON THE YEAR'S EVENTS

(Remarks of the Honorable J. C. Holmes, American Consul General, to the Rotary Club of Hong Kong, December 29, 1959)

I have been asked to cap your luncheon fare today with a few thoughts on the developments of the year in the world as a whole. This is the traditional time for stocktaking, both in a personal sense and in our view of the world around us, and I welcome the opportunity to discuss this subject with you.

It seems pointless to attempt a catalog of events and pretentious to venture predictions. I believe it appropriate, and I hope useful, however, to try to sort out the major themes of this year's sympathy, since they may help us to understand next year's program.

WARMING OF INTERNATIONAL CLIMATE

Perhaps the most striking, and potentially the most promising, aspect of this year's events was the warming of the international climate, symbolized by the interchange of visits between leading officials of the East and West.

I refer in particular, of course, to the visits of Prime Minister Macmillan and Vice President NIXON to Moscow; the visits of Premier Khrushchev and Deputy Premier Mikoyan to the United States; and to President Eisenhower's prospective tour of the U.S.S.R.

To be sure, these visits were preceded by, and to some degree probably resulted from, the sudden initiation of a crisis over Berlin by a Soviet ultimatum. Nevertheless, we should be prepared to take hope wherever we find evidence.

The main point is that these interchanges have been without precedent in the history of the cold war; they took place against a background of East-West cultural, scientific and educational exchanges that would have been surprising to contemplate only a few years ago; and they laid the basis for summit meetings that are to take place next year.

These are possible symbols of change, not the change itself; they may presage a thaw, but alone provide no assurance of the settlement we all seek. Nevertheless, they are important and have great promise largely because they may indicate that the leaders of the U.S.S.R. at last share our conviction that no side can win the gamble of a nuclear war.

Such a change in the Soviet viewpoint might be influenced by other forces; notably, by the fact that the Soviet society, after 40 years of painful austerity, is only now beginning to produce partly for welfare rather than exclusively for power. And material satisfaction once tasted is not easily contained.

In any event, these possibilities are the measure of our hope, and to this extent the climate and the prospects for peace have brightened.

NEED TO BE IMAGINATIVE YET HARDHEADED

I emphasize that as yet we deal with symbols, not reality, because we are all participants in a vital game. Certainly the West must be flexible and imaginative; but in view of the high stakes we must above all be hardheaded as well.

In this connection I need hardly point out the highly disturbing fact that the thaw in climate has strict geographical limits; it is a fact that unfortunately is only too clear in this area of the world. It means among other things that the road to a settlement will be difficult and probably long, and we may dare to travel on it only if we maintain our position of strength.

We can, in short, hope and work for peace only if we maintain our capability to deter aggression, nuclear or otherwise. This expensive fact is not of our choosing, but it is a fact nonetheless.

On the related and probably more critical subject of disarmament, the year's events produced mixed results.

I realize that this is a field in which even the most studious and conscientious observer experiences a sense of ignorance and frustration. In the long history of disarmament talks the negotiations during any one year periodically have been the source of headlines, and—here it is safe to predict—this is likely to be the case again in the year ahead. But the same issues always seem to be repeated, and this fact, combined with the surrounding maze of highly technical considerations, creates the impression in some minds that the whole affair is talk and no movement, and little more than the "rice bowl" of diplomats.

I believe, however, that the principles underlying this subject are basically simple and straightforward, and we can lose sight of them only at our peril.

In the interest of preventing a world holocaust, the West can afford to discard its most powerful weapons only if we can be certain that our potential opponent is not concealing his own. The West is more than prepared and willing to enter the era of peaceful competition, but we may do so only on the assurance that the competition can be only peaceful.

Thus talk alone provides no certainty of what is in the minds of the Soviet leaders. They may in fact share the desire of the Russian people to enjoy the prospect of a better material future; but alternatively, they may calculate that if they can disarm us first, while concealing some of their own military capabilities, they can work their will and accomplish the objectives of communism in a world unprepared to contest force.

DIFFICULT COURSE TO STEER

The Free Nations must, therefore, steer a difficult course, for it would be tragic to assume that Soviet intentions are secretly hostile when in fact they were genuinely, although selfishly, peaceful, and therefore lose the chance of building a secure peace. Similarly, it would be suicide to act on the premise that their intentions are peaceful when de do not have real proof of their lack of capability for militarily hostile acts. In short, we must act in such a way that whichever assumption is correct we have taken the path that is both prudent and morally correct.

For this reason, the Western Powers have insisted throughout the long history of disarmament talks on a foolproof system of inspection; but in 13 years of trying to negotiate an agreement on the reduction and control of conventional and nuclear weapons, a system for minimizing the danger of surprise attack, and an end to nuclear weapons tests, agreement on inspection and control procedures has been a consistent obstacle to a meeting of minds.

TWO STEPS FORWARD

This year, however, has seen a moderate, but nevertheless significant, turn for the better. There have been two concrete steps forward: First, no nuclear weapons were tested by either side during the year; Second, we have reached an understanding with the Soviet Union on some of the mechanics of inspection that would be involved in a testing ban, and even on the wording of 17 articles of a test ban treaty.

This is the first time since the United Nations was established that agreemnt was reached on definite treaty provisions in the field of weapons control, and for this reason it represents progress, even though agreement on these provisions has no validity until a complete treaty is concluded.

In this field, however, the year ended on a disappointing note. The meeting of technicians for detecting underground nuclear explosions—who are dealing with a critical element in the nuclear inspection procedures—ended in a deadlock and the conference on a nuclear testing ban has been recessed until January 12.

Once again the Russians, on the flimsiest of objections, seemed bent on refusing to satisfy the West on this most crucial point. Is it because they think we will abuse the privilege of inspection to carry on espionage within their borders? Or is it because their real goal is to have us disarm while they do not?

It is these questions that require us, despite the best of intentions, to proceed with the utmost caution.

On a more positive note, the year also provided dramatic and continuing testimony that an increasing area of the world is on the verge of entering what one economist recently termed the age of high consumption. As a representative of my Government, and in all humility, I believe that I can take some pride in the part that the United States has played in fostering this happy trend. As you know, in the first 5 years after World War II the United States concentrated its assistance on Western Europe in what proved to be an effective effort to make good the ravages of war and set in motion the strong forces in being that ultimately led to the attainment of record productivity in the area. Subsequently much of our assistance, as well as that provided by other countries, including the U.S.S.R., has been channeled to Asia for the more difficult and perhaps more crucial task of promoting the development of this region.

WORLD PEACE AND WORLD PROSPERITY

I believe it is safe to generalize that the issue of world peace eventually may be reduced to the question of world prosperity.

In this connection, I was struck by the recent statement made by Sir Oliver Franks to the effect that events will bring the world to the position where the division between East and West may prove to be less important than the division between North and South. By this he meant that the issues of our age increasingly may stem less from ideological differences between East and West and more from the responsibility that the industrialized countries as a whole must accept to assist in fostering economic progress in the poorer countries of the world, which for the most part are situated in the southern portion of the globe.

Toward this end, competitive assistance between East and West need not be out of character; in fact, it should be welcomed.

It is a type of competition that is not only based on peace, but can build peace. Nor is this problem any less critical than some of the others I mentioned earlier.

Economic progress by no means has been confined to the industrialized nations, but the harsh and unfortunate fact is that the gap between the industrialized countries and the developing countries has increased, not lessened, during the last decade.

Most of the countries of Asia are working hard, and have been successful, in raising total production, but in per capita terms the advance has been painfully small. In terms of essential consumption, we must recognize that production of food is barely keeping pace with the minimum consumption need of Asia's growing population.

THE CHALLENGE OF OUR FUTURE

This trend indicates all the more clearly that the task of promoting economic progress in Asia and other similar areas must be pushed forward on an enlarged scale. It will require resources that cannot come from one or from a few of the industrialized nations, but represents a project in which all who can afford it must share. This is no small design and it may well represent the challenge of our future.

If there is to be progress, and what is equally important, the prospect of progress, all the major industrial nations of the world must join in the competition to raise living standards elsewhere to the level where peace is secure. Of course this is not the only condition for a secure peace. Wars have been started by prosperous nations. I submit, however, that it is one of the conditions, and possibly one that is essential to the equation.

Having been obliged at the request of your program director to talk with you on a global plane, I believe I can take the liberty and the pleasure of ending with a note of comment on the microcosm that is Hong Kong. I am a newcomer to your community, but it does not take long to savour its unique and engaging characteristics. I find in it, to the fullest measure, the conditions that enable people to devote their energies to creative tasks. As such, Hong Kong is dramatic witness to what the human being can do, against all odds, when he can work in freedom and gain the rewards of his effort.

The citizens of Hong Kong seem to be dedicated to the advice of Voltaire; that everyone should cultivate his own garden. But it is an unusual garden that we have here. Flowers of considerably more than a hundred kinds are blooming; few wither; none is chopped off. This display of horticultural strength and variety is worthy of a model farm, and indeed Hong Kong seems to be so regarded, and preferred to other models, by an embarrassingly large influx of people. It is an embarrassment of which Hong Kong should be proud.

I know that many visitors to your city pay tribute to it as a lighthouse of free enterprise, of resourcefulness in overcoming every kind of difficulty, and of the democratic spirit at work. The fact that so many people have paid you this tribute does not mean that it is not worth offering again. I should like to join those others in saluting Hong Kong, and the many people in this room who have helped to make Hong Kong what it is.

I wish you all a very happy new year.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will state it.

Mr. KUCHEL. Has an order for adjournment until tomorrow previously been entered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; an order that when the Senate concludes its session today, it adjourn until 12 o'clock tomorrow has previously been entered.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, is such a motion in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. KUCHEL. Then, Mr. President, under the order previously entered, I move that the Senate now adjourn, until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 4 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 20, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

I Samuel 12: 20: Turn not aside from following the Lord, but serve Him with all your heart.

Almighty God, Thou knowest how greatly we need Thy divine wisdom to understand and Thy divine strength for the responsibilities which daily press so heavily upon us.

May our President, our Speaker, and all the Members of this legislative body never falter or fear to make right decisions.

Grant unto them that courage of heart and peace of mind which only integrity and fidelity can give.

Deliver us from anxiety and make us strong of faith to dare and of hope to endure when we are in danger of being buffeted from our course by the winds of adversity.

Help us to go forward courageously with a clear vision of Thy guiding presence and with the assurance of Thy sustaining power.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE REDS ARE AFTER OUR PANAMA CANAL

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the body of the RECORD an extension of remarks that appeared in the RECORD last week. The Government Printing Office made a mistake, and the only way the mistake can be corrected is by including it in the RECORD today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by Evangelist Billy James Hargis, president, and Julian E. Williams, research director, of the Christian Crusade:

THE REDS ARE AFTER OUR PANAMA CANAL

(By Evangelist Billy James Hargis, president, and Julian E. Williams, research director, of the Christian Crusade)

During recent months there have been increasing rumblings of serious trouble for the American people in the strategic Panama Canal Zone. There have been demonstrations by highly organized student groups, and increasing demands by the Panama Government which is under strong pressure from the agitating forces. The Panama Government has demanded one-half of the revenue from the Canal, and has declared an extension of Panama's territorial waters from the internationally recognized 3-mile limit to a 12-mile limit.

Let us remember that the Panama Canal belongs to the United States. Our Nation dug it, paid for it, and by terms of a treaty with the Government of Panama in 1903 has all rights in the area. Article 24 of the Panama Canal Convention of 1903 states "no change either in the Government or in the laws and treaties of the Republic of Panama shall, without the consent of the United States, affect any right of the United States under the present convention, or under any treaty, stipulation between the two countries that now exists or may hereafter exist touching the subject matter of this convention." Our Government pays the Government of Panama an annual rental of $1,930,000 for the Canal Zone. The original rent established in the 1903 treaty was $250,000 but it has been raised twice since that time by new treaties.

The Panama Canal has been of great assistance to the Republic of Panama. The Encyclopedia Britannica describes it as "the greatest single economic asset of Panama." The Panama Canal brings to Panama the largest tonnage of shipping of any country in Latin America, and its ports rival the great ports of the world. In other words, the Panama Canal has practically made this little country what it is today.

Our Government recognized the importance of building the Panama Canal, and the Soviet leaders of international communism recognize the importance of it now. They are determined to get it, and some years ago their man, Alger Hiss, was operating toward that end in the U.S. State Department.

While he was Director of the State Department's Office of Special Political Affairs he got hold of the annual report of the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, and decided that it should be turned over to the United Nations. He argued that the United States was required to turn this Canal Zone report over to the U.N., and cited article 73(e) of the United Nations Charter as his authority. Article 73(e) provides that member nations having responsibilities for the administration of territories that have not attained a full measure of self-government shall transmit to the U.N., "statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social, and educational conditions in the territories." Through this move, Hiss implied that the Canal Zone was a territory of the United States and that the people of the zone were on their way to self-government. If accepted by the Governments of the United States and Panama this would place us in a perilous spot as far as the canal is concerned.

Actually, the Panama Canal Zone is not a territory in the traditional sense of the word and the people of the zone are not supposed to have self-government according to the terms of the treaty. The only persons who may live in the Canal Zone are officials, employees, military personnel on duty and their families. No one can live in the zone unless they are occupied in work relating directly to the canal.

At this time Spruille Braden was Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs. Two of his assistants learned about the Hiss plan. They complained. Mr. Braden complained to Under Secretary of State Dean Acheson, but Acheson did not even give him a chance to state his case, according to Braden. During the controversy, Spruille Braden checked with the Pentagon to find out just how important our military bases in Panama really were. He was told that the bases were vitally necessary for the security of the Panama Canal—therefore, of the United States. Regardless of this, Alger Hiss won out just as he always did with Dean Acheson and the report was submitted to the U.N. Braden later found out that Hiss identified the Canal Zone as an occupied territory.

As long as he was Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Spruille Braden managed for America to keep the vitally important military bases in Panama. However, in the fall of 1947 he read that our Nation had to give up those important bases—134 of them. Alger Hiss marched on. No less important than the surrender of our military bases was the dangerous diplomatic precedent which Acheson and Hiss had established. The submission of the Canal Zone's report, and classification of the zone as a territory opened the doors to some dangerous future meddling by the United Nations.

Moscow has had its evil eye upon the Panama Canal for a long time, as the activities of Alger Hiss showed, but during the Suez crisis in 1956 the Kremlin conspirators came out in the open and suggested that the Panama Canal should be internationalized. Top Polish Communist leaders were told by the Soviet commander of the Polish armed forces, "Although the Panama Canal route is longer by some 1,000 miles than the southern sea route through Suez, it has considerable advantages for the Soviet Union—which have been studied in detail by numerous Soviet vessels. Moreover, the Panama Canal has an outstanding position in communications with South American States and is one of the hubs of the imperialistic policy of the United States in the Pacific and the Far East." The Soviet speaker was Marshal Rokossovsky.

That energetic little product of the Pendergast political machine, Harry Truman, was not going to let the Kremlin get ahead of him. After the Soviets announced their plot to internationalize the Panama Canal, Mr. Truman grabbed the nearest newspaperman and informed him that this was not a Soviet idea at all because he (Truman) had proposed it at the Potsdam Conference in 1945. That is one of the many astonishing examples of America's current political climate in which it is not smart to consider the interests of the American people. This foolish internationalist outlook has been predominant in American leadership for years. Meanwhile, the American people are kept in a deep sleep by welfare state handouts, and the promise of the beautiful welfare state utopia which is impossible. The welfare state can lead only to the enslavement of the American people.

During a spy trial in Paris in March of 1935, a young American couple from East Orange, N.J., testified. The man, Robert G. Switz, remarked to the court that his missions for the Communist conspiracy network included work in the Panama Canal Zone. Edward Hunter covered this trial for International News Service. Paris had informed the U.S. Embassy, and so Hunter went to the Embassy to find out what was being done about the matter. They informed him that the tip had been cabled to Washington. But Hunter said in National Review magazine of March 14, 1959, that he never found out what interest our Government had shown in the tip. He said that another astonishing thing was the way this important news was slurred over in the American press. Time magazine gave it a couple of paragraphs and made it sound like a joke.

This is a typical example of how vitally important matters have been handled and are being handled by supposedly reputable Government officials, newspapers, and magazines. Important facts—facts which are vital to America's defense—are slurred over, ignored, or ridiculed, but never answered straightforward, and seldom is effective action taken. How grossly misinformed our people are. Good has been made to look evil and evil to look good in the eyes and minds of millions of deceived American citizens.

Back in 1948, the Communist People's Party had a candidate in Panama's presidential race. Panama has had its share of the usual student revolts which break out when Communist agents do their jobs behind the scenes. In 1947, the U.S. Ambassador and a Panama Foreign Minister signed an agreement to renew the World War II agreement by which the United States operated 13 airbases outside the Canal Zone. The next day a student riot erupted in the streets, and there were more than 30 casualties. There were cries of "Down with Yankee imperialism." As a result not one deputy in the Panama Parliament dared to vote for the agreement. This weakened U.S. military strength in Central America and deprived Panama of badly needed employment and money that U.S. expenditures on the airbases would have provided.

Panama student groups have demonstrated for a 50–50 split on the Panama Canal tolls, ignoring U.S. expenditures in operating the canal and building it originally. They have agitated for a monopoly of canal jobs by Spanish-speaking peoples, and for the return of the canal through nationalization. Last May the streets of the Panamanian capital bristled with troops as rebellious students and the Government remained deadlocked for days. Panama was under a stage of siege and appeared to be on a war footing, according to news accounts of the struggle. A Government spokesman charged that Communists were involved in the rioting that took 11 lives, and said that the well-known Communist leader Bolivar Davalos was with the students barricaded in the university.

A self-avowed Marxist, Diogenes de la Rosa, is the Panamanian President's economic adviser. He is director of the National Economic Council. He said that Panamanians are so unsympathetic to Americans that they might help the enemy in case of war. This means the enemy of Panama also, as the only enemy on the scene is international communism. This dangerous attitude has been created in a small country which we built and put on the map in turn for rights to the canal which we also built and financed. It took almost miraculous measures of sanitation to make the land habitable.

During 1958 the Panama Government found a number of arms deposits in and near the capital city, and announced discovery of a plot to plunge the country into revolution. During 1959, a small landing force of revolutionists tried to establish a foothold in Panama. Even though only a few men landed, the mission was to build up gradually an insurrection army out of Panamanians. A lecturer at the Moscow Political Academy described the recent events in Panama as a "continuation of the general struggle for the liberation of the peoples of Central America from the U.S. colonialist yoke." The invasion of Panama by a small revolutionary force was the same pattern as the Cuban pro-Communist revolution showed at the start.

Representative DANIEL J. FLOOD, of Pennsylvania, tried to alert the U.S. House of Representatives to the perilous situation in Panama after the Panama Government declared an extension of the Republic's 3-mile water limit to a 12-mile limit. In his speech exposing the peril, he said, "Also, I desire to emphasize that, as regards the Republic of Panama and its people, I hold both in the highest esteem and count many Panamanian citizens as valued friends of many years' standing." For his efforts in behalf of the security of Panama and the United States, Representative DANIEL FLOOD was voted "public enemy No. 1" by the Panama Assembly.

Let us remember the strategic importance to America of the Panama Canal. Will American Government officials follow the same policy in relation to the Communist threat to this lifeline of America as they have to the Communist operations in Cuba and other important Latin American nations? Will the answer be to ignore obvious Communist subversion and propaganda on this continent while lulling the American people deeper and deeper into a sleep of national death through increased foreign aid as the only way to oppose communism? What a hoax. The foreign-aid war against communism is as phony as a $7 bill. The strongest proof that it is a hoax is the fact that a large portion of the aid goes to Communist and Communist sympathizing governments—governments that will turn on the American people with a vengeance in the final showdown; governments that are already open in their opposition to America.

Include in your prayers those innocent people in Panama who are being deceived by the clever agents of international communism. Demand of the Congress, the President, and the State Department that we do not allow Communist subversion to continue in the vital Panama Canal Zone area. Demand a realistic approach to the Communist peril every area of its operation.

ANTI-SEMITIC ACTIVITIES

Mr. FARBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FARBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand the lassitude on the part of this Government in connection with the anti-Semitic acts that have been and are taking place throughout Germany and even the rest of the world.

Although expressions of disgust of these deplorable acts have been heard from the other governments, this Congress has not been singularly vocal in its protests.

Acts of desecration and vandalism have occurred and are occurring throughout the world violating the interests of minorities. A world war was fought, among other things, to denazifying Germany; yet we still find former Nazis in high places in the German Government. Who knows but what the peoples of Germany, in view of the presence of so many former Nazis in their government, interpret the attitude of their government to be one of tolerance despite the protests and expressions of horror by their leaders.

Let this be but a small voice rising in protest.

GOLD STAR MOTHERS

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, after an uncertain start, following World War I, Congress went all out to provide a comprehensive program of benefits for veterans and their dependents before World War II had ended.

In legislation embracing tens of millions of people, it is impossible to foresee all the situations that are entitled to our consideration. There are bound to be omissions which only time can reveal.

I find that a growing number of Gold Star Mothers are seeking my assistance in securing their admission to Veterans' Administration hospitals for medical treatment. They assume in view of their sacrifices, that they are eligible for such benefits. It is always distressing to witness the shock of their disbelief when I explain that the law makes no provision for their medical care as dependents of veterans.

But my son not only served his country, he gave his life in its defense. I cannot understand why the Government, in return, will not help the Gold Star Mothers who are in need of hospital care.

In some cases, the son who died in service was the sole support of his mother. The pension she receives is barely enough for her ordinary needs. Now that the infirmities of age require the hospitalization which she cannot afford, she looks to a grateful Government to help her.

Even where there are other sons or daughters living away from home, they find it difficult to pay the soaring costs of private medical care for their mother in addition to their immediate responsibilities of supporting their own homes and children.

The respect and honor that we accord to Gold Star Mothers is cheapened if we apply the yardstick of a means test, or try to shift our obligation to others.

There is no need to debate the right of Gold Star Mothers to these benefits. We simply did not anticipate the predicament in which many of these brave and generous women now find themselves.

To balance this moral budget I ask early consideration of the bill I have introduced to amend section 610 of title 38, United States Code, to authorize the furnishing of hospital care at Veterans' Administration facilities for Gold Star Mothers.

And to amend by adding to that section the following words:

(c) To the extent that the furnishing of such care will not jeopardize the availability of facilities for the furnishing of hospital care to veterans, the Administrator is authorized to furnish hospital care which he determines is needed to the mother of any member of the Armed Forces, if she was eligible to be furnished a gold star lapel button under Public Law 306, 80th Congress, on account of the death of such member.

THE BIRTHDAY OF GEN. ROBERT E. LEE

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, 153 years ago today—on January 19, 1807—Robert E. Lee was born. He was a great soldier, a loyal southerner, a noble American. Above all, he was a Christian gentleman.

Millions of words have been written about him in thousands of books, plays, and poems. He means innumerable things to vast numbers of my fellow citizens.

This is what he means to me. He means the eternal symbol of that holy spark which causes the possessor to follow his belief to his manifest destiny. He did not question whether what he believed was popular or unpopular. He did not ask himself, "What is there in it for me?" What he did do was to set his course by the bright spark of his dedicated convictions. What he did do was to follow his star, whether it led him into sunlight or into shadow.

My friends, on his birthday, I salute a man of the South, a man of America, a man of God.

I hail, with all my heart, Robert E. Lee, of Virginia.

NATIONAL LOTTERY STILL ONLY HOPE FOR TAX CUT

Mr. FINO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FINO. Mr. Speaker, the President's announcement that his proposed budget will provide for a $4.2 billion surplus and that it would be applied toward reduction of our national debt is most commendable and should be applauded.

I am in complete agreement with Mr. Eisenhower when he insists that "this debt growth must stop," especially when the interest charges alone now cost the taxpayers about $9½ billion each year.

However, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with our President when he suggests that we withhold tax relief from our American taxpayers until payments on this gigantic debt have been established as normal practice. At the rate we are going and with costs of Government operation on the rise, it might be years and years before we can make an appreciable reduction on our children's inherited mortgage. This can very well mean a long, long wait for our hard-pressed wage earners who are looking to us for relief from what our President describes, "the heavy burdens of taxation."

Mr. Speaker, this Congress has it within its power to help the President in his desire to reduce our national debt and the American people who deserve and need relief from the extreme pressures of taxation. All we have to do is wipe out hypocrisy and display some good American horsesense by passing a national lottery bill.

Mr. Speaker, the time is more than ripe for this Congress to gather up enough courage and face the fiscal facts of life. A national lottery should be accepted by this Congress as a good practical and sound fiscal substitute for taxation. My bill will painlessly and voluntarily pump into the U.S. Treasury $10 billion a year in new additional revenue. A national lottery would bring into the coffers of our Government enough money to help ease our present financial pains and bring long-awaited relief to our overburdened wage earners.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this Congress will have the intestinal fortitude to tap this new source of revenue which can be ours just for the asking. Let us make Mr. and Mrs. Taxpayer's dreams for a tax cut a reality with a national lottery.

RELIEF OF VETERANS IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, here is a bill that will be dropped in the hopper today.

The purpose is to relieve veterans who have been overpaid through no mistake of their own and who are now having to repay with interest whatever they have received. We all know about what some times happens. The Government pays the veteran something to which he is not entitled. He does not know about any error. Then, perhaps after he is married and has a couple of kids, buys a home and added obligation and expenses then the Government which made the mistake comes along and not only wants back what they have overpaid him which, of course, in all equity, he should repay if he can, but they want interest on it.

I cannot see the fairness in that.

One other matter. We want to relieve the disbursing officer, who is in no way at fault and will offer an amendment to that effect.

THE CHALLENGE OF PRESERVING PEACE: PART I, THE SINO-SOVIET PERIL

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. WILSON] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, filled with promises and perils, the 10-year period we now enter truly defies the imagination of all of us. Will our two political parties be able to meet the fast-moving demands of the sixties? What are the differences in the responses of the two political parties to this challenge? A search for answers is the purpose of our Republican speech series.

This is the second speech of the series. Along with the third speech, it will explore the challenge of preserving peace with justice during the 10 years ahead. First, I will endeavor to define the Sino-Soviet peril to peace and freedom. Then I will contrast the two distinct approaches of Republicans and Democrats to this peril.

I pause to make an advance apology to some of my good friends in the other party. Often I shall characterize the attitude of that party by citing attitudes of the Democratic advisory council. Actually, many of the Members on the other side of the aisle are as disillusioned as I by that advisory council.

Tragic as it may be, these gentlemen are inescapably hog-tied to their council. Its members include those who formulated the foreign policies of the last administration. Those same members would formulate the policies of any Democratic administration which might be elected in 1960. The inability of party rank and file to control that council's irresponsible foreign policy statements is one unfortunate penalty of belonging to their disunified party.

Now this points again to the question raised in the first speech of the series by the chairman of our policy committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES]. This is the question: Can a political party, crippled with serious geographical and ideological splits, meet the dynamic challenges of the future age?

Basic Republican unit, I believe, is one reason why the report of the Republican committee on program and progress, commonly called the Percy report, was able to avoid the destructive approaches of the Democratic advisory council and produce a constructive goal for a foreign policy designed to preserve peace with justice. The report said:

> Freedom is our highest aim. Peace, coveted by all our people, is worth every sacrifice except that of freedom.

THE AIM OF SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY

If this is acceptable as our aim, what is the fundamental aim of a Communist foreign policy? Obviously that aim has been to destroy the free world. Conceivably, that aim could change. But the Communist strategy employs and combines military, political, economic, psychological, and ideological means. The way Russia zigzags between those means must not be interpreted to be a change of overall aim.

The Scriptures say: "By their fruits, you shall know them." We await the Soviet Union and Red China to bring forth good fruit, not just good talk, to promote peace and self-determination for all nations. By their deeds we shall judge them.

Until then, we Republicans, like the President of the United States, wait watchfully, looking for new approaches, but never forgetting the basis of the Russian strategy. True, that strategy is in part a carryover of imperialistic Russia's designs at expansion. But it is far more fearsome than the aggression of an Ivan the Terrible or Peter the Great. At heart, it is an ideological belief that history ordains the inevitable victory of communism over free enterprise.

Communists believe their sole mission in life is to contribute to this inevitable victory—or, to put it another way, the irresistible course of history. These are not gamblers, as many past conquerors have been. They do not risk everything on one stroke. They do not feel that their success is dependent upon a gamble.

THE STRATEGY OF LIMITED METHODS FOR UNLIMITED ENDS

Because of this conviction of inevitability, the Soviet Union has relied upon a series of limited means to accomplish her unlimited ends. Russia has avoided chances of all-out war. In Finland and in eastern Poland in 1939, and in Manchuria in 1945, Soviet leadership showed how closely and carefully it appraised the cost of military adventures. It would limit or alter its aims rather than risk expanding the war.

Studies now reveal that in the 1948 Berlin crisis, Moscow accepted many affronts to its prestige rather than risk the crisis cracking into war. As former Army Chief of Staff Maxwell Taylor testified:

> We yielded to a challenge which may well have been a bluff.

The patterns of limited risk was definitely evident in the Korean war. In fact, this was a war the U.S.S.R. fought through pawns. And this was a war which the Far East Communists estimated there was no danger of expanding, because of statements by Secretary of State Dean Acheson which I shall review later.

Continually, the Communists run the gamut from the military to the economic. As long as we will permit any particular method of theirs to be successful, they will employ it.

But what happens when the United States seizes the initiative, when the United States no longer allows the Communists to select the weapons and the places for aggression? The Communists switch to another approach, often nonmilitary. After Korea, for example, they increased their economic and subversive efforts in uncommitted areas of the world. They also renewed their psychological attack and, more specifically, tried to play on the nerves of Western leaders.

The psychological part of their strategy seeks to divide and conquer.

This nerve warfare attempts to produce division within our own country. From past experience Russia has learned that international pressures inevitably lead some faint-hearted Americans to advocate appeasement. By such pressures the Soviets know there is a chance of splitting us apart and undermining our national will. Such is the aim of their nuclear blackmail. This amounts to a strategy of pressures just short of all-out war or a final showdown.

In all cases of blackmail, unfortunately, the more the victim gives in, the more the blackmailer demands.

Russia attempted this blackmail during the Lebanon crisis in 1958, and more specifically during the Berlin crisis of last year. The Eisenhower administration would not be blackmailed. As a result, Soviet strategy again had to shift its method.

But if the United States has a change of national leadership which would change our foreign policy Russia would be tempted again to try Korean-type wars or nuclear blackmail. Let us not foolishly assume that their pattern of zigzags has necessarily ended.

HOW EACH SOVIET METHOD FITS INTO A PROTRACTED STRATEGY

Consider how each step in these limited Communist challenges fits into the overall ladder of the total Communist strategy. Each challenge to the free world, whether military, economic, psychological, or political, is one rung in a protracted conflict that Communists believe will last until the free world is exhausted.

Guided by this protracted conflict strategy, the Russians have achieved an amazing integration of a variety of their efforts. While they are concentrating and coordinating their own efforts, they seek to keep our own efforts splintered and conflicting. They do not want us to relate our space effort to our economic effort, or our political effort to our military effort. They try to induce this splintering of our effort by a series of alternating challenges — for example, hitting the moon, lowering a deadline on Berlin, or underselling us in a trade war.

In every case certain groups in America panic into the Soviet trap and demand a crash, rash program with some short-range, narrow goal. In almost every case this crash program would be merely copying or duplicating one particular temporary instrument in the pattern of Soviet challenges.

You get the total picture of the Soviet pattern only after you consider the influence of Russia's internal conditions on her external policy. The Communists often make threats ostensibly aimed at America or England. Very often, however, their purpose has been to create a crisis climate within Russia which would enable a consolidation of power.

For example, Khrushchev wanted to build up heavy industry. That demanded sacrificing the well-being of millions of Russians. To induce the masses to accept sacrifices, Khrushchev and his spokesmen made bombastic statements about the imminence of nuclear war. So he successfully manufactured his own crisis climate at home.

During the Hungarian crisis, Khrushchev's leadership at home was threatened by the plenum of the party central committee. He reacted with sufficient war talk to scare and consolidate his own people behind his personal leadership.

In Red China, Mao apparently precipitated the crisis with India because of the serious difficulties in his tyrannical domestic program.

Studies indicate that often when Russian threats have been the most warlike, Russia has been most determined to avoid war, and is actually quite concerned about certain domestic difficulties. We should remember this in regard to Premier Khrushchev's speech last week where he talked about a fantastic new weapon.

But the spokesmen of the Democratic advisory council seem never able to analyze the various purposes behind Russian threats or behind their zigzag strategy of limited means. A review of Mr. Stevenson's statements during the Suez crisis and again during the Formosa crisis bears this out. The council members have often advocated retreats before such threats, even when the Sino-Soviet powers did not really expect us to retreat, and merely expected to distract from their domestic problems.

The advisory council approach is a bit naive.

THREE CONDITIONS FOR WAR

Even though the Soviets employ limited means to accomplish their unlimited objectives, three terrifying sets of conditions could force them to reach out for unlimited means, that is, make an all-out, one-blow effort at our destruction.

The first of these would be a condition whereby they miscalculate.

The second would be a condition whereby they feel they possess the power of one type or another to defeat us in one blow, whereby they believe the outcome of such an attempt on their part would be a certainty and not a gamble. Then the Communist strategists would say that their long-expected hour to consummate the Marxian course of history had arrived, and the consummation would be through a holocaust of worldwide aggression.

The third would be a condition whereby internal stresses would so threaten the power or prestige of the Russian leaders that they would seek nuclear war as an insane alternative to loss of personal power. Even if one or two top Soviet leaders elected this course, it seems improbable that other powerful party men would allow the execution of the wild scheme. What is more such a condition would be predicated upon all other avenues of relief being cut off, all constructive flow of world diplomacy having ceased, until only the rash way of a madman remained.

Soviet strategy seeks to avoid and not to advance conditions which could lead to a self-destructive nuclear war. We, too, seek to avoid those conditions. How the Republican foreign policy is equipped to prohibit these conditions from coming about in the 1960's will be discussed in the next speech of the series by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD].

I turn now to the economic side of the Soviet strategy of limited and varied pressures aimed ultimately to exhaust us.

Testimony before the Subcommittee on Economic Statistics of the Joint Economic Committee reveals what rapid strides the Soviet economy is making in certain areas of production and technology. Russia is now experiencing an annual growth of about 6 percent in gross national product, as compared to an annual growth of about 3 percent in America. It is true and encouraging, however, that our factories, mines, and utilities stepped up their production 6 percent in December; this is the greatest monthly gain in more than 7 years.

Of course, when the free world bloc is compared to the Sino-Soviet bloc, Soviet growth is not merely as striking. Parts of Western Europe, Germany for example, have a growth percentage comparable to Russia's.

Nevertheless, the peril is especially great, because part of the Soviet plan is to induce us to forfeit the inherent advantage we have as a free society. At the very time that Russia is adding more incentives and decentralizing certain fields of science and production, groups like the Democratic advisory council advocate greater centralization, regimentation, and statism in the United States. The massive spending program that the council proposed at its December 1959 meeting in New York City could only be implemented through greater centralization, regimentation, and statism.

The greatest danger in the Soviet peril—whether it be military, scientific, economic, political, or psychological—is not that our free society lacks the advantages. It is that we may tragically fail to mobilize the decisive advantages we do possess in an amazing abundance.

Now that I have outlined the nature of the Soviet challenge, I turn to the ways our two political parties have responded to the challenge.

RESPONSES TO SINO-SOVIET STRATEGY DURING TRUMAN ADMINISTRATION

Let us consider how the former Democratic administration, whose members now fill the Democratic advisory council, reacted to this Sino-Soviet strategy—the strategy of employing limited means to accomplish our unlimited destruction.

In 1949, Mao Tse-tung consolidated his hold over China. This was 2 years after General Wedemeyer had been sent there to investigate. General Wedemeyer urgently had advised the White House to give Nationalist China moral and material support, and to send advisers to promote needed reforms in the Chinese Army. General Wedemeyer strongly recommended the only way of saving Manchuria from the Communists: To place it under a guardianship in accord with the United Nations Charter. The recommendation was shelved.

Curiously enough, while the White House was rejecting competent advice and misinterpreting the nature of the Communist peril in the Far East, the White House was advocating the policy establishing NATO in Europe. This the Republican 80th Congress avidly supported. But the Republican 80th Congress never lost sight of the Far East peril.

The entire foreign policy of the previous administration, however, was characterized by this one-sided view. It constantly fell into the Communist-designed trap of seeing the Communist peril with splintered vision, and never as a whole. NATO was important, but Asia was not. Red Russia was a menace, but Red China was not.

Today, as yesterday, the big difference between the approach of the Republicans and the approach of the Democratic advisory council is this: The Republicans see the Communist strategy globally; the advisory council spokesmen see it piecemeal. Thus, they respond with dangerous inconsistency.

For example, Dean Acheson of the advisory council, on the eve of President Eisenhower's departure on his recent good-will tour, afforded Pravda much propaganda material by criticizing any meeting or negotiation over Berlin. Yet, less than a year and a half ago, he called for the United States to abandon protection of the offshore island defenses of Formosa. Thus, he wanted total inflexibility in Europe, but total flexibility—flexibility amounting to retreat—in the Far East.

Let us further examine the dangers of this inconsistent approach, and further beware that such inconsistency does not create one of the terrifying conditions which could destroy the peace.

A few months before the outbreak of the Korean war, the American Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, had publicly declared the limits which the United States would defend in the Far East. Korea was excluded. This was the green light for Communist aggression. Naturally, the subsequent commitment of U.S. troops to the defense of South Korea came as a surprise to the North Koreans.

Nevertheless, the Communists pursued the war, including even direct intervention by the Red Chinese. Had their pattern, which we discussed earlier, changed? Certainly not. But the United States played into the Communists' hands. They granted them a privileged sanctuary—that is, a war-making base in Manchuria which we would not attack.

After President Truman fired one of our great experts on the Far East, General MacArthur, an angry debate took place over the wisdom of allowing the Red Chinese this privileged sanctuary. President Truman's position in the debate announced to Soviet Russia that the doctrine of the privileged sanctuary would still shape the thinking of the White House, despite General MacArthur's warnings of its fallacies. The Communists seemingly could wage aggression indefinitely in Korea without the United States ever changing its defensive response. Our only hope appeared to be in electing a new administration. It is interesting to note that Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., today a Democratic advisory council panelist, has written a book, entitled "The General and the President," which, in effect, supports the privileged sanctuary concept.

This defensive response in Korea merely was one facet of a similar policy followed at that time by the United States throughout the world. This was known as the policy of containment. Its author was George Kennan; its proponents were President Truman and Dean Acheson, presently of the Democratic advisory council. Simply, it amounted to the concept that if you could draw and hold a defensive line around the Communist areas of the world the menace of communism would gradually liquidate itself.

That Maginot-line type of thinking played directly into Sino-Soviet hands. In the 7 years of Truman-Acheson policy, 600 million people were taken over by the Communists, without a single Russian soldier going to combat. Before the new administration took over in Washington, 125,000 Americans had become casualties in Korea, again without a single Russian soldier going to combat. And most of these enormous Communist advances were at a time when we virtually had an atomic monopoly.

Even more tragic, the reliance purely on containment spread to the moral and psychological realm—much to the Communists' delight. This explains why some Americans captured in the Korean war had difficulty in understanding what they were fighting for. The idea of a containment war, where we abdicate to the aggressor all advantages, was without parallel in American history.

THE REPUBLICAN RESPONSES TO THE SINO-SOVIET PERIL

Not until the election of Dwight Eisenhower was our defensive strategy changed. The armistice of July 1953 was produced by notifying the aggressor that the new administration would not tolerate a privileged sanctuary in Manchuria, and, to use Mr. Dulles' own words, that "the fighting might, to the aggressor's peril, soon spread beyond the limits and methods which he had selected."

And how has the peace been maintained since that armistice? Again, I quote Mr. Dulles: By putting the Communists on public notice that if they "violate the armistice and renew the aggression, the response of the United Nations command would not necessarily be confined to Korea."

The Red Chinese have continually tested this policy by threatening Quemoy and Matsu. Even though the President had inaugurated the policy, perhaps America could be divided, once the pressure was really applied. Fortunately, the administration saw that the only way to preserve the Far Eastern peace was to convince Red China that America was willing to defend Quemoy and Matsu if such an attack threatened the security of Formosa. Unfortunately, Democrat political candidates in the fall campaign tried to make voters jittery by destructive statements about the administration's policy of firmness on Quemoy and Matsu. On September 30, 1958, Mr. Stevenson, in a speech supporting a California senatorial candidate, advocated that the United States "get out and stay out" of those islands. He also pressed for Nationalist Chinese evacuation. In short, he wanted a Far East Munich.

It is entirely possible that such political irresponsibility could have convinced Red China that America would return to the doctrine of privileged sanctuary. And thus, Quemoy might be attacked with the same immunity that Korea supposedly could have been attacked in 1950.

Plainly, there is a sharp difference in the approach of the Democratic advisory council spokesmen and the approach of the Republicans to the problem of preserving peace. No wonder the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BOWLES] has commented that the 1958 Quemoy developments "persuaded many Democrats that the safest issues were the homespun ones such as highways, housing, and social security. Here, at least, they felt themselves to be on safe and familiar political ground."

My task in this speech of our series has been twofold: First, to outline the nature of the Sino-Soviet peril, and secondly, to review and contrast the responses of the two parties to that peril. In the introductory speech, the chairman of the Republican policy committee noted four qualities necessary for a political party to face the challenges of our age. They were party unity; party philosophy based on principle; party democracy; and party concern for future generations of Americans.

As to the degree of unity and coherent philosophy the other party possesses with regard to foreign policy, I again quote the gentleman from Connecticut:

> I sense a deep public uneasiness over the absence of an identifiable, predictable, realistic Democratic Party approach to the major issues of foreign affairs.

As to the representation within party organizations, I cannot believe that the expressions of members of the Democratic advisory council really meet the approval of responsible Democrats. Yet that council seems to determine the foreign policy thinking of that party.

Previous administration and the advisory council, more than often, and notably in their Far East diplomacy, responded to the Sino-Soviet peril with short-range, splintered vision.

In the next speech of the series, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] will present seven dynamic spearheads to protect and advance our free society. During this decade Republicans propose to use these spearheads of foreign policy and national security to meet the Communist challenge, to preserve the peace with justice, and to expand freedom throughout the world.

THE LATE ALBERT J. ENGEL, SR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. METCALF). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GRIFFIN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling of deep sorrow that I call to the attention of the House the recent death of former Congressman Albert J. Engel, Sr., who served with great distinction in this body from 1935 to 1950.

Albert Engel died on December 3, 1959, several weeks after he was seriously injured in an unfortunate automobile accident which occurred not far from his Christmas tree farm near Lake City, Mich.

Mr. Engel's death ended a varied and distinguished career. He was born January 1, 1888, in New Washington, Ohio, and attended public schools there until he was 12, when he left his studies to work as a lumberjack.

At 16, he ran a logging locomotive on a lumber woods railway in Grand Traverse County, Mich., until the company learned about his age and released him.

He completed that summer earning $75 with a threshing crew, took the money to Chicago, lodged at the YMCA and enrolled in high school. Working at a succession of jobs, he graduated from high school, entered Northwestern University, and received his bachelor of laws degree there in 1910.

He returned to Michigan and to Lake City, setting up a law practice. He entered politics with his election as Missaukee County prosecutor in 1916, but interrupted his first and only term by going to war. During World War I, he served on the staff of Gen. John J. Pershing in France, and left the service with the rank of captain.

Mr. Engel retained his interest in politics and was elected to the Michigan State Senate in 1921.

His election to the Michigan Senate opened a political career that was to continue virtually without interruption for 29 years. He compiled an outstanding record in the senate, to which he was elected and served in 1921, 1922, and 1927–32.

In 1934, he was elected to Congress from the Ninth Michigan District, and served in that office for 16 years. Mr. Engel retired from Congress in 1950.

Albert Engel was a man of color, courage, vision, and conviction. He earned national acclaim and universal respect as the result of his one-man crusade against boondoggling and irresponsible spending during World War II. Although he stepped hard on military toes here and in farflung parts parts of the world, the walls of his Lake City home are covered with photographs bearing the tributes of great generals and admirals—including President Eisenhower, General Bradley, Admiral Nimitz, General Arnold, and many others.

A vigoroous foe of waste in military expenditures and a dedicated "watchdog" as member—and one-time chairman—of the House Armed Forces Appropriations Subcommittee, he saved the U.S. Treasury—and the taxpayers—many, many millions of dollars.

After he retired from politics, Mr. Engel was content to shun the public spotlight, but he continued working with the same zeal and energy at managing the Engelwood Plantation, which he soon developed into one of Michigan's largest tree farms, on 1,500 acres of once-abandoned Missaukee County land.

His retirement hobby soon became a big and successful business. What it lacked in political color, it made up in real values. The farm has tree plantings now numbering 1,100,000—a significant contribution to the effort to restore Michigan to its once-proud position as a timber empire.

Albert Engel was one of the most dynamic figures in public office for a quarter of a century. To him, public service was a challenge every hour of every day.

He held the same basic beliefs when he retired from Congress that he took with him when he entered the House in January 1935. It has been appropriately said that during his eight terms he changed Washington much more than Washington ever changed him.

Mr. Speaker, Albert Engel was a great American who left an indelible mark on the pages of history. Michigan and the Nation have lost a distinguished statesman.

At the time of his death, Albert Engel left behind him his wife; a son, Albert J. Engel, Jr., who was a law school classmate and a close friend of mine; and two daughters, Mrs. Robert L. Cavanaugh, of Dayton, Ohio, and Mrs. James H. Strahle, of South Bend, Ind.; a sister, Mrs. Harold Taylor, of Bay Village, Ohio; and eight grandchildren. To Mrs. Engel and the family, I wish to extend my deep sympathy in the great loss which has been theirs.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that other Members of the House have permission for 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this subject.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT].

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, all Michiganites and all older Members of this House were saddened recently by the death of an old and dear friend, former Representative Albert J. Engel, of Michigan. I enjoyed a long and warm friendship with Al Engel. All who knew him were somehow better for knowing such a fine person.

Al Engel and I always ran life's race along parallel paths. We were born little more than a year apart. We both completed school and were admitted to the bar within 2 years of each other. We were both elected to our first Congress at the same time. That was the 74th Congress, and, if memory serves correctly, we arrived in Washington on the same day in January 1935. That day began a long and fruitful congressional career during which Representative Engel served his district, his State, and his Nation with dignity and distinction. As a legislator, he was a man of high ability, boundless energy, and deep sense of duty. I shall never forget how he traveled thousands of miles, to all parts of this country, driving his own car at great personal expense and inconvenience and minimum cost to the Government, to inspect Army posts in connection with his committee post. This was his type of devotion.

I have also had the privilege on many occasions to work closely with Al Engel on various projects. It was Al Engel and I, working together, who were successful in getting the first veterans' facility built in the State of Michigan. This was the Veterans' Hospital in Dearborn; and to all who know of it or who have used it, this hospital should stand as a lasting monument to the untiring efforts Albert Engel always put forth for the people of his home State.

In the passing of Albert Engel the State of Michigan, and the Nation as well, have lost a good friend, a devoted public servant, and an eminent citizen. I know that all the Members of the House will join with me in extending to his family the deepest sympathy. They may be forever proud of the name they carry forward.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the senior member of the Republican delegation, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigin. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to come to Congress in January of 1935, with Republicans Albert Engel, Fred Crawford, Henry Kimball, William Blackney, and Earl Michener, who had been defeated in the previous election but returned in 1935, who represented the district now represented by GEORGE MEADER.

Michigan Republican Representatives already here at that time were Carl Mapes, of the 5th District; George Dondero, of the 17th; Jesse Wolcott, of the 7th; and Roy Woodruff, of the 10th. They were all at or near the top on the important standing committees on which they served.

The delegation was a close-knit one, working together.

From the day he came to Washington until he retired, Albert Engel was a personal friend, never missing an opportunity to be helpful.

Our colleague had long served in our State senate, where, because of his ability and his energy, his attention to his official duties, he was one of our leaders. Because of the qualifications he had demonstrated in the Michigan Senate, he immediately was accepted by the older Members in Congress, not only as an able colleague, but as one who could and would—as he subsequently did—render exceptional service to the party as well as to the country.

Because Albert Engel had had wide experience in the Michigan Legislature, because he was an able and aggressive lawyer, because of his self-sacrificing services as a Member of the House, and because of his character, Albert was exceptionally helpful to those who served here with him.

Engel was a wizard with figures. He was a productive worker.

The lack of fear which he had exhibited as a combat soldier in World War I remained with him as a Congressman. He was not only fearless in investigations, but, with his experience as a trial lawyer, his personal knowledge of how a dollar was earned, and his native vigor, he carried on independent, effective investigations on his own, and at a cost to the Government so low that some others, not only in the executive, but in the legislative, branch of the Government, were envious and, sometimes, because he had set a pattern of efficiency and economy, somewhat resentful.

His investigations were effective, in part, because he was on his own. In part, because he was unhampered by others who were dragging their feet.

He had no personal interests of his own to serve.

It followed as a matter of course that he was fair and effective.

He pursued a policy of getting out in the morning, getting into his own automobile, doing his own driving, going into a production plant with and when the workmen went in. To a very large extent, he was one of the workers. Seldom, if ever, was he suspected of being an investigator or a Congressman. He would go through a plant; he knew what he had seen; and he recognized either inefficiency or waste for what it was.

His information came to him firsthand from those who were doing the work, not from the swivel chair boys whom he often embarrassed by his accurate knowledge of what was transpiring, but unrecognized in their own department.

His personal experience gave him an insight which many other Members did not possess. He knew the value of a dollar, and he knew just how many a task in a production plant should be performed. He knew where to find and how to lessen waste and inefficiency, and his report on either was understood by his colleagues.

He not only called attention to practices which were wasteful or inefficient, but he came up with many suggestions as to how a saving could be made, an operation more effectively performed.

He never, in his investigations, prejudged the situation. He weighed the evidence. But when he reached a conclusion, there never was any doubt as to his views.

Whether he voluntarily retired, or in part because he found it impossible to get greater results toward economy and efficiency, or in part because he was urged to become a candidate for Governor of his State or because he wished to retire to private life, I have no way of knowing.

Recently, talking with his son, Albert, Jr., I was told that his father had become somewhat discouraged because he could not see immediate fulfillment of the objectives for which he was striving. This was difficult for Albert Engel, Sr., but he was never a quitter. If he was discouraged with what was happening here, he but foresaw much of the future, for the inefficiency and the ruinous waste, the excessive waste, against which he fought, is still with us—and, unfortunately, in a greater degree than when he was here.

When a candidate, Albert received the wholehearted support of the AFL and of many other labor organizations. I have a distinct and regretful recollection of the fact that some Members of the House were critical because of his vote on some measures. They forgot that Albert represented the views of his constituency on any and all occasions when those views did not, in his opinion, interfere with the welfare of the Republic. During the time he served his Nation so ably and so effectively, he represented and gave effective support to the overwhelming sentiment of his district.

When he voluntarily retired, I am certain that the Members of the House felt a personal loss, as did your humble servant. When recently he passed away, we lost a personal friend; his district lost a vigorous, determined, and able American. His family lost an ideal husband and father.

If reward beyond the grave is based on unselfish service rendered here below, Albert Engel's place has already been made secure.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I was saddened to learn of the death of Hon. Albert J. Engel who represented the Ninth District of Michigan from 1934 to 1950 with distinction.

It was my pleasure to serve with Albert Engel the entire time he was in Congress. He was dedicated to his work, eager to render every assistance possible, and always fair in his dealings with others. He was a man of courage, true to his convictions, and was highly respected by everyone who knew him. He was a tried and true friend, a splendid citizen, and outstanding Congressman and great American.

I mourn his passing and I wish to extend to his family my profound sympathy.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks on the life and accomplishments of Albert J. Engel at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GRIFFIN] and others in paying tribute to the memory of Albert H. Engel. Mr. Engel and I were first elected to Congress at the same time back in 1934. For many years Mr. Engel and I, and we always called him Al, worked together on military appropriations. At one time when the Republicans were in control of the House, Mr. Engel was chairman of the Subcommittee on Military Appropriations. Regardless of the party in power, at the time, Al Engel was always a dominant and influential force in defense activity in Congress. He was a strong man, a fearless man, and indefatigable worker. He was not partisan in his outlook. He had great influence on military appropriations during his service in Congress and his influence was always directed toward economy, efficiency, and military preparedness. One of the interesting chapters in the life of Al Engel has to do with the development of the atomic bomb through the Manhattan project in World War II. Al Engel went along with funds for the project but not until he became satisfied in his own mind that the gamble was worth taking. When the Secretary of War, Henry Stimson, came to the Capitol one day in May 1945 to report on the progress on the Manhatton project he asked five members of the Appropriations Committee to accompany General Groves on a trip to Oak Ridge, Tenn., for a firsthand observation of accomplishments and a report on the Manhattan project. Mr. Engel was one of the five. This was one of the rich and significant experiences of our departed friend.

It seems hard to believe that this rugged man has passed away. When he left Congress about 10 years ago, he left with the respect and good will of the Members who had served with him. I mourn the passing of Al Engel. He wrought well for his country during his lifetime and he left a heritage which his family can always treasure. I pay tribute to the memory of a departed friend, and I express deep sympathy to the fine family which he has left behind.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, Albert Engel, of Michigan, was elected to Congress in 1934 and he served practically 20 years. He was a member of the Appropriations Committee almost all of that time. He was about the best hand at figures that I have ever known. He went out into the field himself and investigated the operations of the Army and brought back his reports in the most complete manner of anybody that I have ever known. Because he found out just what was needed, he was able to cut out a lot of unnecessary items from the bills and reduce the appropriations that were presented to him for action. Few if any Members of the House worked harder and more effectively than he did. He had the absolute confidence of the House of Representatives.

I am extremely sorry to see him pass away, but we all can be thankful that we had such a fine colleague.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues in paying tribute to Albert Engel. Albert Engel was an outstanding Member of this body for many years. I recall before I came to Congress of reading an article in one of our leading news magazines about Albert, the one-man investigating committee. He served on the Appropriations Committee and few have been better watchdogs of expenditures than Albert Engel. This Nation has lost a constructive American and, with my colleagues, I wish to extend my sympathies to the family.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I desire to join my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GRIFFIN], in expressing regret over the death of our former colleague and friend, the late Albert J. Engel, who so ably represented the Ninth District of Michigan for many years.

It was my privilege to have been associated with Al Engel during the first years of my service here and I remember his helpful and friendly advice to me as a new Member of Congress. Al Engel was a sincere and dedicated Member of Congress and worked early and late for the benefit of his district and his country. I recall in particular the outstanding service he rendered as a one-man investigating committee looking into waste and extravagance in the Department of Defense during World War II. Through his efforts, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, millions of dollars in needless expenditures were saved. I would like to join with others in paying tribute to his memory and expressing deepest sympathy to his family.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I was greatly saddened when I learned of the passing of Albert Engel. I wish to join my colleagues from Michigan in paying tribute to his memory.

I had great respect and admiration for Albert Engel. When I came to the House he was one of our most active and diligent Members. He worked untiringly as a member of the Subcommittee on Military Appropriations, and was looked upon as a one-man investigating committee. I have never seen any Member of this House work harder than Albert Engel did in his effort to eliminate waste and extravagance, and to protect the taxpayers of this country.

One of my first contacts with Albert was on Inauguration Day in 1941. I stood on the Capitol steps and watched the inaugural parade with him. I was deeply impressed with his familiarity with every piece of military equipment and every type of weapon in the parade. In many instances he knew the cost of the same.

I considered it a great privilege to serve wtih Albert Engel in this House. His passing is a great loss to this Nation. We need more men like Albert Engel in public life today.

I extend my sincere sympathy to the members of his family.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, there are many of our colleagues whom we remember long after they have left this House.

Albert J. Engel served in the House of Representatives from the Ninth Michigan District from 1934 to 1950. From 1942 on, it was my privilege to know Al, and my esteem for him grew with the years.

When he rose to speak, I listened attentively, for he was always thoroughly prepared on his subject. His arguments for or against a certain measure were most dependable, and were of great help to us in the formulation of our own opinions.

It was my belief that overwork in behalf of his constituents and the Nation was responsible in part for the loss of his eyesight. For Representative Engel was not one to rely on the research of others. He had to see for himself.

When blindness closed the curtains on the world around him, he did not despair. With the dauntless spirit that was so concerned with helping others, he traveled the country in behalf of the Veterans of Foreign Wars when his congressional career was over.

Though he has been gone from this House since 1950, the news of his death has saddened those of us who recall the best years of his life that he gave with such conscientious devotion to the welfare of his country.

We are grateful to his memory for the high standard of public service that he set before us.

We send our condolences to his relatives, and to the larger family of constituents and veterans, for whom he made so many personal sacrifices because he believed in them.

Former Representative Albert J. Engel was a good and faithful public servant who surely earned the reward of eternal happiness.

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, it was with deep sorrow that I learned of the death last December of Albert Engel, a former colleague and close friend. We served together on the Committee on Appropriations for many years, and his dedicated and untiring service as a member of the committee during the crises of World War II was an inspiration to all of us. His personal contribution to the defense of our country began with his service in the Army during World War I. Thereafter he dedicated his life's work to public service in the Michigan State Senate, and subsequently in the Congress of the United States.

It is a privilege to join in paying this tribute to the memory of a distinguished Member of the House. My heartfelt sympathy is extended to Mrs. Engel and their children.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I was very sorry to learn of the death of Hon. Albert J. Engel, who ably represented the Ninth District of Michigan for a period of 16 years, from 1934 to 1950. Those of us who had the privilege of serving with him remember him as an aggressive, conscientious, hard-working Member. He was devoted to the work of the Committee on Appropriations, on which he served with great distinction. He traveled thousands of miles and made many investigations in the hope he could be responsible for savings.

His first public service was as a prosecuting attorney of his home county in Michigan. He had a fine record of service to his country in time of war, having served overseas in France and Germany for 23 months in the First World War.

Michigan and the Nation have lost a dedicated patriot. To his family I extend my deepest sympathy in their great bereavement.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, Albert Engel was one of the outstanding Members of the House of Representatives when he served here from 1934 to 1950 as the Congressman from the Ninth District of Michigan.

The invaluable service which he performed as a member of the Committee on Appropriations is well known, and the recognition he has received in this respect is well deserved.

I specifically want to associate myself with the remarks of my good friend and able colleague, BOB GRIFFIN, who now represents the Ninth District of Michigan. Al Engel's devotion to duty, his respect for the truth, and his effectiveness in obtaining results made him a leader in the House of Representatives.

Personally, I have always been appreciative of Al Engel's assistance to me in the early years of my membership in the House. I was grateful for his competent advice and counsel, and most appreciative of his efforts in securing for me an appointment to the Committee on Appropriations. When he decided to retire from the House of Representatives, Al resigned from that committee when it had completed its work on the budget for that year, and urged my appointment as his successor. This assignment eventually was made and it has been my privilege to serve on the Committee on Appropriations since Mr. Engel left the House. This specific kindness and personal consideration of Al Engel for me will never be forgotten.

I want to compliment Representative BOB GRIFFIN on his eulogy of Albert Engel. We know that "the past is prolog," and that on the solid foundations a more stately structure is erected. Albert Engel built well, so that his successors could stand and work on a firm foundation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I learn with deepest regret of the death of former Congressman Engel, of Michigan. He was one of the historic men of the House and served with distinction on the Committee on Appropriations in the Second War Congresses.

He was one of the most indefatigable men I have ever known and during the war years examined every bill pertaining to appropriations for the armed service with meticulous care. He accepted nothing proposed by the departments at face value until he had examined and explored every detail and could discuss it from a matter of personal knowledge.

He was a member of the committee of five, consisting of Engel, of Michigan; Snider, of Pennsylvania; Taber, of New York; Mahon, of Texas; and myself. It was he who first questioned an item of $800 million sequestered in one of the larger appropriations and for which no explanation was included in the justifications.

When the representatives of the Department declined to explain specifically the purpose for which the money was to be spent the committee refused to approve the appropriation. It was then that the general in charge finally said we were in a race with German scientists on a secret project and if they first solved the problem Germany would win the war in spite of anything we could do and if we solved the problem first we would win regardless of anything Germany could do.

On that basis the subcommittee of five included in the bill, and subsequent bills, large amounts until 2 years later we had appropriated over $2 billion without knowing the purpose for which it was being spent. Eventually the A-bomb was dropped on Hiroshima and the war was ended and the unorthodox procedure of the subcommittee was belatedly justified.

Mr. Engel probably contributed more time and study to the war appropriations than any other member of the subcommittee and his services to the committee and the country were invaluable.

He was great in life and is great in death and the Nation can never fully repay the debt of appreciation we owe him. Peace to his honored ashes.

INTEREST RATES ON LONG-TERM GOVERNMENT BONDS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the President has renewed his request that we permit the ceiling on interest rates on long-term Government bonds—that is, bonds having a maturity date of 5 years or longer—to be removed. To put it another way, he asks that we permit rates higher than 4¼ percent to be paid. This question was discussed at substantial length in these Chambers last year between June and August and a vote was had on the measure. At the conclusion of that debate, the Congress did not accede to the request.

During the course of that debate, many suggestions as to other, and I believe better, alternatives were made. Notwithstanding that discussion and those proposals, we are again given the same recommendation. We are given that recommendation without any review or analysis of the alternatives that might be employed to accomplish the administration's purposes. I think it proper, therefore, that at the outset of this session of Congress there again be a review of these alternatives.

I rise this afternoon to open that public debate and to request that the administration favor not only the Congress but the country with a complete review of these alternatives, in order that we might make our judgments with knowledge of all the alternatives.

But before discussing these alternatives, I think we might do well to line out the areas of basic agreement.

First. We are all opposed to inflation. We recognize that the health of the American economy depends upon the willingness of savers and investors to use long-term debt. Our housing industry, our corporate growth, our utility expansion depend in significant part upon the willingness of business and individuals to undertake long-term contracts. Such contracts are endangered if there is a loss of confidence in the value of the dollar.

We also oppose inflation because it has its heaviest effects upon the weakest part of our society. The aged living on fixed incomes, the unorganized workers, the civil servants, the holders of savings and insurance policies—these are the persons most hurt by inflation.

Finally, we all oppose inflation because we recognize that the dollar is an international currency, that trade contracts around the world would be greatly damaged if there were to be any doubt as to the security and safety of the dollar. So we are agreed that we oppose inflation.

Second. We are agreed that we must express our concern to fight inflation in a tangible fashion. We should make it clear to all of our citizens, both labor and business, and to foreigners, that we are determined to avoid inflation, to protect the dollar, and to preserve confidence in it. We may differ as to the form of this action but we are agreed on the principle.

Third. We are agreed that we want an expanding economy. We want economic growth which is commensurate both with our population increase and our technological advance. We may disagree as to the adequacy of the rate of growth which has taken place in the recent past, but we certainly agree it is necessary for a prosperous nation to have growth.

May I note parenthetically that the administration has a Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth, the so-called Nixon Committee, whereas the Democratic position calls for economic growth for price stabilization. Economic growth should have a prior claim; it is not the end of a stabilization policy but rather its beginning.

The question is not whether the Government can pay more than 4¼ percent. They can pay anything they need to on bonds which have a maturity of less than 5 years, and they are now paying 5 percent. The question is whether we should permit the Treasury to undertake long-term contracts at the peak of our interest rate cycle or whether we should say to them, "Until the interest rate falls to some more realistic and reasonable long-term level, we suggest you get along with short-term contracts."

Certainly a prudent businessman would not undertake long-term debt commitments at the highest rate in history. He would try to get along if he could with short-term credit and make his long-term commitments when he had a more favorable market facing him. Why the Government should now offer to be imprudent is, I confess, hard for me to understand.

The administration says they want to be able to compete in the long-term market instead of in the short-term market because somehow, in their opinion, it is more inflationary to sell short-term bonds than long-term bonds. I think for the sake of the record it is well to make it clear that the fundamental distinction in economic logic and experience is not short- versus long-term but rather to whom does the Government sell bonds. If the bonds are sold to individuals and nonbank corporations, in other words to those who have in fact saved the money, the loans are noninflationary.

If the bonds, whether short or long, are placed in the hands of the banks they are not necessarily inflationary, but they create the potential of inflation because the banks can then use the bonds, by sale to the Federal Reserve, to build up their own reserves against which they might make larger loans. But the Federal Reserve, as we shall see, has adequate means to deal with that.

Before we permit the Federal Government to enter the long-term bond market at this time, the administration ought to speak up forcefully and tell us that what they will be doing is to shrink still further the long-term funds now available for housing. They should tell us that the United States will still further compete in the long-term market with State and local governments, whose own needs for long-term loans are aggravated by administration policies recommended in the recent budget message which neglect the needs for aid to education. They should tell us that they intend to compete with public utilities which must also borrow for their growth in the long-term market.

Now what the administration, in the name of attacking price increases, is asking us is this: "We are asking you, the Congress, to confirm a price increase for money not for a short period of years but for a long period of years so that we may burden down the next generation with the costs of the heavy interest now prevailing." For this doubtful benefit, we are asked to mortgage the future for 20, 30, or 40 years. And the administration assures me it has no intention of protecting the taxpayer by making such high-interest bonds callable.

Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to discover that my estimate of last year as to the cost of interest on the public debt was too low. You will recall that last year the budget message estimated the interest payments at $8.1 billion.

You will further recall the June message when the President requested a larger appropriation for interest. In effect he said, "Oh, by the way, I will need an extra $500 million because the interest burden will be $8.6 billion, not $8.1 billion." I then took the floor to estimate that the interest expense for the fiscal year 1960 was more likely to be $9 billion. And I find in the budget message yesterday that it is now estimated at $9,385 million. This is an increase of $1.2 billion burden on the taxpayers simply to meet the interest payments which the administration has encouraged by the policies it has been using.

So, Mr. Speaker, before we come to the conclusion that we need to engage in cooperating with the Treasury's proposals for long-term high interest bonds, let us examine the alternatives. Let us invite the administration to examine the alternatives not just privately but publicly. Let us know by what logic they come to their conclusions, so that before we join with them in that conclusion, we know how they arrived at it. I suspect that if we review the alternatives, we may reach the same conclusion we reached last year, namely, that there are better alternatives.

Certainly, the increase in interest rates over the past several years has not successfully fought inflation. The consumer price index continues to rise. Moreover, the basic problem is not just inflation, it is that we need a rapidly growing economy because of our population increase and our new technology. A rapidly growing economy demands a large amount of capital. At the moment, the demand for capital exceeds the supply, both from savings and from the increased money supply that the Federal Reserve System provides. We may wish to quarrel with the Federal Reserve as to whether they have made adequate provision to increase the money supply, but that is not the central issue.

Basically, we need an adequate supply of capital and we need a system of making judgments as to what are the priorities among the claimants or among the would-be borrowers. We must recognize that high interest rates are simply a form of rationing money. Lenders give it to those who will pay the highest price. But this kind of rationing has an effect which is frequently offensive to the country and to the Congress. As a result, we have many special provisions of law to exempt the veterans, the aged, the colleges, REA's and other groups from some of the adverse effects of high interest.

I regret to note that the President's budget message for 1961 asks us to repeal, one by one, what slight protection we have given to these weaker sections of the community. Evidently the administration prefers to expose such groups to all of the rigors of an impersonal high-interest market. Such action will, unhappily, have consequences that Congress did not intend. Many will have no real chance to borrow at all. The administration cannot escape responsibility for these consequences of their action by saying they did not intend these consequences because, if they did not intend harm, we might ask what choices they could have made which would have gotten the consequences desired.

If we want an adequate supply of housing, if we want an adequate number of colleges and of elementary and secondary classrooms, how can we best get these consequences? This is the question, it seems to me, that both the administration and we must face. We call upon them to give us a renewed statement of the alternatives. But let me now briefly summarize in broad outline some of the alternatives.

BUDGET POLICY

First, let us look at the budget policy. We welcome the present budget surplus. The receipt of taxes in excess of expenditures promises a reduction of the public debt. The moneys thus returned can be used to meet other heavy demands by other borrowers, and this should have a helpful effect in increasing the supply of funds to meet demands upon the money market.

It would be sound budget policy, though not proposed by the administration, to pay for more of our public capital outlays out of taxes rather than out of borrowings. This is particularly a problem for State and local governments, because they face a growing burden in the years ahead. Their tax systems are not equal to the demands and do not provide revenues equal to needed outlays.

I regret to find that the President has recommended that we encourage State and local governments to indulge in additional borrowings to supply schools, as though in the years thereafter we would not again have to build even more schools. I remind him that the children entering schools today are the children of the young persons born during the depression years when children born to families formed out of the war year classes start to school, there will be a tremendous further increase in the demand for public schools. This period is only a few years away. We should not be mortgaged to the hilt when we enter it. Yet the administration would have us mortgage the future for another 20 years to build schools needed now. I am unable to see how this is a wise budget policy, or consistent with sound practice. I would rather pay for more of the schools needed today out of current taxes, including a suitable share out of the Federal tax structure, because it has greater strength than the State and local tax structures have.

Congress tried last year, and by veto was denied an opportunity even to make loans to build additional college classrooms, even though the Nation must double its college classrooms in 12 years to take care of the visible need. That demand can be estimated accurately.

On the tax side of the budget, we ought to close tax loopholes. In this regard, I am hopeful the Ways and Means Committee will go beyond the budget message. I welcome the budget suggestion of an increased amount of money for tax-collection purposes, because the money spent on improved tax collections will pay for itself many times in additional revenue. It will pay off in public acceptance. A citizen does not mind paying his taxes if everybody pays equally, but he resents paying taxes if he feels many are permitted to escape taxes because of careless tax enforcement.

Let us turn to the expenditure side of the budget. It may be that we could reduce unproductive outlays. We have heard about unification of the Armed Forces. If this were effectively pressed, great savings could be made.

If we could get the administration to adopt budget, monetary, and credit policies which would reduce interest rates, there are at least $3 billion in this year's budget for interest expense that could be used for more constructive purposes.

Or if we could get the administration to go along with the Congress on a modification of the farm program which would move from the acreage allotment to the marketing quota system, and let the farmers hold their own surplus crops in storage, we might get the Government out of the storage business which it is now in, without hurting the farmers. That is the system being used in Canada with great success. I recommend that it be examined.

CREDIT POLICY

What might be done to improve credit policy? First of all, we should seek to increase savings. Most of our savings are made by contracts. When a man buys a house and assumes a mortgage, each payment against that mortgage is a savings payment. The repayment of that debt is in fact savings. Let us accelerate the repayment of debt by using shorter periods of amortization. This could be done without burdening the homebuyer if he could get lower rates of interest in the money market. The same amount of monthly payment would then permit a larger amount to be treated as savings and a smaller amount as interest.

A more generous depreciation or obsolescence writeoff policy in our tax laws would permit the kind of savings that is useful in expanding our capital outlays. It would permit a quicker capital recovery by business firms, and these sums promote expansion. But if we do this we should also revise our capital gains tax treatment so that it does not become favoritism for a few, and a new tax loophole.

Let us turn from the supply side of the credit market to the demand side. We could pay for more of our public capital out of taxes, as we are doing with Federal aid for State highways, or by using part of our budget surplus in this manner. This would reduce demand, as would the more generous tax policies suggested. But let us look especially at the consumer credit policy. The administration certainly ought to undertake a more complete statement on the question of consumer credit controls than they have given us up to this point. Consumer credit has been the biggest single inflationary force in our Nation in the past 10 months. There has been, last year, a $6 billion increase in consumer credit. Remember that the terms of the credit are not merely interest, but they are also downpayment, amortization period, and eligibility of the borrower. If we were to tighten up on the amortization period we could achieve a better effect than we could by merely raising the interest rate, because the consumer does not ask what the interest rate is. Instead, he asks, "What is the monthly payment?" This can best be effected by changing the allowable amortization periods.

To be unresponsive to the inflationary impact of consumer credit is throwing away one of the best antirecession weapons we have.

We know there are business cycles on fluctuations, and when we look at the situation in terms of consumer credit we know that generous consumer credit is the quickest working antirecession measure we have. But if during a period of expansion the consumers are given he most generous credit possible, then there is no further relief that can be given in a recession.

The administration is ignoring the inflationary effect of much of the present expansion of consumer credit. Consumers are really borrowing tomorrow's income for today's consumption. This is certainly not sound credit policy; it is very dubious economics; we are simply putting off paying the piper until tomorrow. It is something else again to encourage the expansion of credit for the accumulation of capital goods.

Summarizing, we might help alleviate the present situation by reducing the demands for money by making it possible for State and local governments to meet more of their needs through grants-in-aid rather than by encouraging more borrowing, and by greater attention to the terms of consumer credit.

MONETARY POLICY

I invite the Federal Reserve to take another look at its kit of tools. Consider first its use of the open market policy. Currently they will only buy and sell securities having a maturity of less than 1 year. They appear to ignore their obligation to provide an orderly market for Government securities. Their policies may well have caused many would-be buyers of Government securities to be hesitant before buying long-term Government securities. In face of the long upward drift of interest rates, one cannot be certain of many buyers at 5 percent, for what assurance have they that rates would not go to 6 or 7 percent? Thus the administration's policy which is also the Federal Reserve Board's policy, is in fact weakening the market for long-term Government bonds. This matter deserves far greater concern than it is getting currently. With an orderly market for Government bonds there should be a relatively stable interest rate. The Government should not give up its concern for the security which the buyer has when he buys a long-term Government bond.

The open market policy must be a part of the whole program for adequate economic expansion without inflation. Moreover, we should use the open market policy to expand the supply of money rather than using the technique the Federal Reserve does of lowering reserve requirements. But the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS] will talk more about that in a little bit. Suffice it to say here that the Federal Reserve and the Treasury have shown disregard of the burden on the taxpayers in the policy they have been following.

The Congress has provided them with other legal alternatives, and we invite them to reexamine their use.

The Federal Reserve has almost ignored the use of "reserve policy" as a device for encouraging bankers to use good credit judgment without the necessity for controls.

The administration has largely ignored the possibility of integrating the monetary and credit policies of the Government lending agencies in an effort to help keep the supply and demand for money within reasonable bounds of each other.

Direct Government loans, many of which we are being asked to abandon by the President, represent an attempt to protect certain sectors in the market from the adverse effects of the policies new being pursued. Either we have a set of priorities for the use of capital or we have not. Either we have a purpose for the nature of our society or we have not. These laws represent a concern for priorities that the administration apparently does not share.

It seems to me that both the administration and the Congress are responsible for the consequences, both of their action and of their inaction. To recommend inaction because you are unwilling to face the hard decisions that action requires is not a way to be relieved of responsibility for the consequences. I trust that Congress will not abandon the aged, the veterans, the small businessmen, or the REA's in response to the administration's recommendations, for these tend to drive them out of the market altogether, and to cut them completely off from the supply of capital.

PRICE POLICY

I have not yet discussed price policies. Certainly, the fact is that most of our inflation is not a demand inflation. It is largely an administered price inflation. The administration should be discussing with us the necessity for more widespread growth as a means to lower prices. A higher volume of output creates lower unit costs, so that even lower prices will still permit the same or greater profits.

The administration ought to be recommending more vigorous antitrust programs. The administration ought to be recommending a further reduction in the tariffs to increase competition in the American market and to encourage increases in productivity. The administration ought to be consulting with both labor and management on the necessity to increase productivity and to lower the unit costs and thus lower prices. The administration ought to be examining the market behavior of steel companies, and manufacturers, and other areas where the price behavior in recent years would suggest some of the real pressures for inflation.

Let us review all of these alternatives and see whether we cannot agree on a set of policies which would provide, at lower interest rates, a better base for an expanding economy without inflation.

I have great confidence in the American business and enterprise system. I am convinced that the American businessman and the American worker, and all American citizens, can take the hard truth. The citizen is willing to face tough decisions, but he needs straightforward discussion of the alternatives and not an intellectual pabulum of predigested economic mush which feeds him the simple conclusion that all we can do, or need to do, is to raise interest rates, that there are no better alternatives.

But, we must make it clear, Mr. Speaker, in whatever we do, that the public policy adopted by the Congress in the Employment Act of 1946 remains the policy of the Congress and the administration. That policy, you will recall, was to assure that we will promote and maintain maximum employment, production, and purchasing power. Certainly, if we are to expect significant improvements in productivity on the part of labor, significant expansion on the part of management in greater investment, then both sides must have the assurance that we really mean to maintain full employment. We are all opposed to inflation. We all favor expansion. We all want a program that will give us adequate expansion without inflation.

But, Mr. Speaker, we must object to the oversimplification which we have been given, especially during the past 8 months. We insist that the whole community must understand the full dimensions of our problem. We call upon the administration to review with us the full panoply of policies which might provide us with the kind of economy that we all say we want, a rapidly expanding economy, one which extends and gives us a higher standard of living, which makes it easier for us to meet all our obligations, both domestic and foreign, without inflation.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS].

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] for his very discerning plea to the administration to reexamine some of its economic policies to see whether it is not possible to evolve a set of policies which, while being adequately anti-inflationary, will bring about a lower interest rate structure, and thus speed us on our way to national growth.

Last summer the President, in the name of fighting inflation, requested Congress to repeal the 4¼-percent interest ceiling on U.S. bonds which has been in effect since 1918.

This House refused to do so. The vote on the question came as close to being a straight party vote as any during the session. The Democrats, the traditional party of low interest rates and economic growth, almost to a man stood fast against this attempt to saddle the administration's high interest rates on the next generation. The Republicans, the traditional party of high interest rates, though it means economic stagnation, voted almost to a man in favor of raising the interest rate ceiling.

Happily for the country, the Democrats prevailed, and the President's request was turned down. Equally fortunately, the full debate on the subject of the interest ceiling gave both parties a chance to state their views extensively.

The Republican position was that the 4¼ percent ceiling was somehow inflationary. When asked for a bill of particulars why it was inflationary, about all the administration could come up with was this: The ceiling prevents the sale of long-term bonds at present, and the higher the percentage of long-term bonds outstanding, the better. It is perfectly true that long-terms do not come due so frequently—possibly just at the time when interest rates are high.

But this is surely no reason to issue long terms at a time, like now, when interest rates have been forced to a 30-year high. During the years after 1953, no serious effort was made to lengthen the term of the national debt when interest rates were low. In fact, the average length of the debt has declined from 5 years and 8 months in 1952, to less than 4 years and 7 months today. Having missed one opportunity of the low-interest years, it is ironic to be hell-bent on issuing long-terms when interest rates are high.

The Democratic position, by and large, came down to this: We had no objection to lifting the 4¼ percent interest ceiling, provided the administration was willing at least to make a good faith effort to put its economic house in order. Unless this was done, we Democrats felt, the administration would be able to market vast amounts of long-term U.S. bonds, bearing interest coupons of 5 percent, 6 percent, 7 percent, 8 percent, or whatever percentage they could put on them, and thus place a 30-year mortgage on an entire new generation of taxpayers.

It is bad enough for the Treasury to be paying 5 percent interest, as it now is, on its short-term obligations. These at least come due shortly, and if and when a Democratic administration takes over in January 1961, and the present high interest-rate policy is thus abandoned, new securities can be issued at reasonable interest rates. But to allow the present administration, with its misguided fiscal, monetary, and economic policies, to exceed the 4¼ percent ceiling, would be to allow it to project the consequences of these misguided policies for a generation in the future.

The administration, as the debate showed, failed to keep its economic house in order in five main ways, so far as the 4¼ percent interest ceiling was concerned:

First. By its sloppy fiscal practices—making a sieve out of our tax system with special interest loopholes, and thus running deficit after deficit.

Second. By its irresponsible inaction in the face of administered price increases in the concentrated industries.

Third. By its continued adherence to the doctrinaire bills only policy, with disastrous effects upon sound debt management.

Fourth. By its stubborn refusal to give the taxpayers a break—through reductions in the cost of carrying the national debt—through use of open market purchases as the means of expanding the money supply.

Fifth. By its opposition to standby controls over consumer credit.

Each of these five shortcomings has tended to raise unnecessarily the interest rate in general, and on the national debt in particular. Let us look at them:

First. Fiscal sloppiness: For some years the administration has been fighting inflation almost entirely by monetary policy—raising interest rates—and not at all by fiscal policy—running a genuine budgetary surplus in prosperous times, then using this surplus to retire portions of the national debt and thus bring down interest rates.

For fiscal 1958, the administration estimated a budget surplus of $1.8 billion. In fact, the year showed a deficit of $2.8 billion. For fiscal 1959, the administration estimated a budget surplus of $500 million. What actually occurred was a deficit of $12.5 billion.

It is very easy for the administration to talk big, when it presents its budget, about the nice surplus that it is going to have. As long as it persists in continuing loopholes in the tax structure, and special-interest giveaways on the expenditure side, these estimates of budgetary surpluses tend to be mirages.

Some years ago back in Milwaukee, we had an old reprobate who solved the problem of giving to the Community Chest in a unique way. Each year, when a solicitor came around, this gentleman would ask what he had pledged last year. "This year I'll double it," he would promise. The solicitor was overjoyed. The only hitch was: the old gentleman never made good on his pledges.

This has been about what the administration has done with its budget estimates. Always in January there is a starry eyed prediction of a budget surplus, to much applause. But the budgets show no real attempt to achieve a balance, much less yield a surplus.

The large corporate farmers who are the special darlings of Secretary Benson come in for the usual tremendous handouts. The newspaper and magazine publishers are protected in their continued Federal mail subsidy.

And on the revenue side, the receivers of dividends bask under the special tax treatment they got under the 1954 act. The oil and gas companies, soothed by the Tidelands oil giveaways, continue to enjoy their 27½ percent depletion allowance. Businessmen continue to luxuriate in the scandalously lax allowance for entertainment deductions. Receivers of interest and dividend income continue to evade the income tax by the billion, through the failure to apply collection at the source for such income.

The failure to produce budget surpluses in prosperous times is an important reason why interest rates are as high as they are.

Second. Administered prices: As the hearings during the last year before the Joint Economic Committee have made abundantly clear, the leading cause of inflation in the economy is not an excess of overall demand, but administered price, and associated wage, increases in highly concentrated pace-setting industries such as steel, automobiles, and petroleum. Seven-eighths of the increase in wholesale prices since 1953, for example, have occurred in steel and steel-using industries. And this despite recessions in 1954 and again in 1958.

The administration's solution to this new problem in American economic life has been to do nothing. The administration opposed H.R. 6263, the so-called Clark-Reuss bill. Under this bill the public would be given the facts on proposed increases that threaten national economic stability, accompanied where necessary by recommendations of the factfinding board on the limits of price and wage increases; even though the recommendations were in no way compulsory, an enlightened public opinion could be brought into play.

H.R. 6263 was favorably reported out of the House Committee on Government Operations on June 9, 1959—with all Democrats favoring it and all Republicans opposing it—and is now before the House Committee on Rules.

Had H.R. 6263 been law a year ago, when the steel strike was brewing, and had a responsible factfinding board been appointed, it is quite possible that such a board would have recommended a very modest wage increase, and a price decrease, and that a strike and a possibly inflationary settlement could have been avoided. Due to administration opposition, the bill is still not a law. The Nation is the loser.

Third. The doctrinaire bills-only policy: Since 1953, the Federal Reserve Board has encased itself in a quite unnecessary "iron maiden"—the bills-only policy, whereby the Board restricts its purchases to only the shortest term securities, as opposed to a policy which would allow it to buy whatever was best for the country. Much of the demoralization of the market for Government securities is due to the doctrinaire refusal by the Federal Reserve to buy U.S. notes, certificates, and bonds—the longer term securities.

Fourth. Disregard of the taxpayers' interests: When the Federal Reserve, in its wisdom, wishes to expand the money supply, it can do so by either of two methods—by lowering bank reserve requirements, or by purchasing U.S. securities on the open market. Both have precisely the same monetary effect. But the second method—open market purchases—has the decided advantage for the taxpayer in that the interest received on such purchases is returned to the Federal Treasury.

Despite this, the Federal Reserve since 1953 has consistently used the method of lowering bank reserve requirements. Had the Federal Reserve instead used the taxpayer-oriented method of open market purchases to create exactly the same amount of money, the net saving to the taxpayers to date would have been at least $500 million, and would continue from here on out at the rate of more than $110 million a year. For the future, if the Federal Reserve augments the money supply at the rate which it has indicated it will, more than $1⅓ billion can be saved for the taxpayers in the next 10 years if the Federal Reserve can somehow be induced to abandon its savagely antitaxpayer policies and use the open market method rather than the reserve-lowering method of creating money.

Yet the administration went into a tantrum last summer when the gentleman from Montana [Mr. METCALF] and myself suggested that it give the taxpayers this kind of a break.

Fifth. Consumer credit controls: The cumulative experience of the postwar period has shown that one of the most potent sources of inflationary pressure, as well as of economic instability, has been expenditures for consumer durable goods, financed by an ever-expanding volume of installment credit, ever lower downpayments, and ever longer maturities.

It is instructive to refer briefly to the year 1955, when cars were being produced at the rate of 8 million, and over half of the record increase in installment credit was supplied directly and indirectly by the commercial banks. Although in the spring of that year students of business conditions warned of the inflationary influence of the rising volume of consumer credit, the administration did nothing to check this unhealthy condition. Only after it became unmistakably clear that the automobile industry had been overextending itself, not only to its own detriment but also to that of the economy as a whole, did the administration begin to move. And what was the nature of its action? The President, early in 1956, after the damage had already been done, requested his Council of Economic Advisers to request the Federal Reserve Board to undertake a study of consumer installment credit. Not only had the subject been investigated at length here and abroad; the Federal Reserve Board had already taken the position 4 years earlier that consumer credit was unresponsive to general credit controls, and for this reason selective regulation of credit would be helpful. Controls with consumer credit worked well during World War II and during much of 1947–52.

In the spring of 1957, the Board published a six-volume study and arrived at the conclusion—despite the abundance of evidence included in the report that indicated a contrary conclusion—that authority for regulating consumer installment credit was inadvisable, and that the use of general controls was adequate to deal with it.

If credit has to be curtailed, as the administration contends, should not the first place for it to be in the market for consumer goods, ranging from uplift-tailfin motorcars to fly-now-pay-later vacations? Limits on the smallness of the downpayments and the length of the period of repayment can remove a large part of the demand for credit from the market, and thus make available lower interest rates for the really essential growth-producing needs of the economy—new plants and new schools, for example. Such controls, by lowering general interest rates, can ease the interest burden of the national debt. Finally, they can space out demand and provide a ready spigot to be turned on if there is an insufficiency of demand later on—instead of satisfying consumer demand for far, far into the future, and inviting a depression in a year or two.

Now, the President is again asking Congress to remove the 4¼ percent interest ceiling. He requested it in his state of the Union message on January 7, and again in a special message on January 11.

Some fair questions to ask the President are: Have you put your economic house in order? Have you invigorated fiscal policy by plugging tax loopholes? Have you come to grips with administered prices? Have you ended the bills-only policy, and the fetish of lowering reserve requirements to expand the money supply? Have you faced up to the problem of consumer credit?

And the answer is that the house is more disorderly than ever.

First. Fiscal sloppiness: There has been no fiscal reform. The President's budget once again points to the mirage of a surplus, but once again it fails to plug any of the tax loopholes without which a substantial surplus is impossible—not to mention a decent margin for the great varieties of national need, domestic and international.

The oil depletion allowance is still a sacred cow. Instead of collecting interest and dividends at the source, and thus adding $2 billion to $3 billion to our receipts out of the hides of the tax evaders, the administration contents itself by urging taxpayers to be honest. Here is the Eisenhower tax reform, sent out at the yearend:

TO ALL TAXPAYERS

Interest and dividends, whether paid to you or credited to your account, must be included in your U.S. income tax return. Accuracy in reporting such amounts, even if small, will benefit both the recipient and the Government, and will avoid expensive enforcement action that might otherwise be necessary.

COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

(U.S. Treasury Department—Internal Revenue Service. Doc. No. 5219.)

Instead of recommending a legislative tightening of the entertainment deduction, there are similar year-end threats directed at the tired businessman.

Second. Administered prices: Instead of setting up a factfinding board to give the public the facts on wages, prices, profits, and productivity in the steel industry, and thus provide the basis for a fair and noninflationary settlement, Vice President NIXON has been allowed to perpetrate what Mr. Walter Lippmann rightfully calls a "political fix." The steel industry's statement in announcing the NIXON settlement was that there would be "no general price increase, at this time." In other words, there can be a series of special price increases in various terms and discounts and other concealed ways at once; and we may look forward to a general across-the-board price increase a few days after the hoped-for inauguration of President NIXON. Indeed, Big Steel warned of this outcome yesterday when it asserted that Mr. NIXON had not even asked the companies to hold the line on prices.

The Milwaukee Journal, in an editorial of January 11, 1960, has well exposed the NIXON hocus-pocus:

STEEL SETTLEMENT NOT BY FREE BARGAINING BUT BY POLITICAL FIX

The dimensions of the steel settlement which Vice President NIXON and Secretary of Labor Mitchell engineered have now become apparent—and also the extent of management's licking.

In return for a 30-month contract, the steel companies gave up a wage-benefit package worth 40 cents an hour, or 16 cents an hour per year. The settlement was reached after a 116-day strike and Presidential use of a Taft-Hartley back-to-work injunction.

In 1956, after a 34-day strike, the steel industry settled for 45.6 cents an hour in return for a 3-year contract. On an annual basis, that is fractionally less than this year's settlement. Yet it was to avoid an inflationary settlement of the 1956 kind that the steel companies held out as long as they did. They were tired of being "pushed around" by the union, they said, and were determined to put an end to "something for nothing" wage increases. Yet when Government, as personified by Nixon and Mitchell, teamed up with David McDonald, of the steelworkers' union, the companies caved in.

The irony of the situation is that the steel industry could undoubtedly have settled at any time for the Nixon-Mitchell terms, and during the early stages of the dispute for considerably less. Well-informed A. H. Raskin, labor reporter for the New York Times, says: "Most observers are convinced that they [the steel producers] could have bought a strike-free settlement for less than 10 cents an hour last June."

In late October, when Kaiser Steel Corp. broke the united company front, the steel firms might still have obtained approximately the same terms. Edgar Kaiser, chairman of Kaiser Steel, estimated the increase at 22½ cents an hour for the 2 years, or 11¼ cents an hour per year.

In the showdown the companies also gave in on the work rules issue. They had fought for the right to adjust these rules in order to increase efficiency as an offset for higher production costs. In the end they settled for a committee study.

No immediate increase in steel prices is promised—which is intended to reassure the public. But consider what happened subsequent to the 1956 settlement. Steel prices were hiked $8.50 a ton in 1956, $6 a ton in 1957 and $4.50 a ton in 1958—a total of $19.

Under the new settlement, the first of two wage boosts does not take effect until next December 1. This timing suggests the neat political touch of NIXON—no wage increase before the election, and therefore no price boost to scare the voters and raise legitimate complaints that while this administration talks against inflation it does mighty little about it when the chips are down.

Viewed from all angles, it is hard to avoid reaching the same conclusion as commentator Walter Lippmann.

"The strike was not settled by free bargaining," said Lippmann. "It was settled by political fix."

So has the Milwaukee Labor Press in its January 16 issue:

THE STEEL STRIKE DEAL

There is increasing evidence that the recent steel strike settlement was timed by the administration in an effort to boost the presidential stock of Vice President NIXON. As pointed out in a story by A. H. Raskin, veteran labor reporter for the New York Times, the steel industry could undoubtedly have settled at any time for the terms which were accepted when NIXON entered the picture.

Raskin has even predicted that the steel firms could have had a strike-free settlement for less than 10 cents an hour last June.

Last October when Kaiser steel settled with the union, the other firms could probably still have obtained approximately the same terms.

However, it was not until the entry of NIXON that the steel companies decided to sign.

If this was not a prearranged deal to have NIXON, the knight in shining armor astride a white charger dash in and save the heroine (in this case the country's economy), what was it?

A Milwaukee Journal editorial last week quotes nationally known commentator Walter Lippmann as saying, "The strike was not settled by free bargaining; it was settled by a political fix."

If this is true, and every evidence points that way, it was one of the sorriest and most shameful political deals in history.

Scapegoats, of course, were the steelworkers themselves, who were kept out on strike and suffered the hardships of the strike until the time that NIXON could make his heroic entry.

This then, is how little both the steel firms and the Republican administration, consider the welfare of the workingman and his family.

Third. Bills only: The bills only policy continues to be gospel with the Federal Reserve. Partly because of this policy, U.S. Government bonds are selling below 80, the lowest price in a generation.

Fourth. Open market purchases: On December 1, 1959, the Federal Reserve allowed the banking system to increase its reserves by some $230 million, by permitting them to count vault cash. Once again, the method of increasing the money supply was the antitaxpayer method of increasing bank reserves, rather than by open market purchases of U.S. securities.

Not only does the administration thus keep right on thumbing its nose at the taxpayer; in its December 1 action, it thumbed its nose at the Congress as well.

When Congress passed the vault cash bill—S. 1120—last summer, it made it crystal clear that the permission thus granted was not to be used to create additions to the money supply by the antitaxpayer method. In the debate on the House floor on July 1, 1959, for example, I said this:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 105, pt. 9, pp. 12487–12448]

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, this bill permits the counting of vault cash as part of a member bank's reserve requirements. It requires that within 3 years the existing Central Reserve city bank classification be amalgamated into the Reserve city bank classification.

I want to make it very clear that Congress, in enacting this bill, has no intention whatever of giving the Federal Reserve a mandate to lower member bank reserve requirements, in the overall. As for the vault cash proposal, the bill simply empowers, but does not direct, the Federal Reserve to permit the counting of vault cash. If, when, and to the extent that the Fed does permit the counting of vault cash, there is no reason under the sun why it cannot at the same time raise the general percentage of reserve requirements for the banks affected, so that the credit-creating powers caused by permitting the counting of vault cash are neutralized by an increase in overall reserve requirements.

As for the provision that New York and Chicago Central Reserve city banks be thrown into the same pot as Reserve city banks within 3 years, this likewise does not mean that any overall decrease in bank reserve requirements is necessary. The present reserve requirements on demand deposits for Central Reserve city banks is 18, for Reserve city banks, 16½. It is just as easy for the Fed to raise the 16½-percent requirement for Reserve city banks to 18, as it is to lower the 18 percent requirement for Central Reserve city banks to 16½. In fact, raising it to 17⅛ percent for both keeps the present level of required reserves.

I make this point because more and more Members are coming to the conclusion that the crisis in the management of the national debt requires that additional bank reserves—the basis of our credit system—be created through purchase by the Federal Reserve of U.S. securities, of varying maturities, rather than by decreasing overall bank reserve requirements.

The debt management crisis has resulted in the current request of the administration for Congress to lift the 4¼-percent ceiling on U.S. bonds, a ceiling in effect since 1918.

The crisis has been brought about in large measure by the administration's policy of depriving the U.S. securities market of all help from the Federal Reserve. In the last 5 years, the Federal Reserve has created $4.3 billion worth of new bank reserves by lowering reserve requirements of member banks. For the future, the Fed's announced policy is to further lower reserve requirements at the rate of around $1 billion a year. These methods help the banks but not the National debt.

The administration, through the Federal Reserve, has thus made a deliberate decision that necessary increases in the money supply—which includes bank credit—should be made by lowering reserve requirements, rather than by the purchase by the Federal Reserve, for its portfolio of U.S. securities of varying maturities. The sole reason given by the Federal Reserve for its practice, past, present, and future of creating needed reserves by lowering reserve requirements rather than by buying U.S. securities, is that the method it has chosen will help member banks make even larger profits, though their earnings after taxes have doubled in the last 8 years.

If the Federal Reserve would create needed additions to the money supply by purchasing U.S. securities rather than by its present method of decreasing bank reserve requirements, it would help out in the national debt crisis in at least two major ways:

First. Purchases by the Fed would tend to keep the prices of Government securities from sagging as low as they do now. When investors see governments that sold for 100 selling in the eighties a few months later, they are frightened off. As the market prices of U.S. securities rise, the going interest rate is lowered, both on U.S. securities, and on all other debt. High interest charges discriminate particularly against homebuilding, schools, highways, and other local government activities, farmers, small businessmen, and all others who need long-term capital.

Second. To the extent that the Fed purchases U.S. securities, the interest charge comes back to the Treasury instead of having to be paid out to banks or other holders of the national debt. The savings to the taxpayer can run into the billions. For example, if necessary, increases in the money supply had been created by the Fed's purchasing $4.3 billion of U.S. securities in the last 5 years, instead of achieving this increase by lowering reserve requirements, $160 million could be saved annually for U.S. taxpayers at current interest rates. For the future, the Fed's net purchases of U.S. securities at $1 billion a year would amount to $10 billion in 10 years, thus saving $400 million a year additional for the taxpayers.

The Federal Reserve and the administration have been putting forth the myth recently that any attempt by the Federal Reserve to help manage the national debt is inflationary. The short answer to this is that as long as the money supply is not increased beyond the ability of the economy to respond, neither the administration method of increasing the money supply—by constantly lowering bank reserve requirements—or the sensible method—by the Federal Reserve's purchasing an equal amount of U.S. securities—is inflationary. The only difference is that the Fed's method helps only the banks; the sensible method cuts the taxpayers of the United States in for at least a small part of the benefits.

Therefore, a proper use of its powers by the Federal Reserve would be to furnish needed additions to the money supply by purchasing U.S. securities, rather than by an overall lowering of reserve requirements. The passing of S. 1120 is no warrant whatever for the Fed to do the latter.

And the conference report on the vault cash bill—S. 1120—of July 13, 1959, contained the following clear statement by the managers on the part of the House:

PURPOSE OF LEGISLATION

During the debate on this bill in the House, questions were raised as to whether the purpose of this bill was to transfer Government securities held by the Federal Reserve banks to privately owned commercial banks. To avoid any possible misunderstanding on this point, the managers on the part of the House wish to emphasize that it is not the intent of this legislation to encourage or cause the Federal Open Market Committee to reduce the Federal Reserve System's holdings of Government securities. As was made clear in the House debate, the purpose of this bill is simply to make needed reforms in the structure of reserve requirements.

BRENT SPENCE,
PAUL BROWN,
WRIGHT PATMAN,
ABRAHAM MULTER,
GORDON L. MCDONOUGH,
WILLIAM B. WIDNALL,
E. W. HIESTAND,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Obviously, since the Federal Reserve is by its own admission now forbidding increases in the money supply, it must offset the $230 million increase in reserves by the sale of an equivalent amount of U.S. securities. Indeed, this is precisely what the Fed is now doing.

Thus is the clear intent of Congress flouted. Somebody ought to tell the Federal Reserve that it is supposed to be the servant of Congress.

Fifth. Consumer credit: On July 30, 1959, at a hearing of the Joint Economic Committee, I had an opportunity to discuss the subject of consumer credit with Chairman Martin of the Federal Reserve Board. The following ensued:

Representative REUSS. When did you come up with your report saying that no controls were needed over consumer credit? Was that about 2 years ago?

Mr. MARTIN. It was the spring of 1957, but I don't think we said "no controls." We came up with an exhaustive report on consumer credit, and we have some inquiries continuing in that field.

We did not come up specifically and request controls. We had those controls taken away from us in 1952, as you remember.

Representative REUSS. Let me ask you to do this and submit it in time for the completion of this record here.

It does seem to me, from all I have heard from you, Secretary Anderson, and others, that we may well be getting into a period of real inflationary excess of demand. I would not think I was doing my duty as a Congressman, and particularly as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, if I did not have the benefit of the judgment of the Federal Reserve System as to whether controls over the amount of downpayment and length of maturity of consumer installment credit may not now be necessary.

I say this in recognition of what has been said about excess demand for goods, and in recognition also of what has been said about excess demand for savings.

Certainly, if you could cut down on the demand for credit by installment sales somewhat, you would make a little happier the market for short-term Government securities.

Would you, therefore, file, at your convenience, but as soon as you can, a report on this with the Joint Economic Committee, so it will be included in our record?

Mr. MARTIN. I will be very glad to. (Hearings, Joint Economic Committee, July 30, 1959, p. 1490.)

Toward the end of 1959, the Federal Reserve submitted its answer to my question whether it was for or against standby consumer credit controls. Here is the Federal Reserve's answer:

An important factor in the heavy demand for credit which has generally characterized the postwar period has been the use of credit by consumers. This has included, on the one hand, short- and intermediate-term credit, such as charge accounts and installment credit and, on the other, long-term credit in connection with home mortgages. Since 1946 short- and intermediate-term credit has increased $38 billion to a total of $47 billion on June 30, 1959, and long-term mortgage loans to consumers, associated almost entirely with the purchase of homes for their own use, have risen by almost $100 to $117 billion as of June 30.

Whether the growth of this credit should be subjected to some form of selective restraint is a complex question involving judgments as to equity and administrative feasibility, as well as monetary policy. However, there is little question but that restrictive regulation of the terms offered to installment and mortgage borrowers would effectively reduce the total demand for credit and thus relax somewhat the upward pressure on interest rates. Conversely, it is also certainly true that the liberalization of terms, both as to downpayments and maturities, which has taken place since 1952, has contributed to the demand for credit and the upward pressure on rates in the recent period. This liberalization and expansion has been the result of the competition among private consumer lenders and installment vendors, in the case of short and intermediate credit, while in the case of long-term credit the Federal Government itself has taken the lead in promoting progressively lower and lower downpayments and longer and longer maturities on real-estate loans.

As indicated above, the selective regulation of the use of credit by consumers raises many problems beyond those implied in the general restraint of credit-financed demands. Such regulation has been vigorously opposed by interested groups whenever it has been proposed. After weighing the many conflicting arguments enumerated in the study submitted by the Board in 1957 (see pt. I, vol. I, ch. 16), the Congress may determine that the balance favors establishment of permanent authority to regulate consumer credit. To be fully effective, such authority would have to cover long- as well as short- and intermediate-term credit and should be permanent, broad, and flexible in character. Application of the regulations should be limited to periods when the need is sufficient to justify the considerable burden such regulation imposes on the businesses directly affected and toleration of the discriminatory aspects which are unavoidable.

The Board does not feel justified, at this time, in taking the initiative in a recommendation to Congress in this matter. The effectiveness and workability of this kind of selective regulation depends heavily on broadly based acceptance and support. Whether such support exists can best be determined in the forums of the Congress itself. (Hearings, Joint Economic Committee, July 30, 1959, pp. 1490–1491.)

Here, I submit, is a case of pussyfooting over and beyond the call of duty. When the Fed has in mind a project that will raise interest rates—the "bills only" policy, raising the rediscount rate, selling from its portfolio of U.S. securities, for example—it displays no sensitivity about the desires of Congress. It just goes ahead and raises interest rates. But where the question is one of possible standby consumer credit controls—which would lower overall interest rates—the Fed believes in leaving it to George.

So, in the five areas of economic policy in which major reforms are needed, the situation has not improved since a year ago. It has grown worse. The administration has done its best to raise interest rates throughout the economy.

Let the administration put its economic house in order. Let it make a good-faith effort at the reforms that have been indicated. If it does, we will be ready and eager to remove the ceiling, which would then be an unnecessary clog on a responsible economic policy. Until it does, let our motto on the 4¼-percent ceiling be "They shall not pass."

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. The gentleman made this statement: He mentioned that he was in favor of a more moderate increase in the steel settlement. I assume then that you were opposed to the wage increase which the workers received. Is that true?

Mr. REUSS. I am opposed to government by secrecy and to the failure of Vice President NIXON and of the administration to let the public interest into the steel settlement. I would like to have seen a recommendation made which gave to the American public the facts on this crucial matter. This is not just a matter for the wage earner and for management, but for the entire American public.

Whatever the economic facts showed, I would be willing to let the chips fall where they may.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. But you did make the statement that a more modest settlement would be desirable, which caused me to conclude you were not in favor of the increase they received.

Mr. REUSS. Yes. I am glad you raised that point. I think in the interest of the Nation's economy a decrease in the price of steel was, is, and will be essential. If that means that the wage increase had to be only a modest one, so be it. I think that the Nixon formula is not in the public interest.

If a steel price decrease would have meant that labor would have received a lesser wage increase than it got, then let me say here very candidly that I would have supported such lesser increase, if that is what the economic facts showed. My point is that we are all alike grappling in the dark here. The public needs the facts, and it is a crying shame that Mr. NIXON did not see fit to give the public the facts.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I was under the impression that Mr. Kennedy, father of the aspiring presidential candidate was also not above secrecy in what he did. Do you decry that too?

Mr. REUSS. I do not think the same strictures about secrecy in Government apply to a retired businessman who holds no public office as apply to members of the administration.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I would like to ask just one further question, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I am not as great an authority by any means on this subject as are the two gentlemen now in the well of the House, and I certainly respect their viewpoints. I was under the impression that there was considerable criticism here by the gentleman from Wisconsin. In his closing remarks he made quite a few critical statements about the Federal Reserve Board and their policy, and so on. If I am wrong I would like to be straightened out.

Mr. REUSS. The gentleman is quite right; I did make critical remarks.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I was under the impression that the Federal Reserve Board was a creature of the Congress. Is not that true?

Mr. REUSS. The Federal Reserve Board is, indeed, like all administrative agencies of the Government, a creature of the Congress. However, the administration is responsible for its actions; and far from criticizing the actions of the Federal Reserve, far from trying to make the Fed walk correctly where it has walked incorrectly, the administration has cheered to the echo of each misguided act of the Federal Reserve, and has nuzzled the Fed's whole set of misguided policies to its bosom. I think that is a legitimate subject of criticism.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. It is a fact though that the Federal Reserve Board and system are not like other Government agencies but are an independent agency as compared with those which are directly under the thumb of the executive branch. Is not that true?

Mr. REUSS. The gentleman is correct. That, however, in no way absolves the administration from its duty as guardian of the Nation's economy of speaking out on what it regards as sound monetary policies. If the Federal Reserve wishes to differ from the administration, that is, of course, its privilege. The point, however, is that the administration, far from saying that it disagrees with the Federal Reserve, applauds the Fed and urges it to go further in its misguided course.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I for one, and maybe one or two others, disagree entirely with the gentleman's presentation. I do not suppose we could solve this here today, but I do believe that the Federal Reserve Board is an independent agency, and the gentleman is a member of a very powerful committee of the Congress. If they thought all of these accusations were factual and that something ought to be done about them it would be a simple and expedient way to meet these problems by proposing legislation to make the necessary corrections. Many of the things about which the gentleman has been critical could, if there were a desire on the part of the majority, be corrected by the introduction of legislation for Congress to consider. I am sure that would be the proper way.

It is easy to be critical of those who have the responsibility. I would suggest only that if the Federal Reserve Board is not living up to the expectations of the gentleman, that through his powerful committee influence the necessary legislation could be introduced and recommended to the Congress.

Mr. REUSS. I thank the gentleman; and I have done exactly that, following down the list of items I have suggested.

Under the so-called Metcalf amendment of last summer, of which the great majority of Democrats on the House Ways and Means Committee were in favor, and to which the great majority of the Republicans on the House Ways and Means Committee were opposed, both the bills only policy, and the doctrinaire reliance on lowering reserve requirements for expanding the money supply, would be changed. I hope the gentleman will perhaps be willing to vote with us on a similar amendment at this session.

On the question of administered prices and the administration's do-nothing attitude, I am particularly proud that H.R. 6263, the Clark-Reuss bill, was reported out of the House Government Operations Committee by the unanimous vote of all Democratic members, and was voted against by the unanimous vote of all Republican members. I hope that a similar nice, clear-cut party line will be evidenced when that bill reaches the floor of this House, as I hope it will shortly, so that these great national economic issues may be argued out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. METCALF). The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 minutes after all special orders for today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

CHANGES IN OUR SOCIAL SECURITY PLAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ADDONIZIO] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, in the social security amendments of 1958, the Congress increased the amount of social security benefits, and strengthened Federal assistance in the programs for needy aged, the blind, the disabled, and children. I was glad to support these much needed changes. But there are other changes in our social security plan which were not written into the law, but call just as urgently for action. Among the next very vital improvements which must be made, in my opinion, are, first, the eligibility age must be reduced to age 60 for both men and women in recognition of the shortening working life of an automating economy; second, disability benefits must be made available to workers at any age, rather than holding to the arbitrary limitation of paying them only to workers aged 50 or over and other corrections made in the disability program; and third, the provision which limits the earnings of social security beneficiaries to $1,200 a year must be removed.

First of all I believe now, as I have long believed, that the retirement age of 65, set over two decades ago in the midst of a depression, is about as unrealistic for our times as is a 1935 airplane or automobile. It is true that, finally in the 1956 amendments, we cracked the age barrier which had held for so long, but it was a very slight crack. As you know, Congress lowered the eligibility age for full benefits for only two groups of beneficiaries—widows and dependent mothers—and moved it down only 3 years from 65 to 62. Wives and women workers received a slight concession, in that they were permitted by these amendments to apply for actuarially reduced benefits at age 62. A reduction of the retirement age which chops off 20 percent of the amount of benefit a woman worker would otherwise receive and 25 percent of the amount a wife would receive can hardly be called a liberalization.

The stark fact of our times is that many of our workingmen and heads of families are now being forcibly retired by age 62 either by illness or by the edict of their employer or the company's retirement plan. They may be able to qualify for short-term unemployment insurance benefits but this is the only Federal program which covers this situation. But we must, I believe, face up to the fact that unemployment insurance is no answer for this situation because it is predicated on the concept that the worker will return to a job. Most of these people will not because they cannot. And each new streamlining of plant or procedure, designed to increase productivity, merely compounds the problem of older men and women trying to stay on the job until they reach social security's retirement age. It seems not only a matter of individual equity but wise social policy, to allow these people to receive their social security benefits at least at age 60 when they have thus been retired by circumstances beyond their control.

We must always keep in mind the fact that lowering the eligibility age to 60 does not mean that everyone will automatically retire at that age. Even under the existing social security plan, with its eligibility age of 65 for men, the average age of those men who first apply for benefits is around 69 years. Can there be better evidence that a lower eligibility age would not lead to a wholesale walkout on the job of everyone reaching age 60 as some people have predicted they would. Rather the age 60 provision would recognize that the time of retirement varies with each individual and is not an event which occurs invariably and automatically on the morning of a 65th birthday.

Secondly, I am convinced that justice dictates that we make all workers eligible for benefits who have been, in effect, retired from their jobs by a total and a permanent disability. Under existing law—and after a hard fight—we did in 1956 introduce this disability benefit concept into our social security system but the payments were limited to workers age 50 and over. Because it was a new program, calling for new administrative procedures, it seemed wise at that time to adopt this approach. We now know that the disability program works. It is time, therefore, to recognize that this is a problem not exclusively for people 50 and over.

The Ways and Means Committee report stated in 1956:

> Certainly there is as great a need to protect the resources, the self-reliance, the dignity, and the self-respect of disabled workers as of any other group. As the advisory council to the Senate Committee on Finance pointed out: "The protection of the material and spiritual resources of the disabled worker is an important part of preserving his will to work and plays a positive role in his rehabilitation."

This philosophy, I submit, applies equally as well to the man severely disabled before age 50 as it does to those who can now receive benefits because they have attained that age. Indeed, the young father who undergoes the tragedy of such a completely crippling accident or disease may have the best right to claim benefits not only for himself but for his wife and children.

One of the bitter truths about the way our present system operates is that if the young father is killed or dies under such circumstances, his wife and children are entitled to such benefits, but if he manages to survive but is still so crippled that he cannot work, they are not. This distinction, is, to my mind, totally indefensible especially in view of the fact that our present disability system has built-in provisions to encourage rehabilitation services.

The program should also be extended to wives and widows who are permanently and totally disabled. Experience has also demonstrated the advisability of removing the requirement of a 6-months' waiting period before benefits can be paid again to disabled persons who unsuccessfully tried to return to work, and of extending the 12-month trial work period for persons drawing disability insurance benefits to include all types of rehabilitation programs.

I commend the Ways and Means Committee for holding hearings on the disability program during adjournment, and I am confident that these will result in substantial improvements in the law itself and also in the administrative procedures which have proved so cumbersome.

This brings me to my third point—the quixotic earnings limitation for people receiving benefits, entitled the "retirement test," which begins to cut off benefits when people receiving them earn over $1,200 a year. If there is any one provision of the Social Security Act which brings about more misunderstanding—and more hardship—than this one, I have yet to discover it. First of all, I believe it is wrong in principle because it actually discourages those older people who can find jobs from working because, if they do, they may actually receive less money during the course of a year than they would have if they had sat idly at home. This is true because of the "block unit penalty" which deducts 1 month's benefit for each $80, or fraction thereof, of earnings in excess of $1,200 per year. As a result, one man may earn $1,200 a year and receive all of his social security benefits, while his neighbor, who happens to go just a few cents over the $1,200 limit—say he earns $1,200.20—can lose a total benefit, including a wife's benefit, of $174. Thus because his total annual pay happened to exceed $1,200 by as little as 20 cents, his total annual income is reduced by $173.80.

Furthermore, I submit that this provision is so excessively complicated in its operation that it takes the wisdom of a prophet and the training and skill of a topflight lawyer—or a topflight bureaucrat—to understand its machinations. Listen to this little section from the booklet, "Your Social Security," which is written to try to inform the American people of their rights in this matter. With regard to people working for wages it reads:

> If your earnings are over $1,200 in a year or if you reported that you expected them to be more than $1,200, you must make a written report at the end of the year. You can get a special blank for this report at your social security office.

The man or woman who takes a job while receiving benefits thus obligates himself not only to report to his nearest social security office and make a guess as to the amount of money he may earn during the year, but also he must report again to the social security office at the end of the year. Moreover, the net result of all this effort is, as I have said, that he may actually lose money for taking the job.

The case of a self-employed individual is even more confusing, for here we are dealing with a concept not as clearly identifiable. He will be permitted to keep his benefit for any month in which he does not perform substantial services regardless of his annual earnings. Again the explanation in the little booklet, "Your Social Security," suggests the complications which may result to the self-employed man who likes to keep busy in his little store, in his office, or on his farm even though he may not be able to work on a full-time basis. As to what constitutes those substantial services the little booklet reads:

> There is no single rule for determining whether a person is performing substantial services in self-employment. There are many factors to be considered for different kinds of self-employment. The Social Security Administration will make decisions based on the facts in each case.

Clear? How, without hours of consultation at the social security office, it is possible to conform to this law is more than I can see. Moreover, the fact that conformity with the law calls for hairline administrative distinctions in a variety of work situations, smacks of the kind of bureaucratic control of individual rights and equities which we have always—and proudly—opposed in this country.

Finally, I am opposed to this provision because it applies only to earned income but has no effect whatsoever on unearned income, such as money flowing in from rents, stocks, and dividends.

The Congress has always recognized the problems arising from the retirement test and we have on four different occasions, tried to ease its effect. But we have done so, I am afraid, at the expense of making it so complicated and so capricious in its results that we have only succeeded in adding bewilderment to indignation.

I am gratified at the ever increasing recognition of the health problems confronting the great majority of social security beneficiaries. I trust the committee will give further consideration early in this session to the plans for protecting our retired citizens against the costs of medical and hospital care.

I also urge sympathetic consideration to the need for increasing monthly benefit payments and widows' benefits. They are not able to rely upon their earning capacity to maintain the decent American standards of living on which this Nation prides itself. The steady erosion of purchasing power of our retired persons' fixed income robs them of any enjoyment of their hard-won leisure years. To be effective the system must be kept current with economic facts.

I believe I speak for the American people—and toward the goal of attaining the kind of a social security system which they can understand and which provides real security—when I recommend the enactment of these improvements in the law. At a time when our country is challenged as never before we must demonstrate to the world that we are not only capable of conquering space and controlling the atom, but also that we can take care of our own people.

ECONOMICS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. THOMSON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the discussion that has just taken place. It was not my good fortune to be here all of the time. I have been tied up with my committee assignment on the Appropriations Committee.

I was particularly intrigued by some of the items to which the gentleman from Wisconsin and his associate in these remarks referred. He particularly mentioned the oil depletion allowance as a tax loophole which to me seems to indicate a great lack of understanding of the purpose of the oil depletion allowance and what it is intended to accomplish, for the good of the country, and has accomplished to a good degree.

I realize that the State of Wisconsin is not blessed with large oil reserves; however, in the district and in the State represented by the gentleman from Colorado, it is of increasing importance to the economy of that State. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado if he joins in pointing the finger and saying that the oil depletion allowance is a tax loophole?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I am not sure I would use that frame of words. I would say that the purpose of a special tax provision for the recovery of capital has its place. In my own remarks, which the gentleman may have missed, I made the observation that I favored those tax laws which were necessary to encourage the recovery of capital. I suggested that once capital had been recovered by tax favors, however drawn, whether they be by depreciation, obsolescence or in this case by depletion allowance features, I would then try to prevent an unfair gain to those favored persons or industries by modifying the capital gains features accordingly.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my comment is with respect, therefore, not only to oil depletion, but with respect to a rapid amortization or depreciation schedule with respect to any corporation. You will recall that up until a few months ago we had many such schedules for many so-called defense industries.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Now, if the gentleman would not mind, with respect to oil depletion allowance—that is rather a simple proposition—do you favor or do you not favor the 27½ percent allowance that has been in effect for several years?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I am trying to suggest to the gentleman, unless we are trying to rewrite the tax laws here this afternoon, that there are fundamental principles out of which tax revision should come. I am suggesting that there are two basic principles here which are involved. One is the need of the tax system to provide a structure which will encourage investment by assuring rapid recovery of capital to the investor, however that is being done. Depletion allowance happens to be a method. It may not be the best method, but I am in sympathy with the fundamental purpose. But, I would add that once one has been granted, by whatever tax rate, the right to a rapid recovery of capital, then a subsequent sale of the same asset at a much higher price is a double recovery of capital, or means that depreciation did not occur, this becomes something more than true capital gain; it is a tax favor which is unfair as between taxpayers. And, therefore, there is a second basic principle, namely, equity as between taxpayers, which also would govern any sound tax revision structure that I would propose. My answer as a legislator to the Committee on Ways and Means would be in terms of those two basic principles.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. If I understand the gentleman correctly, then, his position is that he would favor some depletion allowance, not necessarily 27½ percent, until the producer had on a given well, recovered his cost of exploration on that particular well, his development cost and his operation costs, and thereafter no depletion; is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. No; I did not say that. The gentleman presumes to press my comment far beyond its purpose. I was saying "recovery of capital." Obviously, capital spent in the oil business is spent whether it produces a dry hole or a producing hole. If one wants to attract and hold sufficient capital into any industry, into our industrial life, one needs tax laws with respect to accounting which will help attract and hold capital. I favor tax laws that will attract and hold capital. They need not go beyond that basic point, and I think it is incumbent upon the Committee on Ways and Means to examine and adjust all of the tax laws, not merely this one, to see whether in any given area we are not being unduly generous or, shall I say, playing favorites as among Uncle Sam's children.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Now, may I just say to the gentleman that some of the policy thinking evidenced by the factions apparently in control of his Democrat Party very closely approaches the proposition he presents; that is, that the tax laws should go only so far as to allow a man to recover his capital. That is a dangerous proposition in this country when you say there is no reward for free enterprise, no profit allowed to the man who risks his capital in order to create new wealth, new jobs, and new economic resources for this country so that he can go forward, as we have over the years, under the free enterprise system. The idea of recovery of capital alone is not getting to the problem of the depletion allowance. Depletion allowance is also based upon the high risk incident to investment of capital in the oil industry and the attraction of the new capital necessary to maintain our production and our reserves. It is different than any other natural resource that I know of in this respect. We must encourage the exploration for, and discovery of, new oil, which is essential to the security and well-being of this country. To further the economic prosperity of our area and the whole surrounding Rocky Mountain area, as well as other great producing areas of this country, it is incumbent upon us to find oil. And may I say that in the Rocky Mountain area from which we both came that the facts will show, the incontrovertible facts, as far as I know, that in the last few years the cost of discovering a new barrel of oil has exceeded the price which that barrel of oil brings when it is brought to the surface and marketed, after deducting production costs and marketing costs.

Further, I say that not only are you toying with the economy of a great part of our country, when we make such statements about the oil depletion allowance, but, over and beyond that, the Cabinet committee, the Office of Defense Mobilization, all those who have looked into this proposition, have come up with the hard cold facts, which were brought to our attention particularly by the Suez crisis, that we must have for the security of this country a firm, producible supply of liquid petroleum products, which was fixed, I believe, somewhere in the neighborhood of 7 to 8 million barrels a day. It was put in percentage figures in order to limit the percentage of daily imports of oil.

Mr. Speaker, I say if we are going to point the finger, merely to try to embarrass the administration, to such things as this and say that they are tax loopholes, when in fact they represent good, sound tax legislation that is absolutely essential to the economic well-being of this country and the security of this country and, therefore, is tied into the peace of the free world, then we are doing a distinct disservice, in my humble opinion. I think that is enough on that particular point.

Am I to understand, furthermore, that the gentleman is of the opinion that tariffs and restrictions upon imports are no solution to some of these economic problems? If I understood the gentleman's statement correctly—I came in a little late and did not hear all of it—he said in the latter part of his remarks that he would be opposed to that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The purpose of my remarks in the field of price policy was to note that a certain portion of our economy faces growing competition from oversea trade. I was advised, for example, that steel can be delivered to western Nebraska from foreign countries at lower prices than it can be purchased from Pueblo, Colo., nearby. We cannot hope to maintain a healthy economy by providing special shelters for those who will not undertake effectively to compete. We in America have demonstrated our capacity to compete and to compete freely. I, therefore, recommend that we continue that policy.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Taking into consideration the problems that the American producers and American workingmen face in terms of taxes which they must pay, and considering the money that some pay to build a plant abroad for their competitor to produce, which means to produce at a lower labor cost, do they not invite communism or at least offer a foothold to communism? The gentleman and I are both interested, for example, in sugar and the extension of the Sugar Act. I have just had the Library of Congress and others doing a little work on that question and I find that in the beet sugar area where we come from, the labor cost in the year 1958 was 94.8 cents an hour which did not include fringe benefits, bringing the total to over $1. In Cuba I find that the unskilled agricultural worker there in the sugar industry gets 36.4 cents an hour. I find that for cutting and loading cane they get 40.1 cents an hour. Does the gentleman think that the agricultural workers in Colorado, Wyoming, Minnesota, and in over 20 of our States throughout this Nation that produce beets and beet sugar, can compete with that kind of labor scale without some kind of protection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The gentleman knows full well that the Sugar Act has been a remarkable success. I wish that the administration had paid more attention to the methods of the Sugar Act in other agricultural areas. We have used an allotment quota system effectively in order to provide an orderly and stable market.

Sugar is almost the only basic commodity whose price has not increased during the past 10 years. If the gentleman's research into Caribbean sugar had gone further, he would have found that the rains come there but the winters do not. You can harvest three crops a year. So in addition to whatever labor economy is present you have also economy in land use there. We cannot fully compare the two.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Will the gentleman just answer my question? Does he think that our agricultural workers in the beet sugar areas should try to compete, that our American producers, farmers, and refiners out there should try to compete with this 40-cents-an-hour wage paid in Cuba, and does he believe they can do it successfully?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Yes. The district I represent produces approximately 15 percent of the sugar beet crop in the United States. Let me say that the American sugar beet industry has shown remarkable imagination. They have mechanized. They are using far less stoop labor today than they did 10 years ago. Great progress has been made in mechanization in the sugar beet industry.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. As one who has done some of that stoop labor I agree that what the gentleman has said with respect to elimination of much of it is absolutely true and I for one am happy for it. The Sugar Act is worth while because it affords protection to the American worker and the American producer. I think they should have it. But why turn around then and say that in steel, as compared with Japan, where the industrial wages are 60 to 90 cents a day, while ours are $3 an hour, our steel producers ought to be able to compete with that sort of thing?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The error is frequently committed of confusing hourly wages with per-unit labor costs. As you increase automation, for example, and provide for greater use of laborsaving machinery, a comparison of the actual cost of labor time per unit of output bears very little relationship to the hourly wage.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Does the gentleman think our people should be able to compete?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Yes. We have been doing it all our lives.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. The gentleman may have had the same experience I had when home. I found the only barbed wire you can buy in Wyoming is that produced offshore. Almost all of the generators going into our dams are produced offshore. Even the pipe for oil pipelines and other types of pipe, metal pipe, is coming from offshore. Does the gentleman think that is a healthy situation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Of course it is a healthy situation to have competition. I am surprised that a Member of the opposition party would be suggesting that American enterprise cannot compete. We have competed successfully throughout our history and we will go on competing. I recently had the opportunity to sit at the feet of Charles Taft and heard him make an excellent speech, to the effect that when American enterprise had been forced to compete it has done so, and it can do so now.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I wish I had been there, because I would have been on my feet instead of sitting at his feet. I am for competition. I believe the American worker and the American businessman can compete with the best in the world, and they have proven it when they operate under fair rules of competition. But the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for Foreign Aid, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PASSMAN], brought out as we were considering the 1958 appropriation that when you tax the American people to produce the foreign aid to build a factory some place else, when our State Department in a particular instance says, "Yes; we will make it possible for you to go into the textile business in the Far East, in this case, we will arrange through foreign aid for you to go in business and build a factory for you, and we will give you the cost back if the Communists take over, and we will guarantee a certain rate of return, and then we will help you get the American markets away from the American businessmen and workingmen so you will have better than a fair proposition," then that is not operating under fair circumstances; but that was an actual case and that is what has been going on. The American farmer, the American worker, the American producer, the American businessman, can compete under fair circumstances but he cannot be expected to compete when he is asked to pay higher taxes to finance the rest of the world, and he cannot compete when he is faced with a labor cost such as we have been talking about here. Yet these higher labor costs are synonymous with our higher standard of living and we are all for that.

When the Sugar Act was up for extension in 1955 and 1956, during my first term here, I pointed out that the real danger was that the real people involved were the Wall Street interests who control the American-Cuban sugar production over there.

At that time I predicted what would happen, and that is what now has happened. These people looking for this favored labor position and looking for this favored tax position, own about 24 percent or 25 percent, as I recall, of the plant but produce over 40 percent of the sugar. But they keep these people, in order to maintain that unfair advantage, in a straitjacket as far as low wages are concerned. Then, as I believe Grover Cleveland for whom I think most of you gentlemen over there would agree was a pretty good President said, I believe in his fourth state of the Union message, this type of condition creates a hot bed for communism. Now look at what has happened. In this type of situation where people cannot afford to put clothes on their children and shoes on their feet, naturally, they are dissatisfied with the system. Then, under those conditions, in come some Communist agents and they find fertile ground for disrupting the political stability of the country. Now look what we have.

I suggest to you that the Sugar Act however has operated very well. It is, I think, a good standard for us to follow in our tariff policy and in our foreign policy and in our trade policy except for one thing, and that is the difference between the Sugar Act and the bills that have been introduced first by our good friend and late colleague, Henderson Lanham, from Georgia, and I see one of his colleagues here on the floor, and now known after the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAVIS] as the Davis bill. I am pleased to have been a cosponsor since 1955. In those bills we provide that when the domestic industry is being hurt and they can prove it, and it is proven to the Tariff Commission, then you fix a percentage of the market to allow that level for foreign imports so there it is identical to the Sugar Act. They cannot come in and take it all away from you by an unfair advantage. The one place it differs from the Sugar Act and where the Sugar Act, in my opinion, needs to be seriously looked into, is that it does not create a czar by giving someone power to put controls on the production of the American producers and American working men, and it leaves that up to the law of supply and demand. That is the only basic difference between that pending legislation and the Sugar Act, which I agree with you has worked very well except for the czar that is created and the bureaucracy that has held the price of beet sugar, which was $13.76 a ton in 1946 and only $13.26 in 1956.

Now, with inflation, the farmers cannot live under that, even when they raise the yield from 7 tons to around 13 tons. It just cannot be done. In addition, out in my area right now sugar beets are around $14 a ton. That man down there is a little czar and he looks upon himself that way. I am for "unhorsing" him, as we say out West. I am also for protecting, as the Sugar Act does, the American working man in his right to have a higher standard of living as we have enjoyed in this country, and the American farmer in his right to produce. I have statistics here to show that if we stop the importation of agricultural products, we would have no surplus problem whether it be in barley, oats, rye, livestock, wheat, cotton, or what have you. I am in favor of protecting the American farmer and giving him a fair shake in competition instead of a loaded set of dice that he is put up against. I am in favor of protecting the American working man, the American businessman, and the American manufacturer. I am in favor of protecting the American industrial society. I am satisfied that with some reasonable treatment to protect us from unfair competition, America is just as good as it has ever been and we can compete. In that way we can go forward on a fair basis throughout the world at the same time. By having these people with their new industrial capacity sell at home, we are going to accomplish what we hear so much talk about, namely, raising the level and standard of living of underdeveloped countries. It does not help them to produce a lot of automobiles and send them here to be sold to Americans. It does not help them any to produce these fine wool suits and things like they are grinding out in cotton and other materials in Japan and sell those products over here in this country. Let them put those clothes on the backs and feet of their own children. Then that is going to raise the level of their society and raise their standard of living. That is something so far that has been proved cannot be done by just taking these things away from the American taxpayers under the foreign aid program.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I gladly yield to my colleague.

Mr. KASEM. I notice in all the people the gentleman wants to protect, the American businessman and the American business and so on, the gentleman omitted to mention the American consumer. If these tariff protections were invoked, can the gentleman tell me who else besides the American consumer is going to pick up the tab for it?

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I have not found this fellow called "American Consumer," because we do not have any people out in my part of the country who get a living without working for it. The American consumer is your laboring man, he is your farmer, he is your businessman—and their families. Where else does he come from?

Mr. KASEM. I think it is very nice to walk into a store and purchase something made by the Japanese for $1.50 when you have to pay $2.50 for the same thing made in this country.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I am sorry but I do not know what the gentleman's district is. What is your principal item of production?

Mr. KASEM. We produce in my district babies, mostly. We are suburbia of Los Angeles.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. That produces consumers but somehow you must support them.

Mr. KASEM. We have a suburban district in Los Angeles County, and most of our people are concerned very much about what they have to pay and they have been extremely thankful for competition from foreign producers, for goods which Americans have declined to put on the market.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Does that happen to be the district where they make movies?

Mr. KASEM. No. That is the other end of the county. We have a couple of defense plants.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. They are living off the taxpayers. The taxpayers will not be able to pay taxes unless they have a job or something that is going to make some money to pay taxes with. I was out there and I saw your defense installations. Where do you think that $41 billion a year is coming from if it is not from the rest of the people throughout this land? Those taxes have to come from profits, whether from profits from the sweat of a man's brow to create something in this country or profits that come from the income to a man for investing his capital in this country. Do we get any of those profits from Japan?

Mr. KASEM. We certainly did.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. How many? Do you know? How many taxes are being put into the Treasury that come from Japan to keep your people employed?

Mr. KASEM. Indirectly a great deal, because we handle mountains of things to Japan.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. We sold them the plants, yes. In fact, we gave most of them to them, so that they could put it up to sell for less. But I thank the Lord that we have men in this Government who can see that we have been in a continually deteriorating position and that we are facing a serious result. I believe in a free world, but when the United States goes under economically, the free world goes down with it. Then we lose the things we are trying to maintain in the shape of opportunity, in the shape of personal and individual liberties. I think we can well go to Japan and every other nation throughout the world and say, "We did not mind taking our money to help you to get back on your feet after this shooting-up in World War II, but you must agree that if the United States goes under economically so does the free world. We do not want to pull ourselves down to your standards. We want to lift you up to our standards." So we say to you that whenever we hit the point, as it is now in this country, like wool is in my district, where it dropped 50 percent from 1944 to 1954 because Australia and New Zealand were not in the war, when we get down to the point where the United States is actually going under, I think we can say to those countries, and they will understand, "We are not going to take anything away from you now."

We say to them that we are not just going to limit you in exporting to the United States percentagewise what you have built up to, but we are going to give an increase on a percentage basis that corresponds with your historic share of total consumption of the increased consumption in the United States due to increased population and other causes. But we are just simply not going to let you put American workers out of business or drive American businessmen to the wall by taking it all. I am for high wages and for the high standard of living the gentleman mentioned, but I do not want to raise labor costs to the point of impossibility.

Mr. KASEM. The gentleman has very acutely observed that the United States is the key to the free world and if it falls so does the free world fall. Does the gentleman believe for a moment that if the United States should isolate itself from the free world that our American businessmen and industry would prosper in foreign markets? How then could we maintain this freedom and this high standard of living?

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I do not know whether the gentleman has looked into this as much as I have or not. We have not isolated ourselves through this Reciprocal Trade Act. That is a misnomer, for we have thrown our doors wide open to the admission absolutely free of duty of many, many items. It is the other countries who have isolated themselves through quotas, currency restrictions, and other things which are prohibiting the export of our articles to those countries. I have not suggested isolation in one thing I have said; I do not believe in that, yet I do think that when they have got from 40 to 50 percent of our domestic market the time has come to call a halt.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I yield.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I just wanted to take a moment as a neighbor of the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming, to commend him, for one of the most forceful pro-American speeches I have heard in the 3 years I have been here. It is the type of thinking all of us should give more attention to, and I hope the Congress and the entire Nation will take his remarks to heart.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I did not intend to leave the impression, in the remarks I made earlier with respect to the oil industry, that we did not want anything more than recovery of capital, or that we were not concerned about an industry's ability to make profits.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, I yield further to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The suggestion may have been left that I was opposed to having adequate profits in any business, including the oil business. May I say to the gentleman and my distinguished neighbor from Wyoming that my father was in the oil business for some 20 years. I have been fairly close to the wildcatters and the oil developers, and I know what oil fever is, because it afflicts our family; I know about the desire to find oil and to make the profit which comes from satisfactory discovery. Certainly nothing I said was intended to leave any such inference, and I trust the gentleman understands my desire.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I appreciate that clarification. With his background in the oil industry, I find it hard to understand why the gentleman just cannot flatly say whether he is for the 27½-percent depletion allowance or whether he is against it. I have no interest in the oil industry whatsoever, stocks, bonds, or anything else; I think I have about two shares in one of the pipeline companies someplace, but, nevertheless, no substantial interest or any that has paid dividends in the last 5 years.

What I am concerned about is the development of our area; and our problem in Wyoming and in the Rocky Mountain area has been to attract capital to do some of the wildcatting, exploration, and developing that must be done to find oil, if it is there; and I have been wondering if the present depletion allowance is enough to attract the necessary capital to seek new oil and increase the Nation's production of this vital fuel. I certainly thank the gentleman from Colorado for bringing this subject up, and I would certainly like to see something done in the managing of our economy to increase the prosperity of the free world, but not entirely at the expense of ours and our standard of living.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASEM. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I want to comment before the gentleman from Wyoming leaves the Chamber, that I respect the energy with which he defends the oil industry of Wyoming. It is characteristic of my good friend, the gentleman from Wyoming, and I understand perfectly how gentlemen on both sides of the aisle will, of course, defend the oil-depletion allowance when they come from oil-producing States. The point I wish to make is in the national sense. Both of the Democratic predecessors of President Eisenhower sent message after message to the Congress asking for reforms in the oil-depletion allowance. This is the first national administration in a quarter of a century which apparently is willing to accept the present oil-depletion allowance as it is. I think the RECORD should show that.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASEM. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, this administration has requested such reforms, in fact, it has requested such to Secretary of the Treasury Anderson. I am for anything that will lead to clarification in this respect. I may say that later on I shall make a request for a special order in which I will attempt to show where the oil-depletion allowance and the oil industry in this country have been good for the consumer.

Mr. REUSS. I will say that the requests of this administration all related to the oil-depletion allowance, and it has to go to the subsequent basis of the extracted product.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Speaker, I would not ordinarily take the floor on such matters as this because I find there are other avenues in which to express my opinion in the matter of our relationship with other nations. But I state on the floor of the House of Representatives of the United States at a time when the United States is involved in a gigantic ideological struggle, when it is more important than ever, that we not close off our economic ties with all of the free world, that we open the markets, because this is the only avenue that we have to reach other people. Yet when I find in modern times there are still those as the previous speaker, the gentleman from Wyoming, who seriously advocate a policy of protectionism, which is seriously detrimental to the competitive system within the United States, I must speak up.

To the south of us is the South American Continent and all of the Latin American world. There is the great continent of Africa and southeast Asia, all desperately trying to lift their standard of living and in desperate need of capital, equipment, goods, and machinery, for which there are only three major sources—the Soviet Union, Europe, and the United States. They will get these supplies where they can get them.

It is proposed that we make it impossible for them to sell in the American market or make it increasingly difficult for them to do so. They must sell to survive. They will take whatever markets are available to them and whatever market they sell in must be the market that they buy in.

The United States is uniquely well qualified to supply the underdeveloped or the aspiring nations, or whatever is the fashionable term in referring to them now, with the capital and the equipment that they need, with the agricultural and the technological know-how that they must have. In the absence of our providing it, there is the alternative that should make us shudder, the Soviet Union will be chosen.

We hear a great deal of talk on the Republican side about helping others to help themselves. A great deal of talk we have heard about trade, not aid. Yet consistently they have pursued a policy which is adverse to that. In every instance, I think, almost without exception, when the President has exercised his discretionary powers, instead of diminishing tariff barriers, as the act was designed to do, he has refused to act or, in a few instances, actually increased them.

Japan is an excellent example for us to discuss. It is an island kingdom or an island empire, if you choose; an extremely productive country, considering the limitations of its resources and so on. They make cameras and tools and all sorts of things that are sold in the American market. They can make excellent quality merchandise, as we have come to realize of late. The consumers in my district can go down to Thrifty Drug Stores, Woolworth's 5-and-10-cent store and look on the shelf and there they will see two wrenches of equal quality, one selling for 78 cents marked "Made in Japan" and another selling for $2.50 marked "Made in the United States." Naturally he is going to buy the 78-cent item. There will be very few who will choose the more expensive item for patriotic reasons. Then he has left in his pocket $1.72. A good portion of his money is still in his pocket to buy other things. What happens to the other 78 cents? Perhaps 50 percent, or a substantial percentage, is kept in the United States in the form of employees' wages in the store, importers' profits, or retailer's profits, and some goes to the bank for interest on his loan and so on. The remainder will then go to Japan. It is an American credit, and eventually it must be spent in the United States. It will be spent in the United States for the iron necessary to make the wrench or whatever the commodity is, or the copper and so on. It will be spent in the United States, most assuredly, in due course of commerce, because it cannot be spent, in the absolute sense, anywhere but in the United States. The money or credit is nothing but a claim on the American economy. They can transfer that credit to West Germany or to Turkey or to some other country, but eventually it must rest here and create production and employment here. It is time that we be done with this myth of protectionism, that American jobs are jeopardized by dealing with other countries. On the contrary, we expand opportunities for American industry limitlessly.

We must do it not only for commercial reasons but for ideological reasons, so that we may preserve our influence and help the spread of freedom everywhere. I know that we will in the future hear the phrase "pro-American" used in this connection, as my friend from Nebraska uses it. The patriotic theme has very frequently been used to procure privilege for special sections of our economy when they are not motivated by patriotism or love of country at all, but are motivated by love of the buck. But we who are legislators owe our responsibility to all the people. Every American is a buyer as well as a producer.

A point that I particularly wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that we have no other instrument, no other tool, to reach the rest of the world.

AIRPLANE ACCIDENT BETWEEN RICHMOND AND WILLIAMSBURG

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, all of us have been deeply alarmed and concerned over the recent rash of tragic aircraft accidents. The one that occurred last night touched me very deeply just as I am sure each of us is touched when a tragedy of this kind hits close to home.

The Capital Viscount that crashed between Richmond and Williamsburg last night was scheduled to land at Norfolk in my district. I have not yet been able to learn what the facts are surrounding that accident but have been furnished a list of most of the passengers who were on the flight. From the names which have been announced, I know that some of my good friends were on that ill-fated plane. In all, 50 persons, many of them my neighbors, met an untimely death.

This terrible tragedy touches me deeply and I would like to express a word of sympathy for the grief-stricken survivors of those who lost their lives in last night's catastrophe.

Mr. Speaker, we must determine the causes of these accidents, and take prompt action, legislatively or otherwise, to prevent recurrences and to make air travel safer.

FOREIGN TRADE

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in concluding the discussion we have had for the past hour and a half on the House floor, let me say that the questions raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself were intended to touch off a full-blown discussion of all of the policies in connection with budgetary policy, both income and outgo, as well as monetary, credit, and price policies.

The subsequent remarks opened up some very interesting and new areas for discussion, which now prompt me to extend my invitation for further discussion. Let the administration, and its spokesmen here, not merely answer the questions we have asked with respect to how to secure adequate economic growth without inflation, but let them also give us a full-blown discussion of the question of our foreign trade and the balance of payments question.

The area of ideas opened up by my distinguished colleague from Wyoming is indeed a good area worthy of full-blown House discussion by spokesmen on both sides with respect to all of its ramifications.

But I would still like to see some Member address himself to the other issues we have raised today, so that the House may make its judgment with respect to interest rates and other matters, after having had a full, public discussion of the alternative courses of action that are in fact open to any administration at any time.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER'S PROPOSAL FOR STATE PREEMPTION OF TELEPHONE SERVICE EXCISE TAXES TO HELP MEET OUR EDUCATIONAL NEEDS

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all of us who are concerned over the problem of financing our schools were interested yesterday to read of Governor Rockefeller's proposal. As I understand, he has urged that the 10 percent Federal excise tax on telephone service be allowed to expire in order that

New York and other States that desire to do so could utilize this source of revenue to meet educational needs.

Having recommended the reimposition of this tax, President Eisenhower may well frown on this program, but I must say that any such step in the way of aiding our schools without any possibility of Federal control appeals to me. Indeed, I have long favored the policy of the Federal Government transferring sources of income so that States could better solve their own problems without having to seek help at the Federal level.

Governor Rockefeller's proposal will not solve entirely the problem of financing our schools, but I favor it especially on one account which would be its freedom from Federal control. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that all too few educational and political leaders see the danger of losing community responsibility for education if the Federal Government becomes a partner in meeting our educational needs.

In order to indicate the potential revenue involved by regions and States, I have obtained these figures from the annual report of the U.S. Commissioner of Internal Revenue which shows collections in fiscal year 1958 of this excise tax.

This table of revenue follows:

Internal revenue collections by sources and by internal revenue regions, districts, States, and territories

[In thousands of dollars]

Internal revenue regions and districts; States and territories (States represented by single districts indicated in parentheses; totals for other States shown at bottom of table)	Long-distance telephone, telegraph, cable, radio, etc. (52)	Leased wires, wire and equipment service (53)	Local telephone service (54)
United States, total	256,143	23,233	370,810
Atlanta region	29,630	899	38,270
Atlanta (Ga.)	24,145	758	33,073
Birmingham (Ala.)	373	16	307
Columbia (S.C.)	315	1	324
Greensboro (N.C.)	2,024	20	2,002
Jackson (Miss.)	61	7	42
Jacksonville (Fla.)	2,203	71	1,888
Nashville (Tenn.)	509	25	635
Boston region	14,868	1,160	24,256
Augusta (Maine)	92	5	89
Boston (Mass.)	10,424	403	18,439
Burlington (Vt.)	55	15	49
Hartford (Conn.)	4,263	693	5,648
Portsmouth (N.H.)	33	11	29
Providence (R.I.)	(*)	34	2
Chicago region	28,789	2,016	51,449
Chicago (see (c) below)	14,108	1,245	25,602
Detroit (Mich.)	9,272	549	16,830
Milwaukee (Wis.)	3,855	197	6,990
Springfield (see (c) below)	1,554	25	2,027
Cincinnati region	22,866	1,026	36,348
Cincinnati (see (g) below)	1,565	117	2,741
Cleveland (see (g) below)	8,582	482	14,103
Columbus (see (g) below)	743	10	1,374
Indianapolis (Ind.)	4,946	169	7,766
Louisville (Ky.)	703	30	1,025
Parkersburg (W. Va.)	1,664	121	2,579
Richmond (Va.)	3,620	86	5,413
Toledo (see (g) below)	1,042	12	1,345
Dallas region	3,435	298	3,024
Albuquerque (N. Mex.)	92	12	61
Austin (see (i) below)	363	70	298
Dallas (see (i) below)	2,481	153	2,189
Little Rock (Ark.)	197	5	227
New Orleans (La.)	149	13	102
Oklahoma City (Okla.)	154	44	147
New York City region	49,027	12,550	56,616
Albany (see (f) below)	498	23	523
Brooklyn (see (f) below)	27	90	3
Buffalo (see (f) below)	952	54	1,883
Lower Manhattan (see (f) below)	47,224	12,235	53,858
Syracuse (see (f) below)	300	8	347
Upper Manhattan (see (f) below)	26	138	2
Omaha region	43,024	1,680	60,252
Aberdeen (S. Dak.)	90	5	174
Cheyenne (Wyo.)	20	8	14
Denver (Colo.)	8,216	304	11,215
Des Moines (Iowa)	811	13	1,175
Fargo (N. Dak.)	85	3	122
Kansas City (see (d) below)	201	20	257
Omaha (Neb.)	9,047	243	13,244
St. Louis (see (d) below)	23,182	1,046	32,266
St. Paul (Minn.)	617	27	889
Wichita (Kans.)	756	10	896
Philadelphia region	29,665	1,671	47,262
Baltimore (Maryland and District of Columbia)	4,858	203	9,081
Camden (see (e) below)	8	5	10
Newark (see (e) below)	10,570	512	13,721
Philadelphia (see (h) below)	12,958	631	22,595
Pittsburgh (see (h) below)	961	240	1,493
Scranton (see (h) below)	307	78	361
Wilmington (Del.)	2	(*)
San Francisco region	34,839	1,934	53,33
Boise (Idaho)	54	12	47
Helena (Mont.)	79	18	62
Honolulu (Hawaii)	328	31	1,096
Los Angeles (see (b) below)	5,668	204	5,473
Phoenix (Ariz.)	74	21	29
Portland (Oreg.)	389	31	339
Reno (Nev.)	315	4	222
Salt Lake City (Utah)	62	5	45
San Francisco (see (b) below)	26,437	1,525	44,314
Seattle (see (a) and (j) below)	1,433	85	1,705
International Operations Division
Puerto Rico
Other
Totals for States and territories not shown above:
(a) Alaska	245	38	159
(b) California	32,105	1,728	49,788
(c) Illinois	15,662	1,270	27,629
(d) Missouri	23,383	1,066	32,523
(e) New Jersey	10,578	517	13,732
(f) New York	49,027	12,550	56,616
(g) Ohio	11,933	621	19,564
(h) Pennsylvania	14,227	950	24,449
(i) Texas	2,844	223	2,487
(j) Washington	1,188	47	1,546

GAS AND GERM WARFARE

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include correspondence with the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply pleased last week that when the President of the United States was asked in his press conference what he thought of the use of gas or germ warfare he replied that his own instincts would be against United States use of these agents unless they had first been employed against us.

The President also said that no official proposal had reached him to change the longstanding American policy, which is that only if they are used first by an enemy will the United States employ these agents. But it is clear, as a story in the New York Times of November 10, 1959, said and as a letter to me from the President indicates, that a reevaluation of the policy is taking place. The President's letter to me said that "the Defense Department is reviewing the status of this matter"; that is, the use of chemical and biological weapons.

It seems to me that, despite the President's laudable personal view, it is necessary to have a formal national position on record, to stand beyond Mr. Eisenhower's term and to restrain the efforts of certain elements in the Defense Department to free gas and germ warfare to be used "like any other weapon." Last September, I therefore introduced House Concurrent Resolution 433, now before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, to reaffirm the statement of President Roosevelt in 1943 that "the United States shall under no circumstances resort to the use of biological weapons or the use of poisonous or noxious gases unless they are first used by our enemies."

I hope that the President's expression of his personal views will serve to stimulate the passage of House Concurrent Resolution 433, and I am pleased to say that there has been increasing public concern on this matter. For the information of the Congress, as to the President's view, I should like to insert at this point in the RECORD my correspondence with him and his statement at the press conference:

DECEMBER 21, 1959.

The Honorable DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER,
The President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I write in the wake of your journey for peace to ask you to restrain unpeaceful demands of the Army.

During the last several months, a public relations campaign has been waged in the press by present and retired armed service officers to change our basic policy of not using chemical and biological weapons.

From various newspaper accounts, it now appears that the Army and other groups within the Department of Defense have recommended, both officially and unofficially, that we change our policy concerning the use of chemical and biological weapons.

Many citizens and Members of Congress, including myself, are very disturbed about these recommendations. They negate our position as enunciated by President Roosevelt on June 8, 1943, when he stated that the United States under no circumstances would use poisonous or obnoxious gases unless first used by our enemies. The abhorrence of chemical and biological weapons stems from our basic belief that even in war we must preserve the essence of humanity and humane principles.

It strikes me as utter folly that we should accede to the judgment of certain members of the Defense Department, when it is now more important than ever that the United States continue to express itself as repudiating the use of chemical and biological weapons as a preventive or preemptive means of attack.

It is interesting to note that the Soviet Union has recently been taking the propaganda initiative regarding the use of CBR during wartime. At the end of August of this year, Premier Khrushchev stated in a message to a conference of leading scientists who met in Canada:

"We share the concern of scientists, who justly point out that the use of these weapons may have no less horrible a consequence than the use of atomic or hydrogen weapons. Not by chance were chemical and bacteriological weapons condemned by mankind, and their military use prohibited by international agreement through the Geneva protocol of 1925. As is well known the Soviet Union strongly supports the prohibition of all types of weapons of mass annihilation, including nuclear as well as chemical and biological weapons. We hold that their use runs counter to humane principles, the rules of international law, and the conscience of all peoples."

Conversely, it disturbs me that our Nation, which repudiates naked power politics, should consider sacrificing its unassailable position regarding chemical and biological weapons when the people of the world are hoping for a settlement on the armaments question.

While we may be constrained to develop these weapons qualitatively and quantitatively if international negotiation in the CBR area fails and if the realities of the situation demand that we continue to produce these weapons, we should not change our longstanding policy of not using these weapons first in any eventuality. We must reaffirm our resolve never to initiate the use of these weapons.

Because of this, and because of the urgency of the problem, I earnestly suggest international negotiations in the field of chemical and biological weapons. Although this question is one which will be very difficult to negotiate, this should not deter us from seeking both solution and negotiation in this area of armaments activity.

Because of the urgency of the problem, I have introduced in the Congress a concurrent resolution which will reaffirm our policy of nonuse of biological and chemical weapons unless they are first introduced into warfare against us. I sincerely hope that the American position will not be changed. Knowing of your interest in and admiring your efforts on behalf of world peace, I am sure that our policies will not be changed in this area.

Sincerely,

ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER,
Member of Congress.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., December 31, 1959.

The Honorable ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. KASTENMEIER: I appreciate the concern which prompted your December 21 letter concerning the use of chemical and biological weapons. The Defense Department is reviewing the status of this matter with particular reference to some of the new features mentioned in your letter. You will of course have a further reply as promptly as possible.

Sincerely,

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

PRESIDENTIAL PRESS CONFERENCE,
JANUARY 13, 1960

Ronald W. May, Capital Times, Madison, Wis.: "Mr. President, Representative KASTENMEIER, of Wisconsin, has suggested that there might be a change in our traditional policy of not using chemical, germ, or poison gas warfare first. He said that Army people have tried to—indicated that they believed that maybe we should change our policy and use these first either in a large or even in a small war. Is this true?"

Answer: "I will say this: No such official suggestion has been made to me and so far as my own instinct is concerned is to not start such a thing as that first."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. SHEPPARD (at the request of Mr. MCCORMACK), for today and the balance of the week, on account of official business.

Mr. JACKSON, for 14 days, on account of official business of House Committee on Un-American Activities.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. VANIK, for 30 minutes, on Wednesday, January 27, 1960, and to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. BAILEY, for 1 hour and 30 minutes, on Tuesday next.

Mr. CELLER (at the request of Mr. ROOSEVELT), for 1 hour, on Wednesday, January 27.

Mr. ROOSEVELT, for 1 hour, on Wednesday, January 27.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona (at the request of Mr. CUNNINGHAM), for 60 minutes, on Thursday, January 21.

Mr. FLOOD (at the request of Mr. BASS of Tennessee), for 60 minutes, on Thursday next instead of on Friday next.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. BERRY.

Mr. LANE and to include extraneous matter.

(At the request of Mr. CUNNINGHAM, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)

Mrs. DWYER.

Mr. OLIVER and to include a speech made by himself yesterday.

Mr. HOLIFIELD (at the request of Mr. BASS of Tennessee) and to include an address made by him today.

(At the request of Mr. BASS of Tennessee, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 40 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 20, 1960, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1698. A letter from the adjutant general, United Spanish War Veterans, transmitting the proceedings of the convention of the 61st National Encampment, United Spanish War Veterans, held in Miami, Fla., September 20–24, 1959, pursuant to Public Law 249, 77th Congress (H. Doc. No. 313); to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

1699. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Personnel and Reserve Forces), transmitting a report showing officers in the Navy receiving flight pay for the 6-month period preceding January 1, 1960, pursuant to Public Law 301, 79th Congress; to the Committee on Armed Services.

1700. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to procure the services of experts and consultants"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1701. A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, transmitting the Annual Report of the Civil Aeronautics Board for fiscal year 1959; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1702. A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, transmitting a report covering supergrade positions authorized by Public Laws 85–469 and 85–726, pursuant to Public Law 84–854; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

1703. A letter from the Chairman, U.S. Civil Service Commission, transmitting a report relating to the number of positions in grades GS–16, 17, and 18 existing in calendar year 1959 in the Civil Service Commission, pursuant to Public Law 854, 84th Congress; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

1704. A letter from the Administrator, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Science and Astronautics.

1705. A letter from the Deputy Secretary of Defense, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to provide for the reassignment of officers designated for aeronautical engineering duty, other than aerologists, to the unrestricted line of the Navy"; to the Committee on Armed Services.

1706. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (H. Doc. No. 314); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. HALEY: Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. House Concurrent Resolution 7. Concurrent resolution declaring the sense of Congress on the closing of Indian hospitals; with amendment (Rept. No. 1205). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FORRESTER: Committee on the Judiciary. H.R. 5789. A bill to incorporate the Agricultural Hall of Fame; with amendment (Rept. No. 1206). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina: Committee on Armed Services. H.R. 9465. A bill to authorize the extension of a loan of a naval vessel to the Government of the Republic of China; without amendment (Rept. No. 1207). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina: Committee on Armed Services. H.R. 9464. A bill to remove the requirement that, of the Chief and Deputy Chief of the Bureau of Ships, one must be specially qualified and experienced in naval engineering and the other must be specially qualified and experienced in naval architecture; without amendment (Rept. No. 1208). Referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ABBITT:

H.R. 9721. A bill to authorize adjustment, in the public interest, of rentals under leases entered into for the provision of commercial recreational facilities at the John H. Kerr Reservoir, Va.-N.C.; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. ASPINALL:

H.R. 9722. A bill to create a Federal planning commission to conduct a study of the possible establishment in the District of Columbia of a national fisheries center; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. ASPINALL (by request):

H.R. 9723. A bill to impose certain requirements upon persons engaging in certain activities with respect to the public lands, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. BARING:

H.R. 9724. A bill to require an act of Congress for public land withdrawals in excess of 5,000 acres in the aggregate for any project or facility of any department or agency of the Government; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. BOGGS:

H.R. 9725. A bill to amend section 104 of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 to eliminate the ceilings in the use of foreign currencies for informational and educational activities carried on with funds provided under authority of that act; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BROYHILL:

H.R. 9726. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for voluntary apprenticeship in the District of Columbia"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

H.R. 9727. A bill to create a Federal planning commission to conduct a study of the possible establishment in the District of Columbia of a national fisheries center; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. DENT:

H.R. 9728. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to increase benefits, to reduce in certain cases the age which an individual must attain to qualify for spouse's benefits, to reduce retirement age (with full benefits for both men and women) to 60, to reduce the outside earnings permitted without deductions from benefits, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. EVINS:

H.R. 9729. A bill to provide for the conveyance of certain real property of the United States to the city of Tullahoma, Tenn.; to the Committee on Government Operations.

By Mrs. GRIFFITHS:

H.R. 9730. A bill to establish a Federal Recreation Service in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan:

H.R. 9731. A bill to amend chapter 53 of title 10, United States Code, to provide for the prompt notification to members of the Armed Forces of any indebtedness they may have to the United States arising out of overpayments of pay and allowances; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. JOHNSON of California:

H.R. 9732. A bill to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to convey certain property in the State of California to the county of Trinity; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. KING of Utah:

H.R. 9733. A bill to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act so as to permit the inclusion of military pay in the computation of average salary for annuity purposes; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. KOWALSKI:

H.R. 9734. A bill to amend title III of the Career Compensation Act of 1949 to prohibit the improper utilization of the services of enlisted men in the Armed Forces, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. LANE:

H.R. 9735. A bill to amend section 610 of title 38, United States Code, to authorize the furnishing of hospital care at Veterans' Administration facilities for Gold Star Mothers; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. McINTIRE:

H.R. 9736. A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to impose a duty upon the importation of bread; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. McMILLAN:

H.R. 9737. A bill to amend the act of March 3, 1901, to eliminate the requirement that certain District of Columbia corporations be managed by trustees the majority of whom are citizens of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MATTHEWS:

H.R. 9738. A bill to stabilize support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and to provide for adjustment in such levels in relation to farm cost; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. METCALF:

H.R. 9739. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that income derived by an Indian from tribal lands or allotted and restricted Indian lands shall not be subject to the income tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

H.R. 9740. A bill to require an act of Congress for public land withdrawals in excess of 5,000 acres in the aggregate for any project or facility of any department or agency of the Government; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. MOULDER:

H.R. 9741. A bill to clarify the law with respect to transportation of airmail, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

H.R. 9742. A bill to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, so as to strengthen and improve the national transportation system, insure the protection of the public interest, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

H.R. 9743. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide a more realistic definition of the term "disability" for purposes of entitlement to disability insurance benefits and the disability freeze; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts (by request):

H.R. 9744. A bill to prohibit the severance of a service-connected disability which has been in effect for 10 or more years, except when based on fraud; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. SILER:

H.R. 9745. A bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 to increase acreage allotments for burley tobacco and to distribute the major part of the increase in areas of substantial unemployment; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. WAMPLER:

H.R. 9746. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to provide for the payment of pensions to veterans of World War I; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. WIER:

H.R. 9747. A bill to require an act of Congress for public land withdrawals in excess of 5,000 acres in the aggregate for any project or facility of any department or agency of the Government; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. ZELENKO:

H.R. 9748. A bill to amend the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, as amended, to provide increased benefits in case of disabling injuries and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. DIXON:

H.R. 9749. A bill to provide for the striking of medals in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the founding of the Pony Express; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

H.R. 9750. A bill to supplement the act of June 14, 1926, as amended, to permit any State to acquire certain public lands for recreational use; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. BERRY:

H.J. Res. 555. Joint resolution to establish the third Thursday in August of every year as Indian Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DIXON:

H.J. Res. 556. Joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to designate the year 1960 as "Pony Express Year"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KING of Utah:

H.J. Res. 557. Joint resolution to authorize the conveyance of lands to States for recreational purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. McDOWELL:

H.J. Res. 558. Joint resolution granting the consent of the United States to the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice to determine whether or not disputes before that Court involve matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MARTIN:

H.J. Res. 559. Joint resolution designating the 17th day of December in each year as "Wright Brothers Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILSON:

H.J. Res. 560. Joint resolution authorizing the establishment of National Zoo Week; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BOYKIN:

H.J. Res. 561. Joint resolution to help make available to those children in our country who are handicapped by deafness the specially trained teachers of the deaf needed to develop their abilities and to help make available to individuals suffering speech and hearing impairments those specially trained speech pathologists and audiologists needed to help them overcome their handicaps; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. EDMONDSON:

H.J. Res. 562. Joint resolution to help make available to those children in our country who are handicapped by deafness the specially trained teachers of the deaf needed to develop their abilities and to help make available to individuals suffering speech and hearing impairments those specially trained speech pathologists and audiologists needed to help them overcome their handicaps; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. MORRIS of Oklahoma:

H.J. Res. 563. Joint resolution to help make available to those children in our country who are handicapped by deafness the specially trained teachers of the deaf needed to develop their abilities and to help make available to individuals suffering speech and hearing impairments those specially trained speech pathologists and audiologists needed to help them overcome their handicaps; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. ADDONIZIO:

H. Con. Res. 460. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecration of houses of worship; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WILSON:

H. Con. Res. 461. Concurrent resolution expressing the intent of Congress that naval and Marine Corps officers captured by the enemy during World War II who were authorized for promotion during captivity and subsequently promoted after release be entitled under the authority of section 2 of the act of March 7, 1942 (56 Stat. 143, ch. 166), to pay, allowances, and precedence from the date of rank stipulated in the later appointing orders; to the Committee on Armed Services.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BROYHILL:

H.R. 9751. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Icile Helen Hinman; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

H.R. 9752. A bill for the relief of K. J. McIver; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KILBURN:

H.R. 9753. A bill for the relief of Peter Larr; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MULTER:

H.R. 9754. A bill for the relief of Teresa Piantedosi; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LIBONATI:

H.R. 9755. A bill providing for the award of the Congressional Medal of Honor to Dr. Thomas Dooley; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. O'NEILL:

H.R. 9756. A bill for the relief of Chu Shu Wong; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. POWELL:

H.R. 9757. A bill providing for the award of the Congressional Medal of Honor to Dr. Thomas Dooley; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. SAYLOR:

H.R. 9758. A bill for the relief of Terata Kiyoshi Johnston (also known as Kiyoshi Terata); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILSON:

H.R. 9759. A bill for the relief of Demitrios P. Georgantas and Maria Aslanidis Georgantas; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WINSTEAD:

H.R. 9760. A bill for the relief of Sam Doolittle; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina:

H. Con. Res. 462. Concurrent resolution expressing gratitude and appreciation to General of the Army Douglas MacArthur for his unsurpassed service to this Nation and the world; to the Committee on Armed Services.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

313. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the mayor of Scranton, Pa., relative to requesting early adoption of the Federal area redevelopment program legislation pending before the Congress; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

314. Also petition of Robert Zelis, president of Student Senate, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Mass., relative to the National Defense Education Act, and expressing approval of the bill pending before the Congress of the United States which would repeal a certain requirement of a disclaimer affidavit being required of aid applicants; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Challenge of Citizenship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. EVERETT JORDAN
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 19, 1960

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, the National Conference on Citizenship held an inspirational 14th annual meeting at the Shoreham Hotel September 16–19, 1959. Those who initiated the conference in 1946 sought to preserve the spirit of unity that had reached such a high point during World War II. They believe that the ideals upon which this Nation was founded and built should be stressed in peacetime as in wartime. The U.S. Department of Justice and the National Education Association cosponsored the annual meetings until 1953, when the late Willis Smith, U.S. Senator from my home State, introduced a bill in the 83d Congress to charter the National Conference on Citizenship. Although Senator Smith died of a heart attack before the bill passed the House, both Houses of Congress passed the bill unanimously.

The 14th annual meeting of the conference again mobilized a mighty force for the cause of good citizenship. Delegates from several hundred organizations represented all levels of government; religious faiths, professional, veterans, farm, civic, and youth organizations; labor, business, industry, and finance, and other groups.

The theme for this year's conference was "U.S. Citizenship—Know It—Cherish It—Live It." The Honorable JENNINGS RANDOLPH, our distinguished colleague from West Virginia, delivered an address on the "Challenge of Citizenship" at the closing session of the conference. I ask that this challenging speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CHALLENGE OF CITIZENSHIP

(By Senator JENNINGS RANDOLPH, Democrat, West Virginia, before the 14th National Conference on Citizenship, Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D.C., September 19, 1959)

Judge Walter Bastian, delegates to the National Conference on Citizenship, and ladies and gentlemen, the deliberations and proceedings of your sessions these past few days have revealed again the capacity of American culture to generate honest inquiry and self-criticism.

As long as such meetings as this can prevail in our land, and continue to draw participants from varied areas and activities in life, there is hope that American citizenship will take on a continually broadening and deepening significance.

I am sure that some of you must have been impressed, as I have been, with the accidental, but peculiarly appropriate, conjunction of this conference with the presence in Washington of our notable foreign visitor. On the one hand, your gathering is the embodiment of the democratic process—a voluntary association of men and women and boys and girls assembling for a free exchange of ideas on the rights and responsibilities of citizenship. On the other, Premier Khrushchev—for all his air of comradeship—is the living expression of the autocratic state which defines for its subjects, rather than citizens, their rights and responsibilities—without reference to individual desire.

Within our system of allowing the individual the freedom to determine and express his own sense of loyalties, we must sometimes suffer the ignorance, the apathy and the irresponsibility of a significant number of our people. In one's more pessimistic moments, he is tempted to feel that these people are a majority. But this feeling passes, and from a more balanced and dispassionate view, I believe it is fair to say that the sense of citizenship responsibility continues to enjoy a healthy development in the United States. If this growth is not registered in the voting statistics—as it seems not to be—then that is a problem which deserves our attention.

But citizenship does not mean only the use of the ballot. It is not a role which is to be asserted merely every 2 or 4 years. The duties of the citizen imply the responsibility to engage in the vital dialog of democracy in the continuous day-to-day activities of our community. For one person it may mean participation in the Parent-Teachers Association and contributing special efforts to the development of our schools. For another it may mean engagement in the affairs of the League of Women Voters, analyzing and promoting understanding of public issues. For still others, citizen obligations may call for added contributions of time and energy to the building of a community park, to slum clearance, or to urban renewal programs.

In each instance, however, there is involved an active expression of one's loyalties to the welfare of the community. The genius of democracy is that it allows the individual to choose his own avenue of such expression. The challenge of democracy—and the challenge of citizenship—is to provide the framework and the inspiration to impel each of us to explore his own avenue of creativity to its fullest. For, as William James truly remarked, "When we touch our own upper limit, and live in our own highest center of energy, we may call ourselves saved."

Democracy still remains the most difficult and demanding form of government that man has created. And in the history of man's affairs, the failures of democracy outnumber by far its successes. It is not a form of society decreed for man by a beneficent cosmos—but a way of life which men have won at great cost, and will maintain only with continued courage and imagination. And it is a way of life which men who are less than men have always sought to avoid—as the psychiatrist, Erich Fromm, noted some years ago in his book, "Escape From Freedom."

But the naturalization proceedings before the Washington Monument on Thursday of this week indicated that American democracy still remains the pole star of aspirations for men and women who will accept the hazards of freedom. Those people who stood upon the green under the late summer sun will add their transfusion to the continuing lifestream of American culture—a stream which has been borne along by the dissatisfaction of men and women with the old ways of penury and oppression.

Justice Learned Hand once referred to a comment by the historian, James Harvey Robinson, to the effect that mankind arose from the ape because, like the ape, he was always monkeying around. But man, unlike the ape, was able to remember the results of his meddling curiosity, to record them, and to pass them on to subsequent generations.

America is the rightful heir to this legacy of mankind. For this, I believe, is the nugget of liberty—the right to be meddlesome—to be dissatisfied with established forms and customs and to search, according to one's own predisposition, for ways of creating a better world. This is essentially the story of every naturalization ceremony—as it was the story of earlier settlers of this land.

For all Americans are either nonconformists or the descendants of nonconformists—the meddlesome, maverick, and malcontented people who in some way—religious, political, or economic—opposed the established forms of their society and believed in the ability of men to improve on these forms. They believed in the ability of men to create a new image of man, and they believed in the power of man to fashion society in the light of that image. This is the permanent revolution of America, and this is the revolution feared by autocracy everywhere. By referring to this as a permanent revolution I intend to imply that it is not and will never be finally won.

The rights and responsibilities of democracy are by their very nature, impermanent possessions. Each generation must nurture their growth during its own time, as this conference has been doing by searching out the methods for our time.

In the addresses which have been delivered here, and in the workshops, you have considered the varied activities and forms of citizenship. I would like now to consider the common denominator underlying these activities and ask your reflection on the challenge it poses to us today. I offer no original formula—only the observations of experience.

When we speak of the obligations of citizenship in daily life, I believe we mean something like this: the duty to engage in informed, intelligent, and active participation in the decisions of community life based upon one's capacity voluntarily to submerge his own private interests in the welfare of the community. All of these qualities are requisite, but particularly the latter—for if the capacity for voluntary submission of the individual will does not exist then there is no community—there is no society—but only an aggregate of individuals already deteriorating toward anarchy. For every social act presumes a sense of the community—an awareness of the ties that bind us to our fellow man. Herein lie both the greatest threat to and the greatest hope of the meaning of citizenship in our time.

The established and traditional meanings of the citizen are threatened—and indeed, have been radically altered—by the centralization of power in our society and by the atomization of the individual. To elaborate a bit further on this point—I believe we can agree that the role of the American citizen was first most clearly expressed in the writings of Thomas Jefferson. Here was developed the view of the American citizen as the independent freeholder, jealous of his own integrity and independence, informed on matters of public concern, and capable of exercising reasoned judgment in the light of this information. The underlying assumption of this view was that man acts of his own free will, is guided by the light of innate reason, and that all men are potentially capable of exercising reason.

During the 18th century and for the first half of the 19th century, this typical American citizen found himself in a society which was predominantly rural and agrarian. And with the continual advancement of the frontier there existed in general a harmony between the public interest and the interests of the individual citizen. We need not cavil at the literal truth of this picture in every instance. This, I believe, is in general a fair sketch of the surrounding conditions and the basic assumptions of the historic image of the American citizen. This is still the image that governs much of the political thought and rhetoric of today. But what of the change from the conditions that gave birth to this image?

And I speak not only of the fact of change, but the scope and depth—the quality—of change itself. No longer are a man's years measured in terms of gradual accretions and modifications of what he learned as a child and youth, but complete reversals and reconstructions of his view of the universe. Indeed, the world alters as we walk in it.

One of the most profound alterations, in terms of our concern here, has attended the process of centralization of power. The economic power of the modern corporation, the political power of the state, the power to control the flow of information through the mass media of communication—all have been subject to the force of centralization. I am not here concerned with passing judgment on this process as to whether it bodes ill or well for our Republic. I refer to it only as one of the facts of our existence, and a fact which is not acknowledged in the Jeffersonian concept of the individual and society.

Nor is this the only modern contradiction of our traditional assumptions. As part and parcel of the trend toward centralization, we have witnessed also what I have termed the atomization of the individual. I refer now to the segmentation of life and the alienation and isolation of the individual from the forces which shape his own existence. Here we look upon the source of the terrible loneliness and barrenness which fill the lives of so many who have become lost in the complexity and gigantism of the modern industrial society.

These are the people whose lives stand in contradiction to the traditional symbols and attitudes with which we have surrounded our concept of the citizen—a concept born of another time, even another world. This was a world of yeoman citizenry, of economically independent individuals and decentralized power. Now, I am not mourning the loss of that world; it is futile to assail the forces and facts of change. But it is foolhardy to ignore them.

And ignore them we have—at least with reference to our public attitudes and the ideas we use to fashion our understanding of public problems. Allow me to illustrate what I mean by this statement with reference to the field of economics. Our official views—what Professor Galbraith has called the conventional wisdom—were formed on the basis of an economy of individual entrepreneurship, an economy in which the offices of ownership and management of the means of production were joined, and an economy in which it was never quite possible to produce the necessities of life for all. These were the conditions on which our still existing traditional attitudes were based.

Yet, what are the facts of contemporary economic life? The modern giant corporations are not private enterprise in the hallowed terms of Adam Smith and Ricardo; they are public institutions in the most meaningful sense of the word, inasmuch as the decisions they make, the actions they take, affect the public welfare and the life of each of us. And they are institutions in which the functions of ownership and control are not always complete, the average corporate shareholder, owning often a part in a concern in which he is inactive in directing its action. These are basic alterations in the dominant economic institution of our society, alterations which are seldom reflected in the official rhetoric of today.

But more important than these changes—as it bears upon the citizen's responsibility in the decision-making process—is the fact that we have an economy of abundance, while our public policies are based too often upon the theory of an economy of scarcity. For the first time in man's history, we have achieved a form of social and economic organization in which we can produce enough for all. And yet we are embarrassed by our riches. We talk of a farm problem—because one working farmer cannot raise enough food for 24 people. Our tax policies, our national budget, our philosophy of private consumption against public service—all are based not on the facts of today, but on the fictions of yesterday.

Now, let me be quite explicit in stating that I offer these observations in no partisan sense. I am presently concerned only with pointing out the need for reexamining our traditional attitudes in the light of present political and economic realities. For this is the first duty of the citizen—to be informed and to think clearly. And in spite of all our modern communications devices, perhaps even to some extent because of them, the problem of achieving adequate information, and the difficulties of screening misinformation and mechanized information have probably never been as acute since we achieved universal national literacy.

The way we deal with this problem will, in all seriousness, determine the future destiny of the United States and the meaning of citizenship. It has become almost axiomatic in any public discussion to refer our national destiny to the conflict between the Soviet Union and the United States. But in this sense the reference is valid, and in this sense the burden of the future rests with each of us.

The conflict of our era is not only between capitalism and communism. The basic antagonism that creates the gulf between our two worlds is between our divergent concepts of the nature of man and the nature of history. It is in essence the conflict between our view that man is free to create history, and the dialectical view that history creates man.

Whether man will be bound to the iron chains of circumstance and the inexorable laws of a malignant fate—or whether we will have the freedom to choose a world of our own and create that world in the image we choose—that is the option offered humanity today.

We in the United States have already cast our own ballot—in the name of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. But let us be quite clear that Mr. Jefferson and our Founding Fathers did not mean by "happiness" the pursuit of hedonistic pleasures in the semi-narcotized state too prevalent today. They meant—and it is our duty thus to reaffirm—the opportunity for fulfillment of the distinctively civilized and human virtues—love, esthetic enjoyment, a decent regard for one's fellow man, and respect for the truth.

These are the values at hazard in the contest before us. Their loss under the dominance of the Communist autocracy will mean the fixation of human morality at a level less than human. These are the stakes for which we are playing—stakes which are surely high enough to call from each of us the utmost in intelligence, self-sacrifice and determination that he has to give.

In closing, I refer once again to some words of Justice Hand, spoken at a time when the United States was just moving out of a time of peril. However, they are equally appropriate to our own time as we face a new peril.

"If our Nation could not itself exist half slave and half free, are we sure that it can exist in a world half slave and half free? Is the same conflict less irrepressible when worldwide than it was 80 years ago when it was only nationwide? Right knows no boundaries and justice no frontier; the brotherhood of man is not a domestic institution.

"We may not stop until we have done our part to fashion a world in which there shall be some share of fellowship, which shall be better than a den of thieves. Let us not disguise the difficulties; and, above all, let us not content ourselves with noble aspirations, counsels of perfection, and self-righteous advice to others. * * * We shall need the wisdom of the serpent; we shall have to be content with short steps; we shall be obliged to give and take; we shall face the strongest passions of mankind—our own, not the least; and in the end we shall have fabricated an imperfect instrument. But the history of man has just begun; in the eons which lie before him lie limitless hope or limitless despair. The choice is his; the present choice is ours. It is worth the trial."

The frontiers of freedom are always forward. The challenge to a finer citizenship lies ahead.

American Indian Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. Y. BERRY
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 19, 1960

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a joint resolution proposing to set aside 1 day each year to be known as American Indian Day.

The resolution proposes that the third Thursday in August each year be designated as a day to be set aside by the President to observe with appropriate ceremonies and activities the first American—the original American—the American Indian.

I have done this at the suggestion of the Governors' Interstate Indian Council which has done such an excellent job of helping to bring about recognition of the Indian problem. It was their suggestion that this be done as a means of making it possible to give special recognition and honor to the original citizens of this country. We have had several days for the recognition of other groups, we have had special weeks for the recognition of various industries, but never, Mr. Speaker, have we officially designated a time for the recognition of the American Indian.

I am confident the effect that this would have is significant and important for America's first citizens. One important thing that I see in this is making the people of America aware of the contributions that Indians collectively have made in this country and possibly to influence the Congress to take a more serious, dedicated, and active interest in Indian affairs.

It was the thought of the Governor's Interstate Indian Council that if a day were set aside by Congress as American Indian Day it would help to create many of the finer aspects of Indian culture and heritage and bring the knowledge to Americans everywhere that Indians still exist, forming a definite and constructive part of American society instead of in a fictional and romantic state. It would help to make the American people generally aware of the fact that the Indian people are no different than non-Indians, that they want jobs, employment, income, and to provide for their families, not only the necessities, but the luxuries of life, and the opportunities for education that are available in non-Indian communities.

It could be pointed out that the Indian people were segregated into communities first for the protection of the non-Indian and then later, in an agricultural adventure in rehabilitation. It should be pointed out that simply because the Indian people resided on the land that they are not necessarily farmers and ranchers but have a high degree of manual skill and that if given an opportunity could and would raise the level of their own economic status.

It could be pointed out on these special days that industry has been reluctant to locate on these reservation areas without some special inducement such as a tax inducement, or something of that nature, but with such an inducement industry could and would locate on these Indian reservations, opening up a whole new vista of opportunity for the Indian people and give them an opportunity to lift themselves up by their own bootstraps.

These are some of the things that should be brought to the attention of the American people, should be brought to the attention of the Congress and could be brought out on the occasion of this special date to be established as American Indian Day.

The date of Thursday on the 3d week in August has been chosen because this is an era of time during the summer when the Indians of most areas are holding special events. The Indians of Oklahoma celebrate their Anadarko Exposition during this week. The Indians of the Northern Plains are holding their fall expositions and councils at about this time. Consequently, I have named the Thursday of the third week in August as a suggested date for recognizing the first American on American Indian Day.

Recent Developments Affecting the U.S. Atomic Power Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHET HOLIFIELD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 19, 1960

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address:

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS AFFECTING THE U.S. ATOMIC POWER PROGRAM

(Remarks by Congressman CHET HOLIFIELD, Democrat, of California, at workshop meeting of the Electric Consumer Information Committee, Washington, D.C., January 19, 1960)

It is always a pleasure to talk with a group interested in atomic energy, particularly from the consumers' point of view.

As we enter each new decade it is always wise—or it at least is always done—to take stock on the last year and have a look at the next 10 years.

GOALS AND PREDICTIONS

I regret to say, that from the consumers' viewpoint, we have not achieved economic atomic power in the United States by 1960. You will recall the rosy predictions by AEC and others on this subject some years ago. But economic atomic power still remains a will-o'-the-wisp—off somewhere yonder.

You will also recall the prediction of how many plants and kilowatts the United States would have in operation by 1960 or the end of this year. In 1955 the then AEC Director of Reactor Development foresaw about 2 million kilowatts of nuclear power capacity in service by the end of 1960. It now appears that less than 40,000 kilowatts will be in operation by the end of this year.

Predictions were also made as to the U.S. foreign atomic power program, which in large part was to be carried out in cooperation with Euratom. Former AEC Chairman Strauss adopted the goal established by the so-called "three wise men" of 15 million kilowatts of atomic power in Euratom countries by 1967, and 3 million kilowatts by the end of 1969.

The objective of the AEC-Euratom Cooperative program was scaled down to be 1 million kilowatts by the end of 1963. The Joint Committee extended it to 1965 for two plants. However, when proposals were received last fall, only one project was submitted. This was the Italian Senn project which was planned prior to Euratom and could be carried on independently of it.

So we see the chickens let out in the Atomic Energy Amendment of 1954 are beginning to come home to roost, or to change the metaphor, somebody laid an egg.

CURRENT STATUS OF PROJECTS

Now what are the reasons for our difficulties? In addition to the problems of the Madison Avenue approach, it should be understood that many people underestimated the difficulty of the technical problems which had to be solved. These in turn raised costs, delayed schedules, and presented financial problems.

Perhaps a brief rundown of the current status of various projects would help make this point clear. I hesitate to go into any detail, since the newsletters of your various organizations do this very well. I especially find Jim Grahl's APPA newsletter interesting and informative.

As of this date not one watt of civilian power is being generated in the United States by atomic reactors, except possibly the small Oak Ridge HRE experiment. The Shippingport reactor, our first and largest central station plant, has been shut down since October for planned replacement of fuel elements and will not be in operation until the spring of this year. The Atomic Energy Commission's experimental boiling water reactor at Argonne is under modification and will not be in operation until late this year. The Atomic Energy Commission sodium reactor experiment at Santa Susana has been shut down since October of last year to rectify a fuel element failure and will not be in operation until sometime this spring.

These shutdowns do not mean lack of progress. They illustrate the developmental problems we encounter.

Reactor plants under construction are also having their troubles—schedule and cost-wise. The first and largest privately financed commercial plant, the Dresden station, has recently run into trouble due to technical problems—fuel element cladding and control rod failures. The next largest commercially financed plant is the Consolidated Edison, Indian Point plant, which has already experienced an increase in the estimated cost from $55 million to $100 million—nearly 100 percent, and this may be only the beginning. Detroit Edison's cost estimate has gone up and it still hasn't been proved safe.

The public and cooperative atomic energy plants also have their troubles, as you know.

The first cooperative public atomic power proposal was submitted to the Commission in 1955 in response to the Atomic Energy Commission's first request for proposals. This plant is still not complete. The completion date has slipped from the original estimate of 1959 to 1962 and the original cost estimate has gone up from approximately $25 million to $50 million.

Of the seven public and cooperative atomic power proposals submitted to the Commission in 1955 and 1956 in response to the Commission's second invitation for cooperative atomic powerplants, only two are presently being pursued. These are the Piqua and the Elk River projects, neither of which is complete. The estimated cost of both projects has approximately doubled and the original estimated completion dates have been extended considerably.

The only bright spot in our power reactor program is our naval reactor program where reactors at this moment are performing a job which cannot be equaled by any other energy source.

DEVELOPMENT OF REVISED ATOMIC POWER PROGRAMS

The difficulties in which the atomic power industry found itself in 1956–58 led, of course, to demands for revised or accelerated programs.

Whether we are building enough atomic power projects can be debated, but no one can charge that not enough studies have been made of the atomic power program. There was the McKinney report to the Joint Committee in January 1956; the atomic energy acceleration report made by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy in July 1956; the American Assembly and National Planning Association reports in 1957; the Joint Committee and AEC seminars with leading reactor and industry experts in 1957; the Edison Electric Institute reports in 1958; the Joint Committee staff report on a proposed expanded civilian nuclear power program in August 1958; the AEC ad hoc committee report in 1959; and now AEC is preparing its report on a proposed 10-year program; and Mr. Robert McKinney is reviewing the foreign situation for the Joint Committee.

All of these reports have agreed that it is important to develop economic atomic power, to meet sharply rising domestic needs for power in future decades and to establish and maintain clear international leadership in an important technology.

Several of the reports also agreed upon a goal of economic atomic power in the United States in 10 years. The Edison Electric Institute report in 1958 suggested that economic nuclear power might be attained by 1968; the AEC ad hoc committee report in 1959 chose 1969 as the target year.

This tendency to hope perennially that we will reach our goal in 10 years is not new. Back in 1955, the then-Director of AEC reactor development foresaw a 10-year induction phase and then a rapid expansion of commercial nuclear power capacity. Five years later, we may be still foreseeing success 10 years hence. Unless we take more vigorous action to make our predictions come true, I fear that we may be forever predicting that economic atomic power will be here in 10 years.

I would make the personal suggestion that we stick with the goal we established. In 1958, the Edison Electric Institute—surely a conservative institution—suggested that economically competitive nuclear power might be possible by 1968. That this is still feasible is indicated by the testimony of Dr. Walter Zinn to the Joint Economic Committee in October 1959. He said that the next generation of large-size plants will be competitive in some areas of the United States. Such plants could be built and in operation by 1965 or 1966, according to Zinn. But under present AEC policies this is not likely to be done before 1970.

Instead of making more studies, why do we not consider doing what Dr. Zinn says is possible, particularly since a recent preview of AEC's forthcoming report on its 10-year program confirms this view. In a speech in November, the Director of Reactor Development for AEC—Frank Pittman—said that the studies recently made for AEC show that with some further research and development a 300,000-kilowatt pressurized water plant could be built to produce power at costs competitive in some areas of the United States, and that this project could be started "in the near future."

The Pittman report on the AEC studies also concluded that, assuming success in further research and development, it would be possible to start construction by 1965 on 300,000 kilowatt boiling water and organic plants which should produce power at costs competitive in relatively high fuel cost areas of the United States. Presumably these could be in operation by the end of 1968.

POLICY ISSUES IN ATOMIC POWER PROGRAM

Consideration of the AEC 10-year program (as forecast by the Pittman report) raises again policy issues which have been with us for a number of years.

NARROWING DOWN ON REACTOR CONCEPTS

One is the Commission's alleged recent policy of emphasizing three basic reactor concepts—the pressurized water, boiling and organic cooled and moderated—and possibly cutting back the effort on other types.

I question whether we know enough yet to put most of our eggs in only two or three baskets. I suspect that AEC's deemphasis on the other concepts—some of which may in the long run prove superior—may be dictated more by budget considerations than by informed technical judgments. We have only one large power reactor in operation and are only in the early phases of this new technology.

If we confine our major bets now to only two or three basic concepts we may save money in the short run. But if we should find in the future that we had guessed wrong, the cutbacks being made by the Commission will prove to be extremely costly. I do not endorse, consequently, the present Commission tendency to abandon our previous program of developing six to eight different types of nuclear plants.

SIZE OF PROTOTYPES

Nontechnical factors also seem to have influenced Commission views of the sizes of the developmental plants which should be built. I have believed that construction of a certain number of large demonstration prototypes will be required in order to develop any given reactor type to the point that it is commercially attractive. This view was confirmed unanimously in 1957 by a group of outstanding reactor development experts convened by the Joint Committee.

To my knowledge, nothing has developed since 1957 which would alter their conclusions. I consequently believe that AEC's ad hoc committee was mistaken in recommending a year ago that, in general, only plants of small and moderate size should be constructed. I believe that AEC was mistaken in accepting that recommendation. There is some suspicion that the so-called "prototype" plants may have been especially appealing to AEC for reasons having nothing to do with the technical requirements of the program. The smaller plants would cost less money, obviously, than large plants and this would please the budgeteers. Since their energy output could be more readily absorbed by AEC installations or else wasted, the disposition of any Government atomic power, which so frightens the AEC, could be avoided.

More recently, the Commission seems to be shifting back to the view that full-scale demonstration plants will have to be built. I understand that AEC is now shopping around for a utility or utility combine to undertake the 200- to 300-megawatt pressurized water project which I mentioned earlier.

LEVEL OF EXPENDITURES FOR ATOMIC POWER PROGRAM

The dominant policy issue in the past several years has been one of budgets and expenditures. We who have long urged a vigorous and effective atomic power development program find that the key program decisions in this administration are being made more and more by the bookkeepers and budgeteers rather than by technical authorities.

The bookkeepers seem unable to peer beyond the ends of their noses in determining what this country can afford in the way of public investments. In the atomic power field, a vigorous attack on the remaining technical problems in order to attain economic atomic power at the earliest feasible date could bring the consumers of this country very large savings. Such a development inevitably would restrain the steady upward trend in the costs of the fossil fuels. As you know, gas prices have been climbing at a startling rate and even the cost of coal, despite our huge reserves, has been increasing at an average rate of about 1.5 percent per year.

If the development of low-cost nuclear power were to achieve a saving in fuel costs of no more than one-tenth of a cent per electrical kilowatt-hour, this would mean savings to the American consumers by 1975 of more than $2 billion per year. We can well afford to invest another $100 to $150 million per year now in accelerating atomic power development. When the potential economic gains are considered, we cannot afford not to.

This annual incremental investment is about what was estimated as necessary by the Joint Committee Staff Report of 1958. Relative to the total AEC budget of $2.6 billion in fiscal 1959, or to the massive expenditures for missile development, for example, this is hardly an astronomical sum.

(Indeed the total AEC expenditures for fiscal year 1959 are but a fraction of 1 percent of the total gross national product; are only 3.3 percent of total Federal expenditures, and 5.6 percent of total expenditures for national defense.)

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE AND SUBSIDIES

A related policy issue which I assume will be reopened this year is the question of whether additional subsidies, in the form of capital grants, should be offered to utilities to enable them to build the additional plants which are deemed necessary.

In considering this question, we should take a look at how far we have come in subsidizing these so-called private plants. In 1954, when the Eisenhower administration and the Republican majority in Congress insisted upon rewriting the Atomic Energy Act, private industry spokesmen assured the Joint Committee that if the act were amended, private industry would develop economic atomic power with its own resources. Mr. Walker Cisler of Detroit Edison even declared that his utility would require no guaranteed buy back of byproduct plutonium as far back as 1953.

The fact is, of course, that private industry has not been able to proceed unaided with the development of atomic power, but has had to come back to Congress with repeated requests for additional Federal assistance.

The fundamental Government aid, is AEC's reactor development program. Without the public research program, there is not one of the privately sponsored atomic power projects which could even have been proposed. Instead of diminishing after revision of the Act in 1954 and the entry of private industry, AEC power reactor development expenditures have increased every year and now are at a level of $105 million per year—five times the 1954 level.

A second significant subsidy is the Government-guaranteed price for the power reactor byproduct, plutonium. The present base price of $30 per gram reflects a subsidy of about $18 per gram to a power reactor operator. Despite Walker Cisler's protestations in 1953, the subsequent financial plan for the fast-breeder reactor sponsored by Detroit Edison and others assumes Government plutonium payments of more than $33 million, about $20 million of which would be clear Government subsidy.

For the more usual nonbreeder reactors, the present plutonium base price represents a subsidy of about 1.5 mills per kilowatt-hour. For a 100,000-kilowatt plant, this will amount to about $1 million per year.

A third important public subsidy for the so-called "private" projects is the Government fuel loan program. The Government finances the production of all enriched uranium fuel and loans it to the utilities at 4 percent per year. As long as the utility generates power with enriched uranium, it will receive a perpetual series of loans and never repay the outstanding balance. A private industrial reactor expert (Menke) told the Joint Committee last year that the fuel loan program is "a very heavy subsidy" worth about seven-tenths of 1 mill per kilowatt-hour. This is because it would cost the private utilities up to 10 percent per year to finance their own fuel inventories. For a 100,000-kilowatt nuclear plant, the fuel loan subsidy alone will be worth almost a half million dollars per year to a private utility.

In view of its great affection for high interest rates, I am surprised that the administration has not proposed to raise the fuel loan charge above 4 percent. The latest short-term Treasury bonds were sold at an interest rate of 5 percent.

A fourth form of Government aid is the cheap enriched uranium fuel provided by the Government. The major element in the price of enriched uranium is the cost of power, and all enriched uranium in the United States is produced either with low-cost TVA power or with power from private plants which is also low cost because of the TVA "yardstick" and Government underwriting. Thus, with the advent of an atomic power industry, and the widespread use of enriched uranium fuel, the benefits of low-cost TVA power will be exported to all parts of the United States. Since about three-fourths of the benefits will go to the privately owned utilities, one would think they would be stanch friends of the TVA. However, they seem instead to want the cheap uranium fuel but to eradicate the power agency which makes its low cost possible.

The low cost of U.S. enriched uranium probably should not be called a subsidy, since the TVA and private utility power charges to AEC cover all costs, but it is a benefit to the nuclear power industry made possible by huge Government investments and underwriting.

Federal fuel reprocessing is another public subsidy provided for all power reactor projects. It has been estimated that if private facilities were available, the cost would be two to three times the charge made by AEC. For the privately financed plant of Commonwealth Edison, for example, at Dresden, Ill., the savings represented by the Government fuel-processing service will approximate more than $2 million during the first 5 years of plant operation, and for Detroit Edison's fast breeder, more than $8.5 million, and, of course, subsidies are also extended to cooperatives and public power associations under the AEC second round demonstration program.

In addition to these general forms of aid, the Government is providing specific grants of research and development funds and fuel subsidies amounting to millions of dollars per project for many of the privately sponsored developmental power reactors.

Thus, the picture today is quite different from that promised by the spokesmen for private enterprise when they declared in 1954 that rewriting of the Atomic Energy Act to facilitate private activity was about all that would be required, other than a continuation of a modest national research and development program.

Yet, as I pointed out earlier, the accomplishments of the publicly subsidized, privately sponsored program have fallen short of what was promised. For example, the original estimated completion date for the Yankee atomic energy plant, was 1957, and for the Detroit Edison plant, 1958. Both are now scheduled for full operation next year. Similar slippages have occurred with other projects and some have been canceled entirely.

Thus despite valiant efforts and a substantial program of Government subsidies and services, the private organizations have not been able to move forward with projects as rapidly as was promised by them and by the Commission.

Last year, to stimulate the proposals for additional projects, AEC Chairman McCone recommended a new subsidy program under which AEC would finance up to half the cost of a nuclear powerplant but allow title to remain in the sponsoring utility. This was to have been the first of a series of projects financed with such capital grants. This idea of capital subsidies finds favor with some members of the Joint Committee also. I respect their reasons, but I continue to have questions about it. We already have built into the atomic power industry a considerable subsidy system, and the results have fallen short of the promises.

In view of this experience, I wonder if still another and more substantial subsidy program is clearly the best answer. I also feel concerned that initiating a capital subsidy program may open a "Pandora's box." Once started, Federal subsidy programs have proved difficult to shut off.

This question of how to finance additional projects is a complicated one, as long as AEC continues to oppose a sizable Federal developmental power reactor program. As you know, I joined with Senator GORE in 1956 to authorize such a program. Although recommended by the Joint Committee and passed by the Senate, the Gore-Holifield bill was defeated in the House due largely to strong administration opposition.

If the bill had passed and AEC had proceeded with such a program, the atomic power program would be well ahead of where it is now and we would have a series of developmental plants either in being or well under way, in addition to the projects sponsored by the utilities. We would not need now to be considering capital subsidies.

The great amount of invaluable technical information produced through the development, construction and operation of the Government's PWR demonstrates the value of this type of plant. Under the Gore-Holifield bill, a number of such heavily instrumented atomic power laboratories could have been undertaken. The relatively small amounts of power they produced surely would have done no conceivable harm to the private utilities, and the technological benefits to the entire utility industry would have been very substantial. In opposing the Gore-Holifield bill and, subsequently, every effort we have made to initiate a Federal developmental project, the private utilities have done themselves and the general public a grave disservice.

The private utility projects are not substitutes for the PWR-type facility. They are not being designed or equipped primarily for research and development nor will they be operated primarily to produce technical information. The privately sponsored plants will be operated primarily to produce power. They certainly will contribute to the technology, but to a much lesser extent than a truly developmental facility.

It has almost been forgotten that AEC proposed in 1957–58 that these private plants serve in part as test reactors for trying out improved types of fuel elements. This was a counter to our proposed governmental experimental-prototype type of plant. However, as in so many things, this program was dropped when the utilities apparently could not cooperate as their primary purpose was continuous power production.

GAPS IN PROGRAM

As in past years, I assume that the Joint Committee during this session will give attention to the gaps in our atomic power development program. One of the continuing lacks is a program for heavy water reactors using natural uranium as fuel. In putting this concept near the bottom of its priority list, AEC seems to overlook its important advantages. A successful natural uranium reactor would mean saving the power and therefore the coal consumed in making enriched uranium fuel. From a conservation standpoint, this makes sense. This reactor type also would allow development of a normal commercial fuel industry, free of Government loans and fuel ownership. For similar reasons, it would be more attractive to foreign countries, which hesitate to develop a nuclear power industry dependent upon enriched uranium from the United States. I am gratified that the present AEC has proposed a full-scale cooperative program with Canada in this field. This cooperation should not replace our own prototype development.

Another concept which seems well worth pursuing is the steam-cooled reactor, a variant on the nuclear superheat concept which may involve fewer technical difficulties.

I believe that the Joint Committee should also consider the project suggested last year of a 20,000-kilowatt plant on Guam if it is designed to contribute to the technology, and to another process steam reactor.

I feel certain that we also will take up the question of authorizing conversion of the new Hanford plutonium production reactor to a dual-purpose plant. This will enable the plant to produce at least 700,000 kilowatts of power—more capacity than in Bonneville Dam—rather than just warm up the Columbia River. General Electric Co. studies showed that such a dual-purpose plant will produce plutonium at less cost to the Government, with the power priced at going Bonneville rates. Almost half the power would be consumed by Hanford and the remainder sold to Bonneville for further marketing to the utilities of the region. Conversion needs to be authorized this year or next year if it is to be done on the most economical and efficient basis.

On all or most of these projects, I am afraid we will encounter the usual opposition by the budgeteers.

I am gratified to note, however, that the Commission has gone ahead with the projects which the Joint Committee added to the program last year, including the 50-megawatt boiling water reactor for municipal and cooperative systems, the organic moderated 50-megawatt prototype under third round terms, and the small nuclear superheat plant in Puerto Rico.

Unfortunately, however, there still has been a good deal of foot-dragging on projects like these which the Joint Committee adds over commission opposition. These projects were authorized last June and funds were appropriated in early August but AEC waited until the end of December to request proposals on the two 50-megawatt prototypes and has only now concluded negotiation of an agreement with the Puerto Rico water resources authority.

I understand all these projects were held up while Consumers Power of Michigan was haggling about the account of financial assistance it would receive in the unsolicited proposal program.

THE NEED FOR BETTER ORGANIZATION OF THE PROGRAM

In view of AEC Chairman McCone's remarks upon returning last fall from a visit to the Soviet Union, it is hard to understand why the Commission delayed about 6 months before getting started on these important projects. Mr. McCone, as you know, stated in November that he had been impressed "by the speed with which the Soviets appear able to reach a specific objective once they decide that it is of overriding importance." He declared that the United States "must be prepared to seize upon the undertakings which are of importance and advance them on an urgent basis. If we do less, our position of leadership soon will fade away."

I have been expressing the same sentiments for a good many years. I only wish that this administration would match its words with action.

It seems to me that the Commission's reluctance to back a really vigorous atomic power development program despite continuous pressures from the Joint Committee springs from budget and power policy considerations which are at best of only secondary importance.

The achievement of economic nuclear power is a technical problem and should be attacked as such. The technical problems which must be solved should be defined and systematic programs to solve them should be planned and carried out in a systematic way.

Instead, the Commission initially pursued a relatively planless approach to the construction of large, developmental power reactors. The PWR and the Oak Ridge gas-cooled reactor are exceptions but these were forced through over Commission resistance.

In 1954, the Commission initiated the first of a series of rounds under which utilities were encouraged to propose projects with Federal aid, not so much because this approach was considered the best way to get technical problems solved as that it avoided Federal expenditures for reactors and the possibility of Federal atomic power production. Some of the resulting projects were started more for political or public relations purposes than to solve specific technical problems and others bear only an accidental relationship to a coordinated program to achieve economic atomic power.

When the so-called partnership approach failed to produce an adequate program, the administration came forward in mid-1958 with the Euratom assistance proposal. This plan had several purposes but one obviously was to reduce the need for U.S. developmental plants by subsidizing their construction abroad, hopefully at less cost and of course with no power marketing responsibilities. Again, this was an attempted political solution to a technical problem and I criticized it severely for this reason. As of this date, the Euratom program has not resulted in one new atomic power project. As a substitute for U.S. developmental plants, it seems to be a fiasco.

What we need is a planned and coordinated program aimed at specific technical objectives and tied to a time schedule which puts the pressure on AEC, the national laboratories, and the reactor industry. I believe that unless we soon adopt such an approach we are not going to achieve truly economic atomic power. We suddenly will wake up some day to find that we are in second or third place in the world. Then, as in the missile field, there will be understandable demands for a costly crash program to try to catch up.

Now I think some progress has been made in this regard. In the spring of 1958, I recommended that AEC assume the positive direction of its experimental and prototype reactor program. This approach was outlined more completely in the joint committee staff report in August 1958. I am happy to say that AEC Chairman McCone adopted this policy in 1959, except for the unsolicited proposal proviso.

However, much more remains to be done in organizing and implementing AEC's positive direction of the program. AEC is still in need of a larger technical staff to provide technical direction. Too much time is spent in Washington haggling over contracts, and not enough is spent on seeing to it that adequate scientific and technical programs are planned and carried out in the use of experimental and prototype reactors. Here again the Shippingport project seems to be an exception.

I am also concerned that in recent months there seems to be a growing attitude by AEC and administration officials that the Soviets are cutting back on their atomic power program, and that we therefore can relax. The Russian atomic representative, Mr. Emelyanov, has even suggested that the U.S.S.R. and the United States should agree on which types of reactor prototype each country would emphasize, and thereby save development money. As you know, the United States and the U.S.S.R. already have signed a memorandum of agreement covering exchange of visits and technical documents and also provides for developing joint projects in certain research fields.

Although I am most strongly in favor of reducing the tensions between the United States and Russia, we would be foolhardy to relax our efforts in atomic power development for any such reasons. We do not know for a fact that the Russians are cutting back their atomic power effort. This is only what they have told some U.S. visitors. On the other hand, I do know that if I were hoping to win a competition I would certainly try to lull my competitors into feeling that they could afford to relax.

I need not remind you that this country has been lulled before, only to wake up with the Russians running away with the ball. We received no prior notice when the big Soviet jet bombers first flew over Moscow, nor did we have any notice prior to sputnik and their other outer space accomplishments. We may be faced with another important surprise just before the summit meeting this spring.

Indeed, in atomic energy, AEC was quite surprised at Geneva in 1955 when the Russians announced the operation of their 5,000-kilowatt atomic powerplant. Again in 1958 at Geneva, although the joint committee was assured by AEC that there would be no surprises, the Soviets unveiled their 100,000-kilowatt dual-purpose powerplant amid great publicity.

I know also, that in 1953, the United States held undisputed leadership in atomic power technology, that we retained it as late as 1955 but that by October 1, 1958, Dr. Walter Zinn reported to the joint committee that Russia not only had closed the gap but in some areas had moved ahead of us.

Therefore I do not favor any cartel or other arrangements to parcel out reactor types with the Russians, or any so-called cooperative endeavor which would relax our pressing forward to maintain our slim lead.

Admiral Rickover has not paced his nuclear submarine program in accordance with what he thought the Russians might be doing in nuclear submarine development. He has pressed ahead as rapidly as possible, and as a result the security of the United States today is greatly bolstered by the possession of this unique and powerful weapon.

The same policy should apply in the field of atomic power development. Our own power needs, as this group knows well, will mushroom immensely in coming decades, and the sooner we have an additional source of low-cost power the better for the long-term well-being of the American people.

Abroad, two-thirds of the world's peoples are energy-starved. Electric power is essential if they are to improve their miserable living standards. As a means of meeting their potentially huge needs, atomic power is of great interest and will assume ever-increasing importance.

The battle has been joined with the Soviet Union and the Red Chinese for the friendship of the uncommitted and underdeveloped countries—most of the world's population. In this competition, American leadership in the new and vital technology of atomic energy and power can be a factor of great value.

To speed the realization of economic benefits by the American consumer, then, and to regain the decisive international leadership we once enjoyed, I will continue to urge a strong, coordinated, and purposeful Federal program for the development of nuclear power.

Statement by Hon. J. W. Fulbright, of Arkansas, Commenting on Address by Premier Khrushchev to Supreme Soviet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. W. FULBRIGHT
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 19, 1960

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of a request which I received from the Soviet news agency Tass and the text of my reply.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

New York, N.Y., 14 NFT,
January 14, 1960.

Senator JAMES FULBRIGHT,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

We are asking group of prominent Americans for statements of about 400 words commenting on Khrushchev's address to Supreme Soviet. We would greatly appreciate statement from you. As you undoubtedly know our agency serves entire Soviet press and radio. Please wire reply collect to Tass Agency Associates, Press Building, Rockefeller Plaza, New York, N.Y.

TASS AGENCY.

JANUARY 18, 1960.

TASS AGENCY ASSOCIATES,
Press Building,
Rockefeller Plaza,
New York, N.Y.

In response to your telegram of January 14 requesting my comment on Chairman Khrushchev's address to Supreme Soviet, I submit the following with the understanding that the statement must be used in its entirety and the use of excerpts from it is not authorized:

"It is difficult to understand precisely what thoughts Premier Khrushchev desired to communicate in his speech on January 14. On the one hand he apparently wished to convey the idea that he intended to reduce the military might of his country by a reduction in the number of men under arms, and that this should be construed by us as a slowing down of the pace of the arms race. On the other hand, he clearly states that this reduction does not lessen the power of the armed forces and that his army possesses fighting means such as have never been possessed by any army before.

"The Chairman of the Council of Ministers cannot have it both ways. He cannot by the same action reduce his armed might and increase it. The only conclusion that can reasonably be drawn from this statement is that he is reorganizing his armed forces in such a way as to enhance their firepower and fighting means. This cannot be interpreted as a serious contribution to the reduction of armaments or to the lessening of the tensions in the world which derive from the arms race.

"It should be remembered that even when the reduction he announced takes place, he will still have as many men under arms as the United States. Presently, the Soviet Union has 3,623,000 men under arms, compared to 2,504,000 in the United States.

"Today, the effectiveness of armaments is measured not in numbers of men under arms, but in the possession of new and modern weapons and the means of delivering them. It is particularly disappointing, therefore, that Mr. Khrushchev displayed no willingness in his speech to consider real and verifiable measures of disarmament. Instead of discussing this problem realistically, in terms of the application of control and inspection without which no safeguarded disarmament measures can be undertaken, he brushed it off with generalities. Talk of Soviet rocket prowess and fantastic new weapons leaves the impression that the Soviet Union is more interested in threatening the rest of the world than in joining other nations to reduce existing world tensions.

"It is unfortunate that the Premier again repeats the insulting falsehood that we maintain armed forces equal to his own only because of the desire for profits by the manufacturers of armaments. This is the most flagrant kind of misrepresentation and increases the difficulty we have in taking his offer to negotiate arms reduction seriously. All the world should know that the United States would prefer to devote the wealth now expended on the arms race to the improvement of the economic conditions in the underdeveloped countries and the building of schools at home, and would do so if Premier Khrushchev would accept an arms limitation agreement upon which reasonable men could rely."

J. W. FULBRIGHT.

Remarks Before Business and Professional Women's Club of Lynn, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 19, 1960

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include my speech before the Business and Professional Women's Club of Greater Lynn, Mass., on October 6, 1959, on the subject of "Social Security."

I was pleased to attend, together with head-table guests consisting of Miss Mary S. King, of the Lynn Telegram-News; Katherine Donahue, State chairman of health and safety; Mildred Caram, State president; Despena Zervas, local president; Grace B. Michaud, chairman; Rena A. Decatur, president of district No. 1; Margaret O. Hill, State treasurer; Mrs. Anna M. Korsun, quota president; and Hazel Anderson, of the Lynn Item.

Greetings. Social security is a very general description that includes such programs as old age and survivors insurance, old age assistance, aid to the blind, aid to dependent children, aid to the permanently and totally disabled, and unemployment compensation.

Old age insurance is earned through special taxes paid by the worker and his employer. Unemployment compensation is financed through taxes levied on the employer alone. The remaining programs come under the heading of public welfare—or charity—and are supported through Federal and State appropriations out of general revenues.

In order to avoid confusion, I shall confine my remarks to the subject of old age and survivors insurance, which might be loosely termed old age pensions, or earned monthly benefits to provide for persons during their retirement.

To understand social security we must look into the background of this revolutionary type of legislation.

Many older nations had modest social security programs in operation long before we even considered the subject.

Our young and growing Nation, isolated from the rest of the world while it busily tended to its own confident development, emphasized the values of hard work, private initiative, and saving for "a rainy day."

In earlier days when each family was a self-contained economic and social unit, raising its own food, building its own shelter, and providing for its other needs through handicraft industries in the home, the sick, the disabled, and the older people were taken care of within this family circle.

With the coming of the industrial revolution, and the employment of large numbers of people in the factories, with the consequent shift of population from the farms to the towns and cities, the old-style way of supporting the aged and the dependent members of society, was no longer effective.

We had to fill the vacuum by new social and economic programs.

But, as people cling to old and familiar routines, even when they no longer suffice, the dominant conservatism of the United States delayed action on these imperative changes until the serious depression of the 1930's forced our hand.

It is to the great credit of the United States and its people that they engineered the "peaceful revolution" of that time and, by a combination of realism and humanism, adapted our social and economic systems to solve these problems in order to continue the progress of our Nation.

Everyone wants and needs economic security.

As a free and independent people, we want to be dependent on no one.

In the vicissitudes of life, even the best of people are apt to find themselves in a position where it is difficult, if not impossible, "to make both ends meet."

Programs must be devised, not only to eliminate these financial hardships, but to maintain the human dignity that is essential to the lives of self-respecting free men and free women.

Security for the mass of our people can be achieved only when most of us have jobs. But in the farflung, complex, and impersonal organization of our industrial society, there are millions who become destitute even in times of general prosperity. People who are eager and willing to work cannot find jobs. In some industries, an able and experienced worker runs into an invisible barrier as soon as he reveals that he is 40 years of age or older. Unlike the old days, he and his wife cannot develop a homestead out of the wilderness to provide for themselves and their children by their own efforts. We live in a collective and interdependent society, where our jobs and our incomes often depend upon decisions made by those we never see.

The Social Security Act was born during the depths of a paralyzing depression. At a time when 10 million workers were without employment other than work relief, and when some 18 million people were dependent for subsistence on direct relief or welfare, the President set up a Committee on Economic Security To Study the Problem of Destitution and to Make Recommendations. That was in 1934.

After searching study, the Committee found that the heart of the problem is loss of earnings. It discovered that, in most cases, whenever earnings are cut off, destitution is not far away. The question, then, was how to spread earnings over a lifetime, over periods when the breadwinner is working and periods when he is not, how to provide an income throughout the whole cycle of life—in childhood, youth, middle and old age.

It found that this could not be done on an individual basis: relatively few people can save enough out of their income to take care of emergency periods.

The Committee came to the wise conclusion that the problem could be met to a large extent through savings on a social basis. The family circle concept of long ago, where the young and the strong helped the weak, and were helped in turn as they became dependent, was broadened to include our whole society.

This could be done on the principle of sharing the cost and spreading the risk.

By 1959 the people themselves, on a voluntary basis, had accelerated this development. Through group medical and hospital insurance plans, they are now able to protect their health in a way that they could not afford as individuals.

Disaster can happen to any of us, suddenly and with no chance to prepare for it. Actually, however, it strikes relatively few at any one time. If a small amount could be collected from the many who are subject to the risk, a fund could be built for payment of benefits to the few whom disaster or misfortune has struck. As a substantial part of its answer to insecurity and destitution, the committee, back there in the midthirties, recommended social insurance.

After studying the findings and considering the advice of the Committee on Economic Security, the Congress passed the Social Security Act in 1935.

The Social Security Act is a Federal law, but the Federal Government operates only one of the programs—old-age, survivors, and disability insurance. The other eight programs are operated by the States, with Federal cooperation.

It is common knowledge that most of us, because of living costs, social standards, and economic misfortunes, do not set aside enough money or other assets during our working years to provide adequately for ourselves or our families when earned income is cut off by disability, old age, or death.

The OASI, as it is known, is a Federal program operated by the Social Security Administration.

Because of many amendments through the years the law now covers, with few exceptions, all people who are gainfully employed. The program provides regular monthly benefits for insured workers and their families when the wage earner reaches retirement age (65 for men, 62 for women), for eligible survivors when the worker dies at any age, and for disabled workers aged 50 to 65 and their eligible dependents.

A person whose annual net income from covered self-employment is $400 or more, reports his earnings and pays the social security tax when he files his Federal income tax return. (Only the first $4,200 of earnings are taxed through 1958. Beginning with 1959, net earnings up to $4,800 are taxed. The contribution rate for self-employed income is 3¾ percent for 1959. It is scheduled to increase to 4½ percent for 1960 through 1962; 5¼ percent for 1963 through 1965; 6 percent for 1966 through 1968; and 6¾ percent for 1969.)

These earnings are also recorded by the Social Security Administration under the self-employed person's social security account number.

Although self-employment was not covered by the original Social Security Act, most persons who work for themselves have been brought under its protection by amendments to the law.

To qualify for monthly payments when you reach retirement age, or to make payments possible for your survivors in case of your death, you must have been in work covered by the social security law for a certain number of "quarters of coverage."

You get 4 quarters of coverage for a year in which you have $400 or more in net earnings from self-employment.

If you have self-employment net earnings from more than one occupation covered by the law, your income from all of them (up to the applicable maximum) is counted toward old-age, survivors, and disability insurance benefits. A net loss in one business is deducted from net earnings in the others.

If you operate a business but close it during a year and open another, or if you operate more than one business, you still should make only one report of self-employment net earnings for the year.

There is no provision in the law which permits refund of social security taxes properly paid, in the event that you do not have enough work under the law to be insured.

In case of your death at any age, payments may be made to certain members of your family if you had social security credit for 6 quarters of coverage out of the 13 calendar quarters before your death.

When you reach retirement age, you and certain members of your family can get monthly payments if you have had 1½ to 10 years of work (6 to 40 quarters of coverage), depending on how soon you reach retirement age. (No one will need as much as 10 years of work to qualify for retirement benefits until after 1970.)

The minimum payment to an insured retired person is $26.40 monthly. The maximum retirement payment is at present $116. The maximum family payment depends upon the worker's benefit amount If his amount is $109 a month or more, the family maximum is $254.

My colleague, Congresswoman KATHARINE ST. GEORGE of New York State, introduced a bill on January 7, 1959 * * * numbered H.R. 944, "to amend title I of the Social Security Act, so as to remove the limitation upon the amount of outside income which an individual may earn while receiving benefits thereunder."

Mrs. ST. GEORGE, incidentally, is a member of the Spring Valley Chapter of Business and Professional Women, which explains her interest in the proposed amendment.

Although her bill did not pass in the last session of the Congress, I am confident that it, or a similar bill, will be enacted in the near future.

Under the present law, if a person earns more than $1,200 a year after he or she has retired, the number of monthly benefit checks due you (while you are under the age of 72) will be reduced correspondingly. In general, you lose your right to 1 month's benefit check for each $80 (or fraction of $80) of earnings over $1,200 in the year.

Beginning with 1959, no matter how much your total earnings are in a year, those earnings will not cause you to lose the monthly payment for any month in which you neither work as an employee for more than $100 ($80 per month for 1958 and previous years) nor render substantial services in self-employment.

Generally you perform "substantial services" when you actively engage in the operation of your trade or business.

There is no single rule for determining when a person is performing substantial services in self-employment. Some of the factors considered are: the amount of time devoted to your business both before and after your retirement; the nature of your service; the presence or absence of a paid manager or member of your family who manages the business, and whether your activity is seasonal, etc.

After your 72d year, benefits may be paid to you no matter how much you earn.

This $1,200 ceiling on outside earnings is a holdover from depression days.

In 1935, the Congress had to keep in mind the millions of unemployed.

The purpose, in establishing this ceiling of $1,200 was to discourage retired persons from continuing in the jobs, or income-producing self-employment activities, and thereby make them available to younger and unemployed persons.

That reasoning is now obsolete, and the ceiling itself has no meaning because of the rise in the cost of living.

In the last session of the Congress, the income limitations for single veterans receiving non-service-connected pensions was raised from $1,400 to $1,800 and for married veterans from $2,700 to $3,000.

This precedent is certain to strengthen the case for a substantial increase in the amount that may be earned by a person retired under social security without jeopardizing his monthly benefit checks.

This is of particular interest to business and professional women who want to continue earning additional income after retirement.

It is appropriate that this issue should be stressed during the observance of National Business and Professional Women's Week.

I intend to introduce a companion bill identical with that already submitted by Congresswoman KATHARINE ST. GEORGE.

It is a proposal of such overriding merit that I expect it to be enacted into law during the year 1960.

The Real Cost of Milk

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 19, 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, we in Wisconsin, who produce so much milk, have at times discussions between the city folks and the farmers, because the city folks feel that the farmers are getting a great deal for their milk, and the farmers try to tell them they are mistaken. For instance, the farmer gets about 7 cents a quart for milk, or perhaps $3.25 a hundredweight. The same day, if he is a consumer, he pays anywhere from 20 to 25 cents a quart for milk.

The point I am making is that the farmer who sells the milk is not getting a big profit from the milk because in between the producer and consumer there is the cost of getting the milk to the factory. To get it there, high wages have to be paid. Then the milk probably goes to the distributing station. Again wages have to be paid. The result is that no one is getting a great perecntage of profit out of the milk.

But the point is that the farmer does the milking, he owns the cows, he has to feed them, he has to have a farm on which to raise feed for the cows to consume, he has all the work to do, and practically none of the pay. The point is he is not getting his equitable share of the price the milk sells for. That point should be stressed and restressed, because there are those who want to create dissension between the farmers and the city folks.

Mr. President, today the Nation is striving for a solution of the problems in agriculture.

Over the years, the Nation has experienced a strange anomaly in the pricing of agricultural commodities. The prices for products have risen in dollars and cents value.

However, by the yardstick of how many hours of work are required to pay for a quart of milk, for example, the costs have actually shown a steady decline since 1890.

According to a study by the Milk Industry Foundation, the purchase of a quart of milk required 25.5 minutes of labor in 1890. In 1959, the wage earner needed to work 6.8 minutes for a quart of milk.

In the days when the farmer—because of the high cost of the farm program—is increasingly becoming the target of criticism, I believe it is important to point out such factors. The decline in real costs of such commodities—for the most part, at the expense of the farmer—has contributed greatly to holding down the costs of living.

I wish to stress, also, that the farmer often receives too little of the dollars and cents value of his product.

Currently, for example, a dairy farmer in Wisconsin may sell his milk for 6 cents a quart. Within 24 hours, the same milk may be sold at a retail price of about 24 cents a quart. Now, is the farmer getting a fair share of the retail price? Definitely not.

The 6 or 7 cents a quart received for milk is not only too small a share of the retail price, but it is also inadequate in terms of meeting the costs of equipment, labor, taxes, and other skyrocketing expenses of farm operations.

Now, who is getting the money? From time to time investigations have been made into this problem, including hearings by congressional committees. Unfortunately, the big price spread between what the farmer receives for a product and what it sells for retail continues to account for an increasingly large portion of the higher price to the consumer.

Recently, the Dairy Record, an authoritative voice in dairying, published an editorial entitled "The Real Cost of Milk." I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE REAL COST OF MILK

It would require a very aggressive job of public relations to convince the consumer that the real price of a quart of milk has shown a steady decline since 1890, but such actually has been the case.

The Milk Industry Foundation points out that the real price of milk is represented not by the number of cents required to pay for it but by the amount of work that the consumer has to do to earn enough money to buy it.

The U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics has collected data for 70 years on milk prices and the number of minutes of factory work required to earn the price of a home-delivered quart, using the factory worker's average hourly earnings as a basis.

In 1890 the average price for quart of home-delivered milk was 6.8 cents and it required 25.5 minutes for a wage earner to earn enough to buy the quart for in those halcyon days of low wages the average hourly factory wage was 16 cents.

In 1914 the average price of milk was 8.9 cents; it required 22.9 minutes to earn the price of a quart of milk and the average hourly factory wage was 23.3 cents per hour. In the booming year of 1929 the price of milk had advanced to 14.4 cents per quart; the average hourly wage was 56.6 cents and it required 15.3 minutes to earn enough to buy the quart of milk.

In the postwar days of 1947 the average price per quart was 19.6 cents; the average hourly factory wage was $1.237 and it only required 9.5 minutes to earn that quart bottle of milk. In 1959 the January-October average price of milk was 25.2 cents; the average hourly factory wage was $2.216 and it required only 6.8 minutes to earn the price of the quart.

Consumers seldom, if ever, give any thought to the relative stability of milk prices or that it takes less out of the family budget in relation to income than is the case with most other products which they buy.

Milk distributors continue to operate on a margin of slightly more than 2 cents of each sales dollar for a net profit of about one-half cent a quart. There may be many individual companies which are operating on a 2 percent margin, but we doubt very much that there are any great number of industries which in the overall are operating on such a slim percentage margin.

And this is the industry that political demagogs from time to time raise their quavering voices to demand that the fluid milk industry be made a public utility.

The Postal Deficit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE M. RHODES

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 19, 1960

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it was no surprise that the President, in his budget message yesterday, included as part of his anticipated surplus some $554 million, which he proposes be raised by increasing first-class and airmail rates by 1 cent to liquidate the postal deficit.

Over the years the administration has complained about the size of the postal deficit and has periodically proposed legislation to increase rates. Yet, for some strange reason it carefully avoids proposals which would increase the rates on the types of mail which really cause the tremendous postal deficit.

I refer, of course, to the preferential second-class rates granted newspapers and magazines—outright subsidies totaling more than $200 million a year for profitmaking second-class publications. A few large magazines, such as Life, Saturday Evening Post, Reader's Digest, Look, and others, are carried at taxpayers' expense to the tune of $4 million, $7 million, and up to $10 million a year.

Mr. Speaker, last July 28 I introduced H.R. 8433 to place an annual limitation on publishers' second-class mail subsidies, based on a 5-year sliding scale—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 105, part 11, pages 14543–14547.

The bill would provide that during the first year, Post Office Department costs of receipt, handling, processing, transporting, and delivering of second-class publications to its subscribers by mail may not exceed by more than $5 million the annual postage paid by the publication. During the second year this subsidy could be a maximum of $3 million per publication; the third year a maximum subsidy of $1 million; the fourth year a maximum subsidy of $500,000; and during the fifth year and each year thereafter, a maximum subsidy of $100,000 for each publication. Once the subsidy limit were reached for any publication during any year, the full postal rate necessary to cover the Department's costs for that publication would go into effect.

This bill is similar to, but meets specific criticisms offered by the magazine publishing industry to a previous version of my bill, adopted by the House as an amendment to the postal rate bill in the last Congress, but subsequently dropped from conference.

Mr. Speaker, my bill would bring in new revenue to the Post Office Department from the types of mail now incurring the deficit. First-class mail is more than paying its own way. The administration proposes to impose the burden on the average mail user to cover up the huge deficits being incurred by profit-making magazines. There is no doubt of this fact. During the last year's hearings before the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Treasury-Post Office Department, Mr. Hyde Gillette, Assistant Postmaster General, Bureau of Finance said, in anwer to a question about magazine losses to the Department:

Mr. Chairman, it is true that magazines probably pay more than a hundred million dollars less than the cost of handling them, but part of that is offset by the extra amount that the first-class mail pays over and above its fully allocated cost, so that the net effect is not carried through directly to the deficit.

If the Post Office Department were really interested in eliminating the postal deficit, it would support my bill and urge that the Post Office and Civil Service Committee schedule hearings. Yet both the Department and the Bureau of the Budget has reported adversely on H.R. 8433 and its companion bill, H.R. 8603, introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS].

Mr. Speaker, the overwhelming support I have received for my bill from persons all over the country has convinced me that Americans are becoming increasingly resentful of having their tax dollars used to subsidize profitable publishing companies. As evidence of this fact, I call attention to Bulletin No. 252 "The Mandate," published by the National Federation of Independent Business. Members are familiar with these ballots on national issues, conducted by this organization for many years.

Question No. 3 of Bulletin No. 252, circulated last fall reads:

Reduce postal rate subsidies: Are you for or against Congress requiring all large national magazines to pay their full share of Post Office mailing costs, the same as users of first-class mail are required to do?

As is the usual practice, a pro and con statement on the issue was presented:

Argument for reducing subsidies: $200 million yearly, that's what it is costing the U.S. Post Office to handle the weekly and monthly mailings of the Nation's giant magazines. That is the difference between its costs, and what they pay for postal services. This subsidy has amounted to $2.5 billion during the past 12 years, and it has been paid for out of the pockets of people who more than pay their way when they use first-class mail. Meanwhile the firms publishing these magazines have been running up record profits, and indulging in all sorts of cut-rate offers to take bread and butter out of the mouths of small businessmen in the magazine distribution field.

Argument against reducing subsidies: These national magazines are paying their way. Through countrywide advertising programs they make possible, they help to keep the wheels of industry turning, employment high, and earnings ever mounting, which means purchasing power available for business, large and small. More than this, they are educating our people about important national issues and events, and furnishing them top-flight entertainment. In our postal scheme, they are never supposed to "pay their way," in any way other than these. Despite this, their mail handling cost is low, and they are charged for part of the services they receive.

Mr. Speaker, the result of this nationwide poll among small businessmen were published in bulletin No. 253 as follows:

Reduce postal-rate subsidies: For, 84 percent; against, 13 percent; no vote, 3 percent.

So long as the administration opposes efforts to curb the exorbitant second-class publishers' subsidies, we must continue to vigorously resist pressures to raise the rates on first class and air mail.

Ukrainian Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FLORENCE P. DWYER
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 19, 1960

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian independence provides an opportunity for all Americans and free people everywhere to do honor to the continued struggle of a courageous people for freedom.

It is worth reminding ourselves that wherever or whenever freedom is denied, then the idea of freedom itself is in danger. Free people can never relax in the presence of tyranny.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, I was privileged to address the World Congress of Ukrainian Women, sponsored in New York by the Ukrainian National Women's League of America. It was an impressive demonstration to me of the undying determination of people of Ukrainian descent, wherever they may live, to keep alive the hope of freedom for their brethren still in Soviet Ukraine.

Under previous leave, I include my remarks on that occasion in the RECORD as a testimonial of my own admiration for their courage:

UKRAINIAN-AMERICAN WOMEN AND FREEDOM

I want first of all to greet the delegates to this World Congress of Ukrainian Women and to welcome those of you from other countries to our own, and of course I want also to congratulate the Ukrainian National Women's League of America for sponsoring this Congress.

Woman's role in our civilization has always been considered important, though that importance has not been adequately emphasized and properly understood. Certainly such has been the case in the distant past, in ancient times, in the Middle Ages, and in some countries and communities even in our own day.

From time immemorial woman's status and her role was more or less clearly defined and widely recognized: the home was her special place, and to attend to all the details within and around the house was her rigidly prescribed duty. She brought warmth and encouragement to her growing children and helped her husband as indispensable partner in all phases of the family. But with the coming of industrialization, the rise of modern metropolitan centers, urbanization, and all the complexity of today's civilization, this seemingly happy equilibrium was upset. A different relationship developed. Men went off to their work and women remained at home. A separateness and sharp division—a distance—grew up between man and woman. But today we are learning that man alone cannot cope with all his pressing and perplexing problems without the encouragement and inspiration, without the aid and counsel and assistance of woman. Thus, in a sense we have traversed a long distance, through the ages, in enlarging the area in which woman works, in enhancing her standing in our civic and social lives, and in appreciating more properly her indispensable role in modern society as her role was also understood—taken for granted—in earlier societies.

These general remarks apply equally to the women of the Ukraine as they apply to the women of America and to those of other countries, particularly to the women of the free and democratic West. It is difficult for one not brought up in the Ukrainian tradition in the historic Ukraine, for one not well acquainted with the traditional Ukrainian family and communal customs, and the Ukrainian way of life, to speak of women in the Ukraine, and describe adequately their important role, to the World Congress of Ukrainian Women. But this challenge may be attempted if one has had a keen interest in Ukrainian affairs, has followed recent tragic history of the Ukrainian people in their homeland, has learned of their struggle for freedom against their heartless oppressors, has known Ukrainian-Americans at work here, and has been aided with information by the Ukrainian National Women's League of America. I have these interests and have enjoyed the favors of the Women's League, and therefore gladly accepted the invitation to address you today.

Now let me say a few words about the general status of women in the U.S.S.R.

It is extremely interesting and revealing to consider the role Soviet women play in Soviet society today. Soviet society presents us all with the distressing and disturbing dilemma of seeing the mixture of good and evil. This is so in a review of Soviet accomplishments in education and science. In the case of the Soviet woman, this dilemma is even more sharply delineated.

The Soviet woman holds some of the most important positions in Soviet economic life and some of the most degrading and humiliating. If any of you ladies present were to be admitted to a hospital in Moscow, Kiev, or Tiflis, undoubtedly you would be attended by a woman doctor. Women dominate the medical profession in the U.S.S.R. It is estimated that in both the medical profession and in education more than 70 percent are women.

Women in the Soviet Union are also technicians and engineers and hold responsible positions in the Soviet Government and the Communist Party organizations. A woman, Madame Furtseva, is actually a member of the highest organ of Soviet political power, the party Presidium.

Yet, this is only one side of the picture. To be sure many hundreds of thousands of women are engaged in the familiar roles of housewife, mother, teacher, doctor, and researcher. But the Soviet woman is also doing a man's job—often of the most back-breaking kind. For every Soviet woman who is a doctor there are many more who wield picks and shovels in construction work, drive rivets in steel structures, run massive agricultural machines, haul mortar and brick, repair sewers, and sweep the city streets day and night. None of these is a pleasant task. All are degrading and humiliating in the extreme.

Why do we see such striking contrasts in the treatment of women? One part of the answer lies in the fact that Soviet Russia suffers from an acute labor shortage. Thus, to achieve the extraordinary goals laid down by the successive 5-year plans, the Soviet Government has not hesitated to exploit the Soviet woman. The Soviet labor force needs them. It is estimated that a third of all heavy manual labor in the U.S.S.R. is being done by women and that nearly one-half of all industrial and factory jobs are held by them. Recent statistics on Soviet population indicate that in 1939, before the war, 52 percent of the total population were women and 48 percent men; the 1959 census revealed that owing to war losses of manpower, the current percentage of the total population of 208,800,000 is 55 percent women to 45 percent men.

The fundamental explanation for women's position in the Soviet Union, however, can be found in the nature of the Soviet system and the Communist ideology. Here, the state is the all-important consideration. In theory, of course, the state consists of all the people and exists to serve their best interests. But in Communist practice, the state is directed by the Communist Party which alone knows what is best for the people. And, the Communist Party, in turn, is dominated by a handful of top officials, and led by a dictator, whose every decision and desire is law.

In a free society, all the people participate not only in the work of the state but in making the decisions. The goals and purposes of a free democracy are the goals and purposes freely determined by its people. Even minorities, even those who may disagree, are protected in their freedom because a truly free society in the Western tradition insists upon limits to the power of government. The essential dignity and freedom of the individual is guaranteed against the demands of the state—no matter how large a majority may feel otherwise.

This, of course, is not so in Soviet society—and this explains the basic difference in the role of women as between the free world and the Communist world. The people of Soviet Russia—regardless of differences in nationality, religion, or personal desires—must devote their services and efforts to the Communist state in whatever way its Communist masters order. There is little or no free choice. If one woman is assigned a profession that gives her unusual opportunity, it is not because she chose it freely or earned it fairly; it is exclusively due to the decision of the Government that she could best serve the state in that capacity. Likewise, the degrading work to which other women are assigned results from the same impersonal, dictatorial decision of the Government. There is no free choice, no consideration of individual rights, no opportunity for freely developing one's God-given talents and tastes.

I have no doubt, however, that before all and above all Ukrainian women in their native homeland and in their personal lives are proud mothers, faithful wives, efficient homemakers, and vigilant guardians of family and community conscience insofar as the state permits. But it is difficult for Ukrainian women in the Ukraine, under the stern and unrelenting Communist totalitarian dictatorship, to retain these virtues and carry on their difficult and onerous tasks. There, under the most oppressive of tyrannies, in the very midst of abject misery. Ukrainian women cannot hope to be their true selves. They are not allowed to be true to themselves, to their families and communities. The monolithic Communist regime, with its purely materialistic beliefs has been forcibly trying to imbue the women of Ukraine with Marx's preposterous and ungodly beliefs. For nearly 40 years the fanatical and brutal Communists have been doing their worst to rob the women, as also the men, of Ukraine of their time-honored and venerated traditions and virtues. Fortunately, Communist attempts have not succeeded, and I am glad to be assured that today the courageous and stout-hearted women of Communist-dominated Ukraine still steadfastly and tenaciously cling to their womanly, motherly, and family virtues. There, against heavy and often forbidding odds, they are carrying on the fight with all the means they possess for the preservation of these virtues, and also for their personal and national freedom. These dauntless and daring souls deserve our unstinted praise and wholehearted sympathy for their willingness and readiness to sacrifice their all in defense of their cultural and spiritual values.

The virtues of family love, of motherly affection and of concern for the local community are the basic necessities in all free societies. They are much the same in every country and among all peoples, but only those who enjoy the blessings of freedom and democracy may freely practice them. That explains the close relationship and the spiritual kinship prevailing among women of the free world, and also between the women of the free world and the freedom-loving women of the unfree, Communist-dominated world. Of course even closer is the spiritual and cultural relationship between the Ukrainian-American women, the women of Ukrainian descent in other free countries, and the women of the Ukraine itself. That is only natural and desirable. There should be unbreakable ties between the women in the Ukraine and those in the free world. These ties need strengthening, cementing and forging through constantly sustained efforts on the part of women of Ukrainian descent, and particularly by American women of Ukrainian descent.

Those in this country, as well as all of you here representing Ukrainian women in the free world, have the special mission of acquainting the women of your particular country with the lot and fate, with the gifts and talents, with the accomplishments and attainments, with the hopes and aspirations of the women of Ukraine. And since the women of unfree Ukraine are not in position—are not allowed—to speak for themselves, it is incumbent upon all of you in the free world to speak for them, to espouse their cause in all the forums of the free world. I consider this task, in fact, the task of speaking for the women of Ukraine, as one of your solemn duties. It is a primary and basic obligation of women of Ukrainian descent in the free world.

The Ukrainian National Women's League of America, in the course of its existence during the last 34 years, has been doing splendid work both in the propagation of the cause of Ukraine, and also in welfare and educational fields in a large number of communities. Operating in 16 States with 63 branches in many parts of this country, its activities reach out to all communities having large numbers of Ukrainian-Americans. As a civic, cultural, educational and welfare organizations, the league has been helpful to all those needing aid and guidance. Besides giving financial and material aid to the needy, it has been rendering signal service in guidance and educational work, particularly among immigrant Ukrainians. In this respect, the league has become a first-rate educational agency, an enterprising American institution, in teaching and educating Ukrainian immigrants in the American way of life. If the league has done nothing else, this delicate and difficult work alone would command our admiration and high praise. I am indeed glad to express my personal and profound admiration for such fine work.

Since its founding in 1925, the object of the league has been, and remains, that of uniting and organizing women of Ukrainian birth and descent in this country for the purpose of mutual benefit, and for the promotion of their common interest, as well as giving assistance to Ukrainians in Europe.

As I said before, in all of its varied and worthwhile activities, in the performance of many humanitarian and educational tasks, the league has been eminently successful. Let me state that it will be even more successful in its future endeavors after this congress, for I am sure that upon your return to your respective countries, you will carry your fine work with increased vigor, energy, and zeal. And the league, knowing that its work has been properly and fully appreciated, will continue the policies which have been endorsed and acclaimed by its members and followers.

I have admired the work of the league in all fields and in all communities, in domestic and international affairs. And I like particularly the slogan adopted by the league for this congress: "Ukrainian women in the non-Communist world in defense of the four freedoms, and of the human rights." In these precarious days, we in the free world should never relax our vigilance in behalf of our most cherished values, our birthrights, our freedoms, the Bill of Rights, and the human rights that belong to all people for all of which freedom-seeking humanity has struggled throughout its known history.

It is of course natural that those who suffer most under tyranny should become its most uncompromising enemies, vowing to fight for its destruction. For that reason I can well understand, and everyone should know, why Ukrainian women everywhere in the free world are so bitterly and justly opposed to all forms of totalitarianism and dictatorship, particularly to Communist totalitarian dictatorship. It is the natural but courageous response of good people to become involved in this world struggle for freedom and independence against the forces of darkness and destruction, against Soviet Communist dictatorship. You have grasped the full significance of that struggle, encompassing not only man's material possessions but also his very soul. By your willingness and readiness to take such a strong and honorable stand against Communist tyranny, you are assuring to yourselves a high place among those who have fought and died for the higher and nobler ideals of humanity. The women of Ukraine, the women of Ukrainian birth and descent, the delegates of the World Congress of Ukrainian Women, and the members of the Ukrainian National Women's League of America—you all deserve well of the free world, for you are fighting in defense of the four freedoms wherever they are denied in the world.

State, School, and Child in Today's World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 19, 1960

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD excerpts from an address I was privileged to give when I was invited to appear on the program for the South Dakota Educational Association Convention at Aberdeen, S. Dak., on November 4, 1959, and at Spearfish, S. Dak., on November 5, 1959.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE, SCHOOL, AND CHILD IN TODAY'S WORLD

(Excerpts from the remarks of FRANCIS H. CASE, U.S. Senator for South Dakota, Education Association at Aberdeen, Nov. 4, 1959 and Spearfish, Nov. 5, 1959)

"The primary function of any legislative body is the education and training of its youth." In those words, Aristotle, some 300 years B.C., stated the partnership responsibility of the educator and the legislator.

Figures released by the Census Bureau show over 4,300,000 births in the United States last year, a net increase of more than 2,600,000 over deaths. At 30 to a class, that calls for 90,000 additional classrooms when the babies of 1959 enter school.

We also have the new space age and all the requirements of foreign language study, higher mathematics, physics and electronics that have come with it.

Here is the price tag on the public school crisis in our own State of South Dakota that was recently put forth by the Citizens' Tax Study Committee:

Total spent in 1946, $15 million; total spent in 1950, $23 million; total spent in 1958, $42 million. Projecting, that will be $46 million in 1960; a 100 percent increase in 10 years.

To you who measure school costs in terms of mill levy, here was the committee's figure on that: 17.2 mills in 1950; 21.7 mills last year in 1958; but 38.3 mills in 1970 on the State's total assessed valuation to raise the estimated requirement at that time.

BIDDING FOR TEACHERS

To be sure, our State's increasing population now should provide a greater annual income and our assessable values should increase—and in my opinion will greatly increase during the next decade, but any way you look at it, the need for larger revenues for schools is very real and very large.

I can remember one year when a western school district advertised to let the job of teacher to the lowest bidder—and got one for less than $40 per month. But, the kind of education that is needed today is not to be found on any bargain counter of low standards and low salaries.

Some teachers may supplement their income by outside employment, but free-lance writing, baby-sitting, and even seasonal refereeing of athletic contests cannot be counted upon to recruit and retain the number and the quality of teachers that the needs of our country require today.

By whatever means is necessary, local government, State government, and Federal Government—mark you, I include Federal Government—must join in a common endeavor to provide the dollars necessary to offer the kind of education that will meet the challenge of the day in which we live.

AID NEED NOT MEAN CONTROL

Federal aid does not need to mean control. We have had Federal aid to education ever since Abraham Lincoln signed the Land Grant Act into law in 1862, almost 100 years ago.

Here are some of the possibilities to explore: Dedication of revenues from natural resource development is one way. Profits of the State cement plant over and above the $2 million now earmarked for highways is an example—and might provide a dividend on classrooms built with cement. A penny sales tax to be distributed to school districts on a per capita basis would not mean controls and would let South Dakota's growing number of visitors share in the cost of the communities they here enjoy.

In all taxation, it is well to remember the epigram of old Bob Doughton: "You can shear a sheep many times but you can skin him only once."

If government meets its responsibility in financing, then what?

Take the child. If government provides his education, does it have the right to possess the child? My answer is: "No."

However important it may be to have scientists and engineers, doctors and nurses, or whatever calling you name, the free world will lose the very faith that makes it free if government dictates the product of education. It can offer incentives for courses to pursue; it can provide facilities essential to certain training; but when the state seeks to possess the mind of the student, education fails.

COMPETITION IN LEARNING

Russian children, we are told, are required to complete 7 years of schooling and they are moving toward 10 years. The 7-year students have had 7½ Carnegie units in mathematics, 1½ in history, 1½ in geography, 1½ in biology, 1⅓ in physics and chemistry, 2 in a foreign language. The 10-year exams are estimated by the College Entrance Examination Board in this country to be roughly equivalent to the advanced mathematics examination which is taken by only about 10 percent of the 12th grade students in the United States. The 10-year graduates must pass an examination in 7 academic subjects—Russian language and literature, one foreign language, algebra, geometry, physics, chemistry and biology.

Here is a sample question in history: "Set forth the universal-historical significance of the formation of the U.S.S.R.—the first multi-national socialist state in the world." Another: "The great advance of the Soviet Army in 1944 and its liberation of European countries abroad from Hitlerite invaders."

Here is one in physics: "An automobile which weighs 5 tons with its load proceeds along an arched bridge at a speed of 21.6 kilometers per hour. What is its pressure upon the middle of the bridge, if the radius of the bridge's curvature is 50 meters?" Or this: "A container weighing 250 kilograms falls from 800 meters. At a point 100 meters above the earth, what is its potential and kinetic energy equal to?"

But in our anxiety to improve our educational policies and methods, we must not abandon the regard for the individual child which is a basic corollary of our belief in the rights of the individual and the limits to which government can go in possessing the child.

HOW MEASURE PURPOSE OR DRIVE?

When the Committee of Five was created to plan the new Academy of the U.S. Air Force, Dr. Virgil Hancher, president of the University of Iowa, told us there has never yet been devised a satisfactory method to measure the drive in a young man's personality.

Who could have predicted that a small town high school such as Canton, S. Dak., in one school generation could have produced two of the world's greatest scientists of our generation, Dr. Merle Tuve, president of the Carnegie Institution in Washington, and the late Dr. Ernest Orlando Lawrence, inventor of the cyclotron which smashed the atom and ushered us into the age of nuclear power?

Badger Clark reminded us:

"That is the small town's latent power,
Some name upon its schoolroom page,
The future hero of the hour,
The future glory of an age.
'Twas always so; 'twill always be—
Small town, the great folks' starting place
A small-town boy in Galilee
Rerouted all the human race."

Close to this is our belief that in America, good citizenship requires minds capable of exercising the powers and responsibilities of self-government. There are values, to be sure, in taking public opinion polls—but woe to America if we ever permit our laws to be made solely upon the basis of the latest percentages. As someone has said, it's a good thing for us that the signers of the Declaration of Independence did not wait for a Gallup poll.

LET THE MIND BE FREE

If our schools are to perform the function the State needs, we will not demand conformity. We will let teachers maintain a certain amount of objectivity, independence, "academic freedom" if you will. We will expect even legislators to think for themselves once in a while.

Our own State of South Dakota is entering into a new day. Our preconstruction forecasts of the effect of the great dams on the Missouri River may be modified—greater interest in recreational opportunities than expected; slow progress in utilization of water for irrigation; insistent growth demands for hydroelectric power; but withal, a faster rate of population growth. More and more of our young people should find opportunities in their home State.

If we provide them with true educational opportunities, we shall expect not servile minds, trained to parrot self-serving doctrines of an all-powerful government, but persons with all the rights and strengths of human dignity.

Ann Mundelein, of Sioux Falls, in Pasque Petals, put it so plainly in these lines:

"Oh, Chinese mother sitting by the roadside beside your child,
What does the future hold for him?
Will he be taught the wisdom of Laotze or of Confucius?
And the proverbs of the Sages?
Will he learn great poetry—'The Lure of Jade' and 'The Gray Bird Flying'?
Will he take his place as head of the family
To become a Venerable Ancestor?
Or—will he be only a tool in the fist of the State?"

The third goal of education—this education for which we are to provide adequate funds—should be to provide society at large with leadership in the constructive use of the knowledge which the educational system develops.

A simple example would be to say that we should produce men and women who will show the world an increasing number of ways to use nuclear power for peace rather than for war. President Eisenhower has well said that "Peace is the paramount goal of our times."

WORLD'S PEOPLE WANT PEACE

It has been my privilege to attend meetings of the Interparliamentary Union as a delegate from the U.S. Senate. There, wistfully, almost despairingly, the smaller nations of the world appeal to those from the great powers to assure them that there will be no nuclear war. They know that radiation unloosed in such a conflict would engulf them.

On the 1st day of September last, I spoke to the general assembly of the Union meeting in the chambers of the Sejm, the name of Poland's parliamentary body. That was in Warsaw, destroyed over 80 percent in the last war but now remarkably rebuilt. That was the 20th anniversary of the day that Hitler invaded Poland and sent bombers over Warsaw.

I joined other speakers in praising the valor of the Poles and their efforts in reconstruction. I reminded them that people in other countries, in the large countries, also wanted peace. I assured them that people in my country did not relish the high taxes from every dollar of which over 60 cents go into maintaining the weapons of security.

Our President, with other international leaders, has called for reduction of armaments, but the arms race is the result of aggression from without and subversion from within. Tension comes from threats to freedom; mere promises of arms reduction are not sufficient; there must be agreement upon controls respecting nuclear tests, placement of weapons and deployment of troops; and finally, there must be the machinery to carry out the agreements.

Educators along with legislators and leaders of thought in all walks of life have a responsibility to help produce the climate of opinion and to turn out the mechanics by which the people on this planet can live in peace.

What would be your attitude, if you were an Asiatic and you had seen a great power unleash an atomic blast over Hiroshima that had burned and buried thousands of people who were noncombatants and of all ages, men, women, and children? And what would have been your reaction as an Asiatic if we had saturated the eastern provinces of China with the modern-day counterpart of the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombs in an effort to immobilize Red China's effort to recover Quemoy by force?

We have stated we would not start a war, that someone else would have to be the aggressor, but a great many strategists argue we should not wait if the opposition seems poised to strike. That is not the position of General Norstad, commander of the NATO forces, but some others hold it.

WE CAN DO MORE

By the student and teacher exchanges with which you are familiar a great deal has been done; more needs to be done. By cultural and spiritual exchanges more can be done.

I have seen devout worshippers in the churches of Poland, the most Catholic country in Europe. I have seen people standing in the rain out on to the sidewalk for half a block away to get into one of three two-hour services in a Baptist church in Moscow; I saw two Catholic churches filled there, one crowded for standing room where a Polish priest administered sacraments.

People, people, human beings, deep in their hearts have a spiritual longing in every country. The barriers of race and language can be overcome if the desire is great enough and if the task of understanding is undertaken as a mutual problem and recognition is ready when mutual effort is given.

So, as partners in these matters, let us provide the means whereby education may do its task in our day.

Let us provide the child with the fundamentals of knowledge and a mind that knows how to work for the good of mankind.

Let us understand that the object of education is not to produce slaves of the state, but citizens with free, creative minds, able, and alert for self-government.

Let us provide a society with the leadership it rightly expects in solving the great problem of our day—finding the way in which peoples and nations can live on this planet in peace and moving to new heights of mental, moral, and cultural development.

When Alfred Tennyson dipped his pen into the future for his immortal Locksley Hall, he saw "men the workers, ever reaping something new; that which they have done but earnest of the things they shall do."

New Starts, U.S.A

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES C. OLIVER

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 19, 1960

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following statement which I was privileged to make before the Electric Consumers Information Committee on January 18, 1960, at the Willard Hotel in Washington:

NEW STARTS, U.S.A.

(Remarks by Hon. JAMES C. OLIVER, of Maine, at the ECIC Legislative Workshop in Washington, D.C., on January 18, 1960)

Ladies and gentlemen, we meet here today to discuss one of the most vital problems which confront the American people and, in effect, that could mean, as well, the people of the entire free world, because of the international leadership which has been thrust upon us since the end of World War II.

I refer, of course, to the issue of so-called new starts in the progressive and aggressive developments of the natural resources of America. At least, in my opinion, the effect of availing ourselves or not availing ourselves, both as people of America, and as people of the world, of the maximum benefits which can, and will flow from such development of our real wealth, namely, the natural resources of our earth and its usable environment can mean the difference whether we survive, both physically and economically. Therefore, to me, the issue of new starts goes far beyond the immediate scope of the specific projects which may be in our minds for fiscal years, 1961, or thereafter.

Naturally, every one of us is concerned as to the fate of specific projects which have great importance for our States and our regional areas. This, of course, is as it should be. But, when I think of the dedication of such great Americans as Senator George W. Norris, and his vision of multipurpose development of the great major river basins of this Nation, together, with the unselfish and never-deviating determination which he applied over the years; then, it is, that I am forced to lift my thinking from the trees of individual projects to the forest of the basic significance of full exploitation of the great unharnessed potential of the natural resources of America and of the world.

Mr. Chairman, unless we get bold, courageous, and creative imaginative leadership in our Government in the elections of this year, the new starts, so vital to America and the world are doomed. We can no longer gamble that time is running in our favor as we realize the potency of the drive and the determination of the Soviet-Sino bloc. My distinguished colleagues, here today, have a far better understanding than I, in this regard. My friend and leader from Maine, our former Governor and now Senator, able ED MUSKIE, for whom Maine people have a most abiding and sincere affection and the utmost respect, has already given our folks his impressions of the dedicated drive and purpose of the Soviet leadership and the Soviet people to unceasing efforts to develop all of their natural resources.

The Soviets and the Chinese know nothing and want to know nothing of the issue of new starts. They never stop. Our policy of stop and go, of the turning off and on of the spigot of needed public projects is a luxury that we might conceivably have afforded in the past, but, not today as we face up in this last half of the 20th century to the life and death challenge of those who would bury us.

However, I appreciate that this gathering of leaders and members of organizations, who have been devoted for years to the philosophy and crusading spirit of statesmen of the stature of George Norris, does not need any words from me to renew their faith or to stimulate their already aggressive attitudes to get this job done.

As I see it, the job which must be done is to persuade the American people that we can no longer rest upon our gains of the past. This means that we must move forward with progressive action. In science, and technology, we do not hesitate. We know that we must have basic research, and from the ideas gleaned from such research we have no hesitancy in applying these ideas to our industrial operations. Without this sort of pioneering, we would soon be bankrupt. Conservatism, to the point of ignoring our needs, and of sweeping under the rug, our obvious problems is nothing but radicalism of the most dangerous type. It means ruin. These next 40 years of the 20th century will continue to find us in such competition as we have never known before. Being afraid or reluctant to reach for unorthodox answers to unorthodox problems is not Americanism or the American way. Call it smugness, complacency, or what you will. It adds up to defeatism—defeatism which must result in bankruptcy and ruin.

But, my friends, this has been the policy of this administration. It has called itself progressive; but, it has failed to meet the needs of the people; and, consequently, it has been regressive. It has failed to measure up to the challenge. It has placed dollars above needs. It has subordinated the dignity of people to an idolatry of dollars. It has paid obeisance to stability, and, in some areas, even stagnation when we should have been surging ahead with new life, growth and expansion.

Under these condition, it is only natural that we should have the policy of no new starts. It is only natural that we should be handicapped with the tight-money policy and the unconscionable increase in the interest rate structure which is strangling us with accumulative usurious results. This has been done in the name of anti-inflationism. We are told that there is scarcity of credit and money. Money should only be thought of, in my opinion, as a reflection of our economic activity. When the administration decides to get off its knees where it has been paying tribute to the golden calf of dollars, and decides to expand the credit supply of this Nation; then, and then only, will we get the new starts which are so essential to our survival.

The money supply today is less in terms of the gross national product than it was 7 years ago. For example, per $1,000 of gross national product in 1953 there was $345 of money supply. In 1959, per $1,000 of gross national product, there was $295 of money supply. Expansion and growth through new starts just cannot survive in this contracting environment. We are told that there is not enough money to meet the demands. Yet, the Federal Reserve Board of Governors, which control the money supply, refuse to take those measures which would expand the money supply. Again, we are told that this would be inflationary. Yet, the scarcity of money, we are told, increases the rental rate of dollars, namely, the interest rates. This, in turn, is one of the most inflationary factors that is feeding the fire of inflation. If the interest rate of 5 percent is increased by one-half of 1 percent, this represents, in my arithmetic, to a 10 percent administered price increase, which is felt in the homes and business activities of every nook and cranny of this great Nation. Such increases strangle new starts on the public projects which are the lifeblood of this Nation.

Tight money, increasing interest rates, and unwillingness of the administration leaders to face the facts of the needs of a growing Nation and the threat of the Soviet-Sino challenge are the basic factors which will cause this administration to be recorded in history as the leadership which did not lead and which threatened to cause America to lose its opportunity to remain as the world's leader for centuries to come.

But, this can be changed. It can be changed if this session of the 86th Congress refuses to lift the 4½ percent ceiling on interest rate of long term bonds. At least, this must not be done until fiscal and monetary reforms are realized. To lift this ceiling, otherwise, will mean that a green light will be given to that school of thought which believes that money is a commodity rather than a medium of exchange; which believes that we can be prosperous and healthy without a restricted cost of money; that 7 percent money is not inconceivable in a healthy economy; that our taxpayers can meet an ever-increasing debt service charge on our public debt; that we can afford the continued strangulation of new starts in our program of public projects; that, in short, we can continue a policy of the rich getting richer and the poor getting poorer.

It is my feeling that we can do something about these dangerous policies. This session of Congress can refuse to lift the interest ceiling. It can direct the Fed to support all types of Government securities. It can direct the Fed to use its power to increase reserve requirements of member banks whenever necessary. In short, it can establish the same policy that was used to finance the war.

In other words, it can expand the money supply in terms of the needs of the people of this country. But, to be practical, it will probably do none of these things and America will be forced to wait until the next administration takes over to face up to the urgent needs of an economy which is all ready to go but which is being held in check by those who prefer to sit on the powder keg of conservative and orthodox policies which are not meeting, and will not meet, the unorthodox conditions which confront us.

Meanwhile, those of us in Maine who are first and always for a policy of action, rather than inaction and reaction; those of us who have supported and will always support "new starts"; those of us who know that America must process into use those natural resources which are its real wealth; and those of us who believe that dollars and credit are only mechanisms to make the economy grow rather than being a cushion upon which to sit call your attention to our "new start"; namely, the Passamaquoddy-St. John Power project, located in the international waters of Canada and the United States. We urgently solicit your wholehearted and active support of our efforts to realize this start and the completion of this project which can be the beginning of the great northeastern power grid, envisioned by that devoted crusader in power development, Leland Olds, who has already contributed in a substantial way to our cause.

In closing, let me say that it was been a real pleasure to have been invited to be with you in your deliberations. I assure you that the programs of your organizations, devoted to the best interests of the electric power consumers of America, always have had and always will have my enthusiastic and complete support. You are doing a great job and you deserve all possible support for the great battles which so obviously lie ahead.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1960

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God, in the silence of whose presence the clamor of the outer world dies away, help us to come to this new day, not with hearts clouded by past failures and regrets, but with freshness of mind and with the light of undimmed wonder and of great expectations in our eyes.

All about us are the hard and harsh sounds of discordant voices. Forgive us if we seem to listen too much to those that speak the loudest.

Give us to know that it is the still, small voice that speaks of destiny and of eternal values, not seen or sensed by those who falsely assume that man can live by bread alone. In all our striving, keep our eyes on the verdict of history—that a world built on purely secular levels would be a world that would fester and spoil and corrupt.

Fit us to lead our common humanity, which so largely has lost its way, back to the springs of life and refreshment which alone can restore the souls and bodies of our despairing race. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 19, 1960, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

THE ECONOMIC REPORT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 258)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Joint Economic Committee.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
January 20, 1960.

To the Congress of the United States:

I present herewith my Economic Report, as required by section 3(a) of the Employment Act of 1946.

The report was prepared with the advice and assistance of the Council of Economic Advisers and of the heads of the executive departments and independent agencies directly concerned with the matters it discusses. It summarizes the economic developments of the year and the steps taken in major areas of economic policy to promote the sound expansion of employment, production, and income. It also puts forward a program for the year 1960 which, in the context of present and prospective economic conditions, would effectively implement the purposes of the Employment Act.

The major conclusions and recommendations of the report are set forth below, in part in the words of the report itself.

By the first quarter of 1959, the recovery that started early in 1958 had already carried production and income to levels higher than ever before attained in the American economy. A considerable further advance was scored during the remainder of 1959, despite the deep effect of the 116-day strike in the steel industry.

The Nation's output of goods and services in the fourth quarter of 1959 was at an annual rate of $482 billion. When adjusted for price changes, this rate of output was 3½ percent higher than the rate attained in the corresponding period in 1958. By December 1959, total employment had reached a record level, 66.2 million, on a seasonally adjusted basis. And personal income payments in December were at an annual rate of $391 billion, $24 billion greater than a year earlier. After adjustment for increases in prices, the rise in total personal income in 1959 represented a gain of nearly 5 percent in the real buying power of our Nation.

As we look ahead, there are good grounds for confidence that this economic advance can be extended through 1960. Furthermore, with appropriate private actions and public policies, it can carry well beyond the present year.

However, as always in periods of rapid economic expansion, we must avoid speculative excesses and actions that would compress gains into so short a period that the rate of growth could not be sustained. We must seek, through both private actions and public policies, to minimize and contain inflationary pressures that could undermine the basis for a high, continuing rate of growth.

Three elements stand out in the Government's program for realizing the objectives of high production, employment, and income set forth in the Employment Act: first, favorable action by the Congress on the recommendations for appropriations and for measures affecting Federal revenues presented in the budget for the fiscal year 1961; second, use of the resulting surplus, now estimated at $4.2 billion, to retire Federal debt; third, action by the Congress to remove the interest rate limitation that currently inhibits the noninflationary management of the Federal debt. Numerous additional proposals, many of which are described in chapter 4 of the Economic Report, will be made to supplement the Federal Government's existing economic and financial programs.

Following the budget balance now in prospect for the fiscal year 1960, these three elements of the 1960 program will strengthen and be strengthened by the essential contributions to sustainable economic growth made through the policies of the independent Federal Reserve System. Fiscal and monetary policies, which are powerful instruments for preventing the development of inflationary pressures, can effectively reinforce one another.

But these Government policies must be supplemented by appropriate private actions, especially with respect to profits and wages. In our system of free competitive enterprise and shared responsibility, we do not rely on Government alone for the achievement of inflation-free economic growth. On the contrary, that achievement requires a blending of suitable private actions and public policies. Our success in realizing the opportunities that lie ahead will therefore depend in large part upon the ways in which business management, labor leaders, and consumers perform their own economic functions.

A well-informed and vigilant public opinion is essential in our free society for helping achieve the conditions necessary for price stability and vigorous economic growth. Such public opinion can be an effective safeguard against attempts arbitrarily to establish prices or wages at levels that are inconsistent with the general welfare. Informed public opinion is also necessary to support the laws and regulations that provide the framework for the conduct of our economic affairs.

Further progress is needed in establishing a broad public understanding of the relationships of productivity and rewards to costs and prices. It would be a grave mistake to believe that we can successfully substitute legislation or controls for such understanding. Indeed, the complex relationships involved cannot be fixed by law, and attempts to determine them by restrictive governmental action would jeopardize our freedoms and other conditions essential to sound economic growth.

Our system of free institutions and shared responsibility has served us well in achieving economic growth and improvement. From our past experience, we are confident that our changing and increasing needs in the future can be met within this flexible system, which gains strength from the incentive it provides for individuals, from the scope it affords for individual initiative and action, and from the assurance it gives that Government remains responsive to the will of the people.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3610) to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act to increase grants for construction of sewage treatment works, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. BLATNIK, Mr. FALLON, Mr. JONES of Alabama, Mr. MACK of Washington, and Mr. CRAMER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

COMMITTEE MEETING DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Rules and Administration was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour; and I ask unanimous consent that the statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY OF INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT EISENHOWER AND VICE PRESIDENT NIXON

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, today marks the seventh anniversary of the inauguration of Dwight D. Eisenhower as President of the United States, and also marks the seventh anniversary of the induction of the distinguished Vice President as the Presiding Officer of this body.

Mr. President, that was a great day in American destiny. I have often said that, in my judgment, there is a quiet, brooding destiny that looks after the affairs of men and nations. I have puzzled hundreds of times about how one could account for the fact that Abraham Lincoln came on the American scene when he did and made his exit when he did, if it were not the unfolding of a divine pattern of history.

I feel that way, too, Mr. President, about the distinguished occupant of the White House, President Dwight D. Eisenhower. First of all, he came at a time when I think a sort of spurious liberalism existed in the country; and when I describe it as "spurious," I mean a degradation of the word "liberal" and its meaning, because, as any student knows, the very word "liberal" is derived from the Latin word "liber," meaning free. So the word "liberalism" pertains to freedom. But the amazing kind of liberalism that was growing in the country at that time was interpreted in terms of deeper intrusion of government and government control.

So, Mr. President, at that period, our distinguished President, Dwight D. Eisenhower, and you, sir, came into the national picture and reversed the course, and, I believe, set America on better ground.

Second, I would say that what the country needed at that time was the impress of warm and wholesome personalities. Those came like a tonic to our country 7 years ago today. I feel that thereby the country was deeply enriched and deeply inspired.

Mr. President, our distinguished President, and you, sir, came at a time when solvency was becoming little more than a word in the dictionary; somehow it had lost its meaning and had lost its vitality. But we gave it meaning, because of its importance to the perpetuity of free institutions and the assurance that in solvency America will not go down the disastrous road which, within our generation, has caused the foundering of so many countries.

I think the same can be said about our peace and security. President Eisenhower came at a time when young men of our country were still yielding their blood in the valleys and on the slopes of Korea. But all that has been stopped; and I can think of no greater boast, Mr. President, than that in this 7-year period no young men of America have left their lifeblood on some foreign battlefield. Mr. President, if we had nothing else of which to boast, that fact in itself would be justification for the victory we won, and further justification for the victories I envision ahead.

I believe that President Eisenhower, and you, sir, came at a time when a peculiar and clammy cynicism was beginning to fasten its tentacles upon the thinking and the feeling of America.

I know there are liberals who find rare amusement when one talks about history as being the unfolding of some kind of divine pattern with the dignity of man at its very core. Perhaps they find amusement in it; and if they can, that will be all right with me.

But President Eisenhower, with his big heart, his big soul, and his warm personality, has, in my judgment, driven back the frostline of cynicism in this country, and has developed an entirely wholesome temper.

Mr. President, I must also say that I think you, sir, and the President of the United States came at a time when individual freedom was being impaired. Once it is impaired—whether in the economic field or in the political field—everything else remains nothing more than a hollow shell.

All these are the wholesome things that have come to America in the 7 years since we have assumed the authority and the responsibility of government.

Mr. President, I congratulate you, sir; and I congratulate the President of the United States. I am sure that on this day there will be a feeling of gratitude and thanksgiving in the hearts and minds of the American people for what has been wrought.

Mr. WILEY subsequently said: Mr. President, I was very much pleased this morning to hear the lovely remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Illinois not only in relation to you, but also in relation to the President of the United States. Some of us who were privileged to be present at the time of the inauguration have not been unmindful of what has happened in the intervening years, as we have seen you meet every experience and every challenge in a wonderful way. We have seen you grow in the confidence of the American people, as is evidenced by the polls, so that there cannot be any question, first, as to your nomination, and, next, as to your election. We are very happy to join with the Senator from Illinois in wishing you Godspeed and happy years for you and your wife ahead.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON CONSTRUCTION AT MILITARY INSTALLATIONS

A letter from the Secretary of Defense, transmitting, pursuant to law, a secret report on construction at military installations (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORT ON RESERVE FORCES

A letter from the Secretary of Defense, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the status of training of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces and the progress made in strengthening of the Reserve components, during the fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORT OF CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD

A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of that Board, for the fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPORT ON FLIGHT PAY, DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY

A letter from Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Personnel and Reserve Forces), reporting, pursuant to law, on the flight pay for that Department, for the 6-month period preceding January 1, 1960; to the Committee on Armed Services.

REASSIGNMENT OF CERTAIN OFFICERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY

A letter from the Deputy Secretary of Defense, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide for the reassignment of officers designated for aeronautical engineering duty, other than aerologists, to the unrestricted line of the Navy (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORT OF U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION

A letter from the Chairman, U.S. Tariff Commission, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of that Commission, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Finance.

REPORT OF FEDERAL AVIATION AGENCY

A letter from the Administrator, Federal Aviation Agency, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the operations of that Agency under the Federal Airport Act, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPORTS ON FINAL VALUATIONS OF CERTAIN PROPERTIES

A letter from the Chairman, Interstate Commerce Commission, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of final valuations of properties of certain carriers (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

TEMPORARY ADMISSION INTO THE UNITED STATES OF CERTAIN ALIENS

A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of orders entered granting temporary admission into the United States of certain aliens (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT OF BOARD OF ACTUARIES OF CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT SYSTEM

A letter from the Chairman, U.S. Civil Service Commission, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the Board of Actuaries of the civil service retirement system, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

The petition of the Free World Committee, Chicago, Ill., signed by Thomas Hugh Latimer, executive vice president, relating to the assassination of Paul Bang-Jensen; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RESOLUTIONS OF OREGON DIVISION OF IZAAK WALTON LEAGUE OF AMERICA

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the 37th annual convention of the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America and the 5th annual conference of the Young Outdoor Oregonians were held recently in Eugene, Oreg.

The convention adopted a number of resolutions which pertain directly to Federal legislation. These resolutions include recommendations dealing with access to public lands, deer loss in irrigation canals, river development, fish research, and water pollution. All the subjects of the resolutions are of vital concern to citizens of the Northwest.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that those convention resolutions relating to Federal legislation be printed at this point in the RECORD, for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT 1950 CONVENTION, OREGON DIVISION, IZAAK WALTON LEAGUE OF AMERICA, EUGENE, OREG., NOVEMBER 28, 1959

RESOLUTION 1. DEER TRAP ON IRRIGATION CANAL

Whereas in the Talent division irrigation project in Oregon, of the Reclamation Bureau, there is a delivery canal consisting of about 17½ miles of trapezoid type and vertical walls, which runs across the area used by the Green Springs black-tailed deer herd; and

Whereas said herd is one of the largest migratory black-tailed deer herds in the West, and said canal cuts straight across the migration route of said deer herd; and

Whereas ramps and slab crossings have been provided at certain places along said canal, but the same generally are ineffective to provide a means of escape for the deer that get into said canal, and such would be true regardless of the number of said ramps and slab crossings provided; and

Whereas a known minimum of 75 deer have been trapped in a 19-mile section of open concrete ditch between Howard Prairie Reservoir and Keene Creek Reservoir during the first month of operation of the project; and

Whereas it is impossible for any fawn to escape from said canal after getting into it; and

Whereas the deer losses caused by said canal will decimate said herd if corrective measures are not taken; and

Whereas a slab covering of said canal or a deer-proof fence with bridges at proper places would eliminate said losses and also any loss of human life and domestic animals: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America in convention assembled at Eugene, Oreg., this 28th day of November 1959, That the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation immediately construct improvements that will prevent the loss of human and animal life in Talent project ditches, and until such time as these structures are completed, to drain the ditches or operate the same at levels which will allow animals to escape.

RESOLUTION 2. ROGUE RIVER BASIN STUDY

Whereas the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America is in favor of a dam on the main stem of the Rogue River at the Lost Creek site or above, provided it is constructed and operated so as to be beneficial to anadromous fish resources, wildlife, and recreation as well as flood control; and

Whereas the most important flood control project is a dam at Lost Creek site and the same is unacceptable to the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service under the proposed operating plan, because of possible damaging effects to the fishery that might result in total loss of the fish runs which have a substantial value to the State of Oregon; and

Whereas an Army Engineers' representative states that they have "substantially completed studies for a plan of development" of the basin but have no funds available for an expanded study to include provisions for possibe fishery benefits on Rogue River; and

Whereas a representative of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service states that water temperratures of the lower Rogue River already are critical and that it is possible that the present plan for Lost Creek Dam would further aggravate the problem and that their service is now making a complete temperature study of Rogue River to determine optimum flow and temperature necessary to enhance anadromous fish life in the Rogue; and

Whereas the present study of the Rogue River is incomplete in that it does not take the needs of anadromous fish resources into full account; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America, assembled in convention at Eugene, Oreg., this 28th day of November 1959, That the Congress of the United States be requested to provide more time and funds for further study of the Rogue River and tributaries by the Army Engineers, so as to secure an acceptable project on the main stem of the Rogue River at Lost Creek or above that would benefit the anadromous fish resources, wildlife, and recreation; and be it further

Resolved, That until positive assurance can be provided that these benefits will be an integral part of such project the Oregon division stands unalterably opposed to any structure as located and outlined above; and be it further

Resolved, That the congressional delegation from Oregon be urged to work toward this end.

RESOLUTION 5. PUBLIC LAND ACCESS

Whereas the increasing public demand for outdoor recreation is resulting in crowding of available recreational areas and straining the tolerance of some private landowners; and

Whereas the recreational potentials of the 32 million acres of Federal land in Oregon are not being fully utilized for want of an adequate public access to those lands; and

Whereas rights-of-way and access roads are necessary for the proper management and utilization of Federal lands: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League urges the U.S. Congress to appropriate funds for the development of an adequate public road system to serve all major blocks of Federal land in Oregon.

RESOLUTION 6. PUBLIC LAND ADMINISTRATION

Whereas the public lands and resources administered by the U.S. Bureau of Land Management require greater protection and more intensive development than that Bureau has been equipped to provide; and

Whereas support of the Izaak Walton League for a more aggressive land management program has produced some constructive results during 1959: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League continues to urge the Department of the Interior and the U.S. Congress to strengthen the regulatory authority of the U.S. Bureau of Land Management and provide the appropriations necessary for multiple-use development and management of lands and resources administered by that agency.

The Oregon division further renews confidence in the principles set forth in the public lands resolution adopted in March 1959 and subsequently adopted by the National Izaak Walton League of America.

RESOLUTION 7. FISH RESEARCH

Whereas the anadromous salmon and steelhead trout of the Columbia River are of great economic and esthetic value as sport and commercial fish; and

Whereas the continued production of these fish, particularly the long-run races, is dependent upon the maintenance of natural spawning grounds in the watershed and of migration routes to them; and

Whereas Columbia basin development plans contain proposals for high dams across these migration routes below the few remaining spawning grounds; and

Whereas acquisition of knowledge and skills necessary to provide and maintain adequate passages past such structures has not kept pace with the planning and design of the dams; and

Whereas research is necessary to obtain this knowledge, vital to maintenance of this renewable natural resource; and

Whereas this Columbia River salmon and steelhead resource is of national significance: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Izaak Walton League of America, That the the U.S. Government make $1 million per year available for research into ways and means of maintaining anadromous fish in the face of the major structures proposed for construction below their spawning grounds.

RESOLUTION 8. PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR WATERSHED MANAGEMENT RESEARCH IN OREGON

Whereas our national progress and economic security are vitally dependent upon adequate supplies of usable water; and

Whereas wise use of water-source areas is dependent upon principles of water shed management involving integration of water production with recreational uses, growing and harvesting of timber, and grazing of domestic stock and game animals; and

Whereas deteriorating watershed conditions in the State of Oregon have led to many forms of damage to economic and esthetic values, including flooding, sedimentation of stream channels, and destruction of fish habitat; and

Whereas techniques of sound watershed management have not been developed because of insufficient research, particularly in the Pacific Northwest: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League—

(a) Promote an expanded program of research on forest and range watershed lands.

(b) Advise members of Oregon's congressional delegation of the need for these investigations and encourage support of increased funds for upstream watershed research by the Forest Service in Oregon; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of Agriculture, the Chief of the U.S. Forest Service, chairman of the Subcommittee on Interior and Related Agencies of the House Committee on Appropriations, and to Members of the Oregon congressional delegation.

RESOLUTION 10. DEVELOPMENT OF THE DESCHUTES RIVER

Whereas the Deschutes River now is one of the outstanding fishing streams of the United States and is noted for its recreational offerings; and

Whereas the stream provides water for irrigation and hydro power; and

Whereas there is an increased demand on its water for all uses; and

Whereas in the past its development has been on a fragmentary, bit by bit, often single use, basis without any plan that gives consideration to all beneficial uses: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America, assembled in Eugene, Oreg., this 28th day of November, 1959:

(a) Requests the Forest Service to make a study and adopt a program of use of its lands contiguous to the Deschutes River and its tributaries, giving consideration to the multiple use concept, taking into consideration the needs of the people of Oregon and of the United States for outdoor recreation.

(b) Requests the Bureau of Land Management to make a like study.

(c) Requests the committee on natural resources to develop a plan of recreation use and development for the entire Deschutes River Basin, which will coordinate the plans of the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management, the State lands including State parks, and private lands, and hydroelectric developments.

(d) Requests the Portland General Electric Co., which public utility now operates a hydro project on the Deschutes River known as Pelton, which company desires to build another dam immediately upstream from Pelton, where it has indicated that it will provide substantial recreational opportunities as well as replace the Cove State Park, which Round Butte would inundate, to contribute the sum of $25,000 or more if necessary to the State of Oregon to be used under the direction of the committee on natural resources to hire a recognized, trained, experienced recreationist to act as director for the committee in developing a coordinated recreational plan for the Deschutes River Basin.

(e) Requests the Oregon Water Resources Board to accelerate their announced intention of making a study of the Deschutes River and to adopt a program for the use and control of the Deschutes River Basin, which will give consideration to all beneficial uses including the use of the water for recreation, fish, and wildlife as well as for irrigation, hydro power, pollution abatement, domestic, municipal, and industrial uses.

(f) Request the Fish and Game Commission to develop a plan that would provide the least possible damage to anadromous fish runs and to other game fish in the event the Federal Power Commission should license the construction of Round Butte or any other dam on the Deschutes River and that such plan be presented to Federal Power Commission to be made a part of the license.

(g) Request the State of Oregon to intervene in the application of Portland General Electric Co. to the Federal Power Commission to urge that body to conform to the program for use and control of the Deschutes River as may be adopted by the Oregon Water Resources Board and in the event that the program permits the use of the water in the Round Butte section, that the license, should one be issued by the Federal Power Commission, adopt the plan for fish adopted by Oregon Fish and Game Commissions, and include a recognition of the recreation plan for the use of the river basin to be developed by the State of Oregon through its committee on natural resources and the recreational and land use plans to be developed by the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management.

(h) The Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America reiterates its historic stand against the licensing of any single purpose dams or obstructions of any kind in the Deschutes River until the conditions outlined herein are met. It is the firm conviction of this organization that the best use of this river is for fishing and recreation and uses compatible therewith and that this river should not have been and should not be further committed to hydropower uses.

RESOLUTION 11. PUBLIC LANDS EXCHANGE

Whereas problems of access to public lands are in many instances aggravated by the existence of isolated public land parcels that are entirely or largely surrounded by private lands; and

Whereas comprehensive study has been given to this problem by organizations and agencies concerned; and

Whereas several solutions have been proposed to ease the problems created by the so-called isolated public land parcels, said solutions including, reblocking, through the system of land exchange, condemnations and purchase of easements, and exchange of use; and

Whereas the system of exchange of use, providing the tenancy be on a stable basis comparable to 10-year Bureau of Land Management leases, appears to be the most feasible and expeditious: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America go on record in favor of the concept, under proper controls, when applicable to the exchange of use idea.

RESOLUTION 13. AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT, THE BLATNIK BILL, H.R. 3610

Whereas the Izaak Walton League of America has already gone on record in support of this bill; and

Whereas action on this bill was not completed at the last session of Congress; and

Whereas Congressman BLATNIK, of Minnesota, is to be highly commended for his inspired leadership and zeal in support of this legislation; and

Whereas Governor Hatfield has gone on record in support of this bill based on the excellent record of the program of Federal grants to municipalities for sewage works in Oregon, particularly, and for the critical need to continue this activity: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America in convention assembled at Eugene, Oreg., November 28, 1959, That action be taken by the Oregon division and by the national to support the Blatnik bill, H.R. 3610, which calls for amendment to the Federal Pollution Control Act, the primary purpose of which is to increase the amount of grants to municipalities to further encourage them to construct sewage treatment works.

RESOLUTION 14. FEDERAL WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT, PUBLIC LAW 660, EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS OF SECTION 5, GRANTS TO STATE WATER POLLUTION CONTROL AGENCIES

Whereas this provision authorizes $3 million each year as grants on a matching basis to the State water pollution control agencies to support their technical investigations, enforcement, education, and other activities; and

Whereas these funds have proved to be an incentive to the development and improvement of water pollution control activities in the States; and

Whereas the provisions of this section of the act are due to expire June 30, 1961; and

Whereas cessation of these grants would result in serious impairment of State water pollution control programs and of Federal-State cooperative activities in water pollution control enforcement actions: Now therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America in convention assembled at Eugene, Oreg., November 28, 1959, That action be taken by the Oregon division and by the national in support of the Federal Pollution Control Act, Public Law 660, section 5, providing for extending the authorization of $3 million each year as grants on a matching basis to State water pollution control agencies so as to enable these States to continue at an accelerated rate, their technical investigations. enforcement, actions, education, and other activities in the control of water pollution.

RESOLUTION 15. NEED FOR EXPANDED RESEARCH PROGRAM IN WATER POLLUTION CONTROL

Whereas major technical breakthroughs to provide better methods of treating industrial and municipal waste are urgently needed if the quality of our water resources is to be maintained for legitimate uses including public health and fish and aquatic life; and

Whereas the speed and accuracy with which we solve these problems depend solely upon new knowledge from research; and

Whereas Public Law 660, the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, provides under section 4 for the Public Health Service to conduct research through the Robert A. Taft Sanitary Engineering Center in Cincinnati, through grants-in-aid to public and private agencies, through contract research, and through consulting service of experts, and research fellowships; and

Whereas despite these various research efforts the need for new knowledge is still noticeably outstripping the acquisition of such knowledge: Now therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America in convention assembled at Eugene, Oreg., November 28, 1959, That action be taken by the Oregon division and by the national to call for increased appropriations for the Public Health Service to implement section 4 of Public Law 660. This will provide for expansion of research not only by that service directly through the Robert A. Taft Sanitary Engineering Center, but will also make possible expansion of research facilities at educational institutions and other organizations. Rapid expansion of research in this critical field of water pollution control is urgently needed to keep abreast of our rapidly growing population and industry and changing patterns of water use.

RESOLUTION 16. PROVISION OF LOW FLOW AUGMENTATION IN FEDERAL WATER RESOURCE CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

Whereas important advances have been made in water resources policy in recent years as a result of congressional action; and

Whereas an important addition, which would supplement and make more valuable these advances as well as give support to the water resource development programs of the States and the Federal Government, would be the ability to use Federal water development projects to increase the flow in streams, particularly during periods of low flow; and

Whereas adding this as an authorized function in Federal projects would make it possible to develop the full potential of reservoir sites, and bring about a general improvement in the quality of waters under regulation; and

Whereas this addition is particularly important to fish and wildlife and other aquatic life, to municipal and industrial water supplies, the protection of public health, and the recreational use of waters; and

Whereas the benefits from low flow augmentation are general, widespread, and nonspecific; and

Whereas the Fish and Wildlife Service Coordination Act of 1946, amended in 1958, authorizes the Fish and Wildlife Service to undertake similar responsibilities with respect to fish and wildlife; and

Whereas the resolution suggested herein should supplement the Fish and Wildlife Service program by considering all other aspects benefited by flow augmentation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America is convention assembled at Eugene, Oreg., November 28, 1959, That action be taken by the Oregon division and by the national to support legislation:

(a) Granting general authority to the Federal water resource construction agencies to include the provision of low flow augmentation as an authorized function in planning future water development projects, in modification of existing projects, or in adjustment of operations of existing projects in order to achieve the described benefits.

(b) Granting authority noted in (a) above as a nonreimbursable item in Federal water resource development projects;

(c) Granting the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare through the Public Health Service authorization to cooperate with the Federal water resource construction agencies in the development of low flow augmentation programs since the net effect of these programs is to control and improve water quality; and further that the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare be required to submit reports to the Congress to accompany Federal construction agency reports insofar as low flow augmentation programs are concerned;

(d) With the proviso that the above provisions be recommended only with the understanding that flow augmentation is not to be used for the abatement of water pollution in lieu of full and complete sewage and waste treatment facilities by city, industry, or others concerned.

RESOLUTION OF LODGE 459, INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a resolution in support of the Forand bill (H.R. 4700) as adopted by Lodge 459 of the International Association of Machinists in St. Paul, Minn., be inserted at this point in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved, That the members of Lodge No. 459, International Association of Machinists, representing 2,600 members, wholeheartedly support H.R. 4700, as sponsored by Representative FORAND; be it further

Resolved, That the elected Congressmen do all in the scope of their office in supporting this enabling legislation, whereby the retired Americans may have a burden lifted from their shoulders.

RESOLUTION OF INDUSTRIAL UNION OF MARINE AND SHIPBUILDING WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a resolution adopted by the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America in support of the proposal for a White Fleet of mercy ships (S. Con. Res. 66) be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 4. MERCY FLEET

In July of 1959, Congressmen EDMONDSON, of Oklahoma, and BATES, of Massachusetts, introduced into the House of Representatives, and Senators HUMPHREY and AIKEN introduced into the Senate, a concurrent resolution calling for the establishment of a Great White Fleet of mercy ships to carry American surplus food, medical aid and supplies, to disaster and distressed areas throughout the world.

This particular resolution was in response to suggestion by Oklahoma naval officer, Comdr. Frank A. Manson.

Since the time of the introduction of the concurrent resolution, Life magazine, in its July 27 issue, threw its full support behind the idea of a Great White Fleet as a "bold proposal for peace." Massive mail was received by the Congress urging establishment of this Fleet by every sponsor of the concurrent resolution from every State in the Union including Hawaii and Alaska. Less than 1 percent of the mail received was unfavorable to the proposal.

Over 20 percent of the House of Representatives and over one-third of the Senate are cosponsoring the resolution.

This bright concept for peace, it is true, will not bring peace to the world in a single sweeping movement. However, it can prevent the people of the world from losing hope. A Great White Fleet would come from our reserve fleet, crews would come from the Navy and the merchant marine, and the supplies from America's great abundant surplus.

It should be remembered that in 1907, President Theodore Roosevelt sent a similar Great White Fleet around the world, which had the mission of impressing American naval power upon the world. The present Great White Fleet would carry hope and health to areas of the world struck with poverty, disease, or starvation. They would carry supplies and equipment necessary to bring relief to people of all nations in times of emergency or disaster.

We are known as a people and as a nation for the fact that the helping hand of America is always extended to disaster areas. This Great White Fleet can quickly become an international symbol of American concern for the destitute everywhere.

Commander Manson's idea of using our reserve fleet for the purpose of waging an aggressive peace program; of bringing relief to disaster victims; of carrying emergency supplies and medical facilities into famine-stricken areas; and in general, of bringing the arts of healing into underdeveloped regions wherever emergency needs exist, is one of the most meritorious proposals for people-to-people effort of putting our ideals into action.

There can be no question of our ability to do this. We have the ships, we have the doctors, the money, and the commodities. The cost of putting the first six-unit fleet into operation and maintaining it for 18 months has been estimated at $30 million. This is but a small fraction of the amount we now spend for any one of a dozen luxuries. Certainly it represents only an infinitesimal amount when compared with the annual expenditure of the Nation's military armaments.

We now have over $6 billion worth of dairy products, cotton, and various staples and items of food piled up in our surplus-commodity warehouses.

The President already has the authority under existing law to divert shiploads of these commodities to areas where emergency relief is needed, regardless of the friendliness of the governments involved. Here, in the idea of the new White Fleet, is a magnificent opportunity to implement the American dream which was also the dream of the ancient prophets—of turning our swords into plowshares. What an immense appeal this program would have in the eyes of the uncommitted peoples around the world.

Certainly the world needs our help. Just as certainly, we need to give that help. Selfishness impoverishes those who practice it. Undisciplined self-indulgence degrades us as individuals and as people. Even if there were an impenetrable curtain drawn around us so that the rest of the world could not witness our prosperity, we would be poorer in not sharing. In holding on to our valuable commodities, we are just guarding these commodities from being used by other people. We are at the same time excluding ourselves from the valuable and necessary fellowship of the rest of the world. The world cannot indefinitely survive with the preponderant majority in poverty and the fortunate few enjoying prosperity: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the sixth national policy conference of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, AFL–CIO, go on record as supporting the institution of the mercy mission of the Great White Fleet, by reactivation of part of the mothball fleet to wage an aggressive peace program; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent the Senators and Congressmen who introduced the concurrent resolution on the Great White Fleet.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. HENNINGS, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, without amendment:

S. Con. Res. 80. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of additional copies of part 1 of the hearings on an inquiry into the satellite and missile programs;

S. Res. 207. Resolution to provide additional funds for the Official Reporters of the Senate;

S. Res. 211. Resolution to pay certain funeral expenses of the late Senator Langer, of North Dakota;

S. Res. 227. Resolution to print for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations copies of certain committee prints relating to development in military technology and foreign policy in Africa;

S. Res. 228. Resolution to print for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations copies of certain committee prints relating to foreign policy on Asia and Western Europe; and

S. Res. 229. Resolution to print for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations copies of certain committee prints relating to foreign policy.

FUNDS FOR STUDY OF INTER-AGENCY COORDINATION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Government Operations, I report an original resolution, which was approved by the Committee at its meeting on Monday, January 18, 1960. The resolution is for the purpose of authorizing funds for a study of interagency coordination, including completion of a study previously authorized by the Senate.

The committee proposes a review of problems of budgeting and accounting, efficiency and economy in certain significant activities shared by several Federal agencies in related fields. This type of review is, of course, especially appropriate to the standing jurisdiction of the Committee on Government Operations as designated under the Legislative Reorganization Law and the Rules of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 255) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Whereas pursuant to Senate Resolution 347, Eighty-fifth Congress and Senate Resolution 42, Eighty-sixth Congress, the Committee on Government Operations has been conducting a "complete study of any and all matters pertaining to the international activities of Federal executive branch departments and agencies relative to worldwide health matters"; and

Whereas the study indicates significant problems of coordination between (a) numerous agencies of the United States Government engaged in health activities, (b) agencies of the United States Government and international organizations of which the United States is a member, (c) official programs of the United States Government and related nonofficial programs of private voluntary organizations, in addition to problems of Federal budgeting and accounting; and

Whereas the study confirms the continued existence of certain problems of the interagency organization of common Federal activities such as documentation and other problem areas of management of the general type revealed in past studies by the Commission on the Organization of the Executive Branch of Government; and

Whereas pursuant to rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Committee on Government Operations has the duty of studying the operation of Government activities at all levels with a view to determining its economy and efficiency, and the further duty of studying intergovernmental relationships between the United States and international organizations of which the United States is a member: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Government Operations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to—

(a) complete its study of worldwide health research, assistance, and rehabilitation matters;

(b) to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters in scientific and other fields where there may be indications of a need for (a) improved budgeting, accounting, and other managerial practices on the part of agencies of the United States Government, (b) strengthened cooperation and coordination among Federal agencies;

(c) effectiveness of international organizations of which the United States is a member; and

(d) avoidance of Federal duplication of private responsibilities and activities.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from date of approval to January 31, 1961, inclusive, is authorized to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized at its discretion to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1961.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $85,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

REPORT ENTITLED "ADMINISTRATION OF U.S. FOREIGN AID PROGRAMS IN BOLIVIA" (S. REPT. NO. 1030)

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Government Operations, pursuant to Senate Resolution 43, 86th Congress, 1st session, I submit a report of its permanent Subcommittee on Investigations regarding the administration of the U.S. foreign aid program in Bolivia, which I ask may be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, in connection with this report, a press release which I have issued.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE PERMANENT SUBCOMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATIONS,
U.S. SENATE.

Senator JOHN L. McCLELLAN, Democrat, of Arkansas, chairman of the Senate permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, stated:

"Executive hearings were held by the Senate permanent Subcommittee on Investigations to evaluate the administration by the International Cooperation Administration (ICA) and its predecessors, of U.S. foreign aid programs in Bolivia since 1953, totaling an expenditure of $137 million.

"These hearings disclosed that, as a result of loose administration, an inadequate U.S. mission staff, difficulties in recruitment of personnel, and a dearth of administrative ability among Bolivian officials, heavy losses, in the neighborhood of several million dollars, were sustained in connection with the U.S. aid programs in Bolivia. For example, almost $2 million in food and fiber items were lost in the ports and in transit from 1954 to 1957. Many claims for such losses against insurance companies are statute barred, as they were not initiated within the prescribed period of time.

"Many projects were undertaken in that country without benefit of sufficient prior review by qualified technical personnel and, as a result, several projects were discontinued, some of which were beyond the absorptive capacity of Bolivia. The Villamontes irrigation project, which has been permanently halted, is unoperational and cost us over a million dollars. The Muyurina project, for vocational agricultural training, which cost us over $100,000, did not achieve its purpose and attempts are being made to use it for other purposes. The Cochabamba milk processing plant, which cost us $100,000, will never operate efficiently. Two yucca flour mills, financed by the U.S. Government at a cost of $225,000, will never be used.

"The agriculture servicio (a joint United States and Bolivian administrative and cooperative mechanism) failed to maintain adequate records until 1957 and, as a result, over a million dollars' worth of equipment cannot be accounted for. In addition, it imported machinery that was not needed and machinery that was not adaptable for use in that country. As a result, over a million dollars' worth of this excess machinery has already been sold at a loss. Attempts are now being made to dispose of $500,000 more and it is anticipated there will be losses on this amount.

"From 1954 to 1957, despite existing regulations, the Government failed to collect counterpart money from the Bolivian Government. There are still nearly $2 million owed, and some 18 distributors have become enriched while projects which needed this financing were impaired. It was quite apparent during the hearings that the former mission director in Bolivia from 1952 to March 1956 was unaware of the various shortcomings which were brought to light, although he should have been.

"Although one of the ICA mechanisms for ascertaining whether various aspects of a program are being operated efficiently is the end-use audit system, it was not until April of 1957 that end-use reports began in Bolivia. Since that time approximately 150 reports have been submitted, revealing many inadequacies which existed since 1953. Fortunately, during the past year, there has been a capable director in Bolivia who is taking positive action to correct many of the irregularities which formerly existed."

REPORT ENTITLED "CASE PROBLEMS IN GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT" (S. REPT. NO. 1031)

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], from the Select Committee on Small Business, I submit a report entitled "Case Problems in Government Procurement." I ask that the report, which includes a statement by the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from New Jersey.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MUNDT (for himself and Mr. CASE of South Dakota):

S. 2861. A bill to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to negotiate a new contract with the city of Sturgis, S. Dak., with respect to the use of the sewage facilities of such city by the Fort Meade Veterans' Hospital, Sturgis, S. Dak.; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. SYMINGTON:

S. 2862. A bill to provide a national food and fiber utilization policy; to provide for greater conservation of natural resources; to provide farmers a greater voice in the formulation and administration of farm programs; to provide for supply adjustment programs so as to return to farmers a fair share of the national income; to provide greater opportunity for economic development in rural agricultural areas; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See the remarks of Mr. SYMINGTON when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. BRIDGES:

S. 2863. A bill for the relief of Kyong-Ok Ahn; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey:

S. 2864. A bill to provide certain payments to assist in providing improved educational opportunities for children of migrant agricultural employees; and

S. 2865. A bill to provide grants for adult education for migrant agricultural employees; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(See the remarks of Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey when he introduced the above bills, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. KEATING:

S. 2866. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act so as to relax the severity of existing provisions with respect to deductions from benefits on account of earnings; to the Committee on Finance.

(See the remarks of Mr. KEATING when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MAGNUSON (by request):

S. 2867. A bill to give effect to the Convention between the United States of America and Cuba for the Conservation of Shrimp, signed at Habana, August 15, 1958; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

(See the remarks of Mr. MAGNUSON when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. JAVITS (for himself, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BUSH, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. CLARK, Mr. COOPER, Mr. HART, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. KEATING, Mr. LONG of Hawaii, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MOSS, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, and Mr. YOUNG of Ohio):

S. 2868. A bill to protect the right to vote in national elections by making unlawful the requirement that a poll tax be paid as a prerequisite to voting in such elections, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(See the remarks of Mr. JAVITS when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. LONG of Hawaii (for himself, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. FONG, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. GRUENING):

S. 2869. A bill to restore the size and weight limitations on fourth-class matter mailed to or from Alaska and Hawaii which existed prior to their admission as States; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

(See the remarks of Mr. LONG of Hawaii when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

S. 2870. A bill for the relief of Alfred O. Domeier, and Frances I. Domeier; and

S. 2871. A bill for the relief of Dr. Daryoush K. Shahrokh; to the Committee on the Judiciary

By Mr. SYMINGTON:

S. 2872. A bill for the relief of Ennis Craft McLaren; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RESOLUTION

FUNDS FOR STUDY OF INTERAGENCY COORDINATION

Mr. HUMPHREY, from the Committee on Government Operations, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 255) authorizing funds for a study of interagency coordination, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(See the above resolution printed in full when reported by Mr. HUMPHREY, which appears under the heading "Reports of Committees".)

NATIONAL FOOD AND FIBER UTILIZATION POLICY

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a farm bill to: First, provide a national food and fiber utilization policy; second, provide for greater conservation of natural resources; third, provide farmers a greater voice in the formulation and administration of farm programs; fourth, provide for supply adjustment programs so as to return to farmers a fair share of the national income; and fifth, provide greater opportunity for economic development in rural agricultural areas; and for other purposes.

Since Congress adjourned last September, the economic conditions in agriculture have deteriorated to a point where immediate positive action is essential.

Farm prices, already at very low levels last summer, have dropped even further. In December, the farm parity ratio was 77—lowest for any December since the depression year of 1933. In 1959, farm income declined 15 percent.

According to the Department of Agriculture's own estimates, this year it is expected to drop another 7 to 8 percent.

In 1959, production of all farm commodities set a new record. That production was 5 to 10 percent above the total we as a nation use at home, and export for sale or assistance abroad.

Today the Government inventory of surplus farm commodities is over $9 billion—and during this year, that figure will increase.

These facts demonstrate the degree of the failure of the present farm program. Overproduction has built up huge surpluses. But these surpluses have not been used to any real advantage, either at home or abroad. In addition, there have been reduced farm prices, and reduced farm income.

Nevertheless, the expenditure on the agriculture program over the last 5 years has exceeded $30 billion.

Despite these conditions, has there been any change of policy on the part of this administration? There has not. Therefore, it is essential that the Congress act—and act now.

To this end, in the hope of getting action in time to affect the 1960 crops, I am introducing a bill designed to deal with this problem; and I would respectfully request that this bill become the basis for corrective legislation early in this session of the Congress.

The bill would:

First. Establish a "food use policy," whereby existing surpluses and future production will provide more of our citizens with an adequate and nutritious diet; and will promote world peace by helping to alleviate hunger and poverty in undeveloped nations.

Second. Place the administration of such domestic and foreign food use programs in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, and the State Department, where the responsibility, the personnel, and the administrative machinery exist.

Third. Establish a national reserve stockpile of food items to be used in event of enemy attack, or other national disaster. This reserve stockpile would be administered by the Office of Civilian and Defense Mobilization.

Fourth. Halt the costly and uneconomical buildup of surplus commodities by bringing farm production into balance with our national food and fiber needs.

Fifth. Establish farmer advisory and administration committees composed of bona fide farmers, so as to have more practical farm programs.

Sixth. Provide the authority and the flexibility to the end that the Secretary of Agriculture may tailor individual commodity programs to the particular conditions or requirements affecting that commodity.

Seventh. Provide that a two-thirds majority of producers voting in a national referendum must approve any supply adjustment program before it becomes effective. Prior to voting in a referendum, all producers are to be provided with a thorough explanation of the provisions and effects of any program.

Eighth. Require the preparation of a true parity price formula, a formula which would afford fair returns to the family farmer for his labor, investment, and managerial ability. Prior to adoption of such formula, price goals are established at 90 percent of the present parity formula.

Ninth. Place a limit on any benefits which might be received by producers who are not bona fide farmers.

Tenth. Provide for a natural resource conservation program, whereby a producer, to be eligible for benefits, must contribute a portion of his crop land to sound conservation practices. The Department of Agriculture may rent additional acres for conservation or reforestation purposes.

Eleventh. Continue the program whereby the farmer and the Department of Agriculture share the cost of establishing needed conservation practices.

Twelfth. Establish an agency—the Agriculture Development Service—in the Department of Agriculture whose sole function would be to develop and coordinate programs to deal with low income problems in rural areas.

The provisions of this bill will enable our farm population to obtain a more reasonable share of our Nation's prosperity and insure an adequate supply of food for our total national needs, and these objectives would be accomplished at a greatly reduced cost to the American taxpayer.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2862) to provide a national food and fiber utilization policy; to provide for greater conservation of natural resources; to provide farmers a greater voice in the formulation and administration of farm programs; to provide for supply adjustment programs so as to return to farmers a fair share of the national income; to provide greater opportunity for economic development in rural agricultural areas; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. SYMINGTON, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I. FARMER COMMITTEES

SEC. 101. In order to insure a more practical and workable domestic farm program and to insure more direct participation by family farm operators in the formulation and administration of agricultural policy, the Secretary shall, in carrying out the provisions of this Act, utilize the services of local and county farmer committees and State Farmer Administrative Committees established pursuant to section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, and also the State Farmer Advisory Committees and the National Farmer Advisory Committee established pursuant to the provisions of this title.

SEC. 102. (a) In each State there shall be a State Farmer Advisory Committee for the State composed of twelve members. Such members shall be elected by the County Farmer Committees of the State concerned from nominees made by such committees. Members of the State Advisory Committees shall be elected for two years, except that with respect to the membership of each committee first elected pursuant to this subsection one-half of such membership shall be elected to serve for a period of only one year. Each State Farmer Advisory Committee shall be utilized by the Secretary to study and consider the agricultural problems and policies of the State it represents and shall cooperate with and advise the Secretary, the National Farmer Advisory Committee, and the County Farmer Committees of the State it represents regarding such problems and policies.

(b) There is hereby established a committee to be known as the National Farmer Advisory Committee. The membership of such committee shall be appointed by the President. Insofar as practicable, members shall be appointed to insure fair representation of all agricultural commodities and geographical areas of the United States. Not less than one-half of the membership of such committee shall be from the membership of the several State Farmer Advisory Committees. The membership of such committee shall also include representatives of National, State, or commodity organizations of agricultural producers; farm cooperatives; agricultural education or research institutions; and industries engaged in the processing, transporting, and marketing of agricultural commodities. Such committee shall be utilized by the Secretary to advise and make recommendations to him with respect to all matters pertaining to agriculture.

(c) Except as provided in subsection (b), only persons who are agricultural producers and who obtain the major portion of their income from farming shall be eligible for selection and service on committees established under this title.

(d) The Secretary is authorized and directed to issue such rules and regulations as he deems proper with respect to the nomination and election of the State Farmer Advisory Committees.

(e) Members of the State Farmer Advisory Committees and the National Farmer Advisory Committee shall receive compensation, at a rate to be determined by the Secretary, for the performance of the duties of the committees, and shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred in the performance of the duties vested in the committees.

SEC. 103. The fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth sentences of section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act are amended to read as follows: "The local and county committees provided for in this subsection shall be known as Local Farmer Committees and County Farmer Committee, respectively. In each State there shall be a State Farmer Administrative Committee composed of three members. Such members shall be appointed by the Secretary from nominees designated by County Farmer Committees of the State. Such members shall be appointed for a period not to exceed three years. Only persons who are agricultural producers and who obtain the major portion of their income from farming shall be eligible for selection and service on committees provided for under this subsection."

TITLE II. NATIONAL FOOD USE PROGRAM

SEC. 201. It is hereby declared to be in the interest of national security and the maintenance of the health and morale of the American people that the means for obtaining an adequate and nutritious diet be placed so far as practicable within the reach of every person in the Nation. It is further declared to be in the interest of national security that there be maintained a national reserve stockpile of essential food, fiber, and biological oils for use by the civilian population in the event of enemy attack or other disaster. It is further declared to be in the interest of national security that the abundant supplies of food, fiber, and biological oils available in the United States be used so as to alleviate hunger throughout the world, to promote world peace by assisting more rapid economic development of undeveloped nations, and to further the interests of the United States abroad and to fulfill commitments under international agreements.

SEC. 202. (a) In order to carry out the policy expressed in the first sentence of section 201 of this title, the administration of (1) the National School Lunch Act, (2) the Act of July 1, 1958 (72 Stat. 276), providing for the continuation of the special milk program for children, and (3) section 306 of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, providing for the establishment of a food stamp plan, is hereby transferred to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and all functions and activities carried out thereunder shall be carried out by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare; and all references in such provisions to the Secretary of Agriculture shall be deemed to refer to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(b) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall make a determination each year of the total quantity of each agricultural commodity that will be required in the next succeeding year in the operation of the programs named in subsection (a) of this section and any other similar programs carried out under his jurisdiction. Such total quantity for any commodity shall consist of (1) the quantity of such commodity he determines will be required from the stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Department of Agriculture, and (2) the quantity of such commodity he determines will be removed from the open market.

(c) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall certify each year to the Secretary of Agriculture the total quantities of each agricultural commodity determined by him pursuant to subsections (b) (1) and (2) to be required for such year to carry out the programs described in subsection (a) and other similar programs carried out under his jurisdiction.

(d) The Secretary of Agriculture shall be responsible for the delivery, from stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation or from acquisitions made by the Department of Agriculture, at the location and time and in the form specified by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, the quantity of commodities determined pursuant to subsection (b)(1) to be required in carrying out the programs described in subsection (a) of this section and other similar programs carried out under his jurisdiction.

(e) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall be responsible for ascertaining prior to certification that sufficient funds are available to remove from the open market the quantity of each commodity determined by him pursuant to subsection (b) (2) of this section.

SEC. 203. (a) The Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization (hereinafter referred to as the "Director") is authorized and directed to establish and maintain a national reserve stockpile of essential food, fiber, and biological oils for use by the civilian population of the United States, its possessions, and the District of Columbia in the event of enemy attack or other disaster.

(b) In carrying out the provisions of this section, the Director shall make a determination each year of the quantity of each agricultural commodity that will be required for maintaining the stockpile provided for in subsection (a).

(c) The Director shall certify each year to the Secretary of Agriculture the total quantity of each agricultural commodity determined by him pursuant to subsection (b) to be required for such year for maintaining the stockpile provided for in subsection (a).

(d) The Secretary of Agriculture shall be responsible for the delivery, from stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation or from acquisitions made by the Department of Agriculture, at the location and time and in the form specified by the Director, the quantity of commodities certified under subsection (c) for carrying out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 204. (a) The Secretary of State shall make a determination each year of the total quantity of each agricultural commodity that will be required in carrying out authorized programs (including programs under titles I and II of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954) furthering the interests of the United States abroad and for fulfilling commitments under international agreements. Such total quantity for any commodity shall consist of (1) the quantity of such commodity he determines will be required from the stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Department of Agriculture, and (2) the quantity of such commodity he determines will be removed from the open market.

(b) The Secretary of State shall certify each year to the Secretary of Agriculture the total quantities of each agricultural commodity determined by him pursuant to subsection (a) to be required for such year to carry out the programs specified in such subsection.

(c) The Secretary of Agriculture shall be responsible for the delivery, from stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation or from acquisitions made by the Department of Agriculture, at the location and time and in the form specified by the Secretary of State, the quantity of commodities determined by him pursuant to subsection (a)(1) of this section to be required in carrying out the programs specified in subsection (a) of this section.

(d) The Secretary of State shall be responsible for ascertaining prior to certification that sufficient funds are available to remove from the open market the quantity of each commodity determined by him pursuant to subsection (a)(2) of this section.

SEC. 205. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, and the Secretary of State shall reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Department of Agriculture for commodities delivered pursuant to sections 202(d), 203(d), and 204(c).

TITLE III. FARM PARITY

SEC. 301. The Secretary shall determine the parity price of any agricultural commodity in accordance with section 301(a)(1) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended.

SEC. 302. In carrying out the provisions of this Act, the Secretary shall maintain the average price during the marketing year for any commodity at not less than 90 per centum of the parity price for such commodity, if producers have not disapproved a market supply adjustment program for such marketing year in a referendum conducted in accordance with the provisions of title IV.

SEC. 303. (a) As soon as practicable after enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall undertake research and studies necessary to determine a true parity price formula for each agricultural commodity which will enable the efficient family farm operator producing such commodity to earn and receive a return on his labor and investment reasonably comparable to that received by similar productive resources in other segments of the economy.

(b) The Secretary shall report the results of such research and studies to the Congress not later than December 31, 1960.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to make such expenditures as he deems necessary in carrying out the provisions of this section.

TITLE IV. MARKET SUPPLY ADJUSTMENT

SEC. 401. If at any time for any commodity or group of closely related commodities (such as feed grains), the Secretary determines that in the absence of a market supply adjustment program for such commodity or group of commodities, such prices would, for the next succeeding marketing year, average less than the price specified in section 302, he shall, after utilizing the advice and recommendations of the National Farmer Advisory Committee, formulate and announce a market supply adjustment program to be effective for such marketing year, which will be adapted to the special circumstances and conditions of such commodity or group of commodities, and which will maintain returns to producers at the levels sepcified in section 302 at a cost to the United States no greater than the limitation specified in section 409.

SEC. 402. (a) The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the formulation and announcement of any market supply adjustment program made pursuant to section 401, conduct a referendum, by secret ballot, of farmers engaged in the production for commercial use of the commodity concerned to determine whether such farmers are in favor of or opposed to the announced program.

(b) If more than one-third of the farmers voting in such referendum oppose such market supply adjustment program, it shall not become effective. The Secretary shall proclaim the results of any referendum held hereunder as soon as possible.

SEC. 403. In formulating and carrying out a market supply adjustment program for any commodity or group of commodities, the Secretary shall, with the advice and recommendations of the National Farmer Advisory Committee, use such means as he deems the most efficient and economical to insure that producers will receive not less than the price specified in section 302 for their commodity during the operation of such program. Such means may include, but shall not be limited to: commodity loans, marketing agreements and orders, acreage allotments, marketing quotas, market shipment scheduling, commodity purchase and diversion programs, stabilization pools, incentive payments, compensatory payments, market stratification, and export equalization payments. Whenever payments of any type are utilized in the program for any commodity, the Secretary shall give producers and exporters the option of receiving payments in kind or cash.

SEC. 404. The Secretary shall, at least one month prior to the date of any referendum conducted pursuant to section 402, provide each producer who is eligible to vote with a thorough explanation of the provisions of the program submitted to referendum. Such explanation shall include, but not be limited to, information and estimates of the effect on prices, income, acreage, or marketing restrictions, penalties for violation, and other relevant factors which would result if the referendum is approved, and an equally comprehensive explanation of probable effects if the referendum is disapproved.

SEC. 405. (a) In formulating a market supply adjustment program for any commodity or group of commodities, the Secretary shall determine a national requirement for such commodity or group of commodities.

(b) The national requirement for any commodity for any year shall consist of (1) quantities of such commodity which the Secretary estimates will move through commercial market channels for domestic consumption at not less than the price specified in section 302 for such commodity; (2) the quantity of such commodity certified by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare pursuant to section 202(c) for use in programs specified in such section; (3) the quantity of such commodity required for maintenance of the national food, fiber, and biological oil reserve as certified by the Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization pursuant to section 203(c); (4) the quantity of such commodity which the Secretary estimates will be exported for dollars at competitive world prices; and (5) the quantity of such commodity certified by the Secretary of State pursuant to section 204(b) for use in programs furthering the interests of the United States abroad and in fulfilling commitments under international agreements.

SEC. 406. (a) The national requirement for any commodity for any year as provided in section 405 shall be reduced by an amount equal to the quantity of such commodity, if any, which is in the stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Department of Agriculture at the time the national requirement for such commodity is determined, and which will be delivered pursuant to the provisions of sections 202(d), 203(d), and 204(c). The national requirement, after reduction as provided in the foregoing sentence, shall be allocated to States, counties, and individual farms on the basis of production history during the first 9 of the 10 years preceding the year in which the allocation is made, adjusted for abnormal production conditions and trends in yields and land use.

(b) In allocating the national requirement for any commodity, the Secretary, with the advice and assistance of the County Farmer Committees, the State Farmer Advisory Committees, and/or the National Farmer Advisory Committee shall make necessary adjustments so as to provide for fair and equitable treatment for all farm operators, taking into consideration: (1) trends in production, (2) effects of previous acreage diversion or other programs, (3) availability of alternative production opportunities, (4) abnormal weather conditions, (5) sound conservation and land use practices, and (6) requirements for the attainment and maintenance of efficient family farm units.

(c) The national requirement of any commodity shall be expressed in units of production, such as bushels, pounds, or bales, but the national requirement may be expressed in terms of acres in the case of feed grains or other commodities which are used to a substantial extent on the farm where produced.

SEC. 407. The Secretary is authorized and directed to establish necessary incentives, penalties, or compliance deposits to facilitate enforcement of any market supply adjustment program.

SEC. 408. No person who customarily derives more than 50 per centum of his total personal income from sources other than the production of agricultural commodities shall be entitled to any benefits under this Act in excess of $5,000 for any year.

SEC. 409. (a) The Secretary shall utilize the funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation for carrying out the purposes of titles II, III, and IV of this Act.

TITLE V. CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES

SEC. 501. In order to protect the national interest in the conservation and development of soil, water, timber, and other natural resources and to prevent the wasteful and uneconomical use and exploitation of these resources, the Secretary shall establish a resource conservation base which shall consist of contributed acreage, as provided in section 502, and rented acreage, as provided in sections 503 and 504.

SEC. 502. (a) To facilitate the effective administration of this Act, the Secretary shall determine annually the percentage of total cropland in the United States on which no resource depleting commodity shall be produced. Such total acreage shall not exceed 10 per centum of the total crop acreage of the United States.

(b) To be eligible for benefits under this Act, each producer shall designate a portion of the total cropland under his control as producer contributed conservation acreage, and such portion shall be devoted to such soil conservation practices as the Secretary may prescribe. Such portion shall be equal to the percentage determined by the Secretary under subsection (a), after allowing a twenty-acre exemption for each farm.

(c) The Secretary shall share the cost of establishing and maintaining soil conservation practices required under this title in accordance with programs approved under section 7 of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act. The Secretary shall determine, after consultation with the appropriate State Farmer Advisory Committee and the National Farmer Advisory Committee, the particular program to be effective in any State or area.

SEC. 503. (a) The Secretary shall determine annually the amount of acreage that will be needed to be taken out of production, in addition to the amount determined under section 502(a), in order to bring agricultural production in balance with the food, fiber, and biological oil requirements determined pursuant to section 405 of this Act.

(b) The Secretary shall enter into annual rental agreements with producers to divert from resource depleting uses to soil conservation practices an amount of acreage equal to the amount determined pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, less an amount equal to the amount contracted for under section 504.

(c) The Secretary shall not enter into such agreement with any producer for more than 50 per centum of the total crop land controlled by such producer.

(d) The Secretary shall share with the producer the cost of establishing and maintaining soil conservation practices on lands contracted for under the provisions of this section in accordance with programs approved under section 7 of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act. The Secretary shall determine, after consultation with the appropriate State Farmer Advisory Committee and the National Farmer Advisory Committee, the particular program to be effective in any State or area.

SEC. 504. (a) The Secretary is authorized and directed to enter into long-term rental contracts whereby land unsuited or unneeded for the production of agricultural commodities is returned to its original cover or reforested.

(b) The Secretary shall share with the producer the cost of establishing soil conservation practices on lands contracted for under the provisions of this section in accordance with programs approved under section 7 of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act. The Secretary shall determine, after consultation with the appropriate State Farmer Advisory Committee and The National Farmer Advisory Committee, the particular program to be effective in any State or area.

SEC. 505. The Secretary is authorized to renegotiate any contract entered into under the provisions of subtitle B of the Soil Bank Act in order to provide fair and equitable treatment to all producers under the provisions of this Act.

TITLE VI. AGRICULTURE DEVELOPMENT SERVICE

SEC. 601. (a) The Secretary is authorized and directed to establish in the Department of Agriculture an agency to be known as the Agriculture Development Service for the purpose of providing a coordinated program of assistance to low income farm families, and to develop rural areas of low productivity and under employment so as to increase the rate of economic growth and the efficiency of resource utilization.

(b) The Secretary shall appoint an administrator who shall be known as Administrator of the Agriculture Development Service and who shall, under the general supervision and direction of the Secretary, administer the provisions of this title.

(c) To advise the Administrator in the performance of functions authorized by this title, there is authorized to be created an advisory board, composed of representatives of the Departments of Labor, Commerce, Health, Education, and Welfare, and representatives of farm organizations, church groups, labor unions, private businesses, and State welfare and industrial development agencies. The members of such advisory board shall be appointed by the President.

SEC. 602. (a) The Administrator shall designate as "agricultural development areas" those rural counties or parts thereof, parishes, reservations, or areas, where there has existed persistent substandard family farm income which has resulted in depressed economic conditions for the rural area.

(b) Among the factors to be considered by the Administrator in making the designations under subsection (a) are (1) the number of low-income farm families in the various rural areas of the United States, (2) the proportion that such low-income families are to the total farm families of each of such areas, (3) the relationship of the income levels of the families in each such area to the general levels of income in the United States, (4) the current and prospective employment opportunities in each such area, and (5) the availability of manpower in each such area for supplemental employment.

(c) Any area designated as an agricultural development area pursuant to the provisions of this section shall continue to be so designated as long as the conditions upon which the designation was based persist.

SEC. 603. It shall be the function of the Administrator—

(a) to submit to Congress, in the case of each area designated as an agricultural development area, a program to carry out the purposes of this title with respect to such area;

(b) to cooperate with all departments and agencies of the Federal Government with respect to programs of assistance being made available to persons of low income in rural areas; and

(c) To submit to Congress as soon as practicable after the date of enactment of this Act, but not later than December 31, 1960, specific recommendations for legislation required to establish a national program—

(1) provide supervised credit to low income farm families to assist such families in developing an efficient farm unit;

(2) provide the necessary technical advice to low-income farm families to help such families broaden their economic opportunities;

(3) provide opportunities to members of low income farm families in obtaining nonagricultural vocational training; and

(4) assist local and State authorities in developing available and potential resources to provide greater rural industrialization and additional economic opportunities in agricultural development areas designated pursuant to section 602.

TITLE VII. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 701. (a) As used in this Act the term "Secretary" means Secretary of Agriculture, unless indicated otherwise;

(b) As used in section 408, the term "person" means any individual, partnership, firm, joint-stock company, corporation, association, trust, estate, or agency of a State. Such term shall not include a cooperative marketing organization for the purposes of the limitation on benefits prescribed in such section, but the amount of benefits made available to any person through such cooperative organization shall be included in determining the amount of benefits received by such person for purposes of such limitation.

SEC. 702. The reference in section 306(g) of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall be deemed to refer to the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 703. Any provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended, or of any other Act, providing for acreage allotments, marketing quotas, or price supports for any agricultural commodity, shall be ineffective with respect to the 1960 and subsequent crops of such commodity; but if the Secretary determines that the provisions of this Act cannot be carried out with respect to any commodity for the 1960 crop year, all existing provisions of law relating to such commodity shall continue in effect for such crop year.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I am glad to yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. Could my distinguished friend from Missouri give us any idea as to what this farm program would cost?

Mr. SYMINGTON. Is the Senator asking for a detailed analysis of the cost of the program?

Mr. SCOTT. I was asking for an estimate as to what the Senator's program, in his opinion, would cost if it became law.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Even if this program is adopted, there are still some laws on the books, which would be carried out by the Secretary of Agriculture; but I am confident that one of the problems of the Department of Agriculture in recent years has been the failure to properly enforce controls. Also, unfortunately, many people who are not really farmers have been participating heavily in the programs which were designed primarily to help the efficient family-sized farmers. Both of these matters would be handled in this bill. I would say that if this bill were adopted, the savings to the American taxpayer would be several billion dollars a year.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the Senator not agree that the Secretary of Agriculture is enforcing only those programs which the Congress sends to him?

Mr. SYMINGTON. No, I do not. Last year the Secretary of Agriculture told the Agriculture Committee, of which the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is chairman, that he would send us a bill, recommending what he thought should be done about agriculture. The record will show that he did not send that bill to Congress, and also the stenographic copies of the record were changed, so that when the record was printed it did not say the Secretary of Agriculture had agreed to give us a bill.

This year I would hope we make it clear to the Secretary, as we did last year, that if he will recommend an omnibus bill—which he has never done since I have been on the committee—providing that the bill would reduce inventories and help the family-sized farmer earn a fair share of the national income, we would do our best to see that his proposed legislation was adopted.

Mr. SCOTT. Of course, the Senator does not mean to imply, I am sure, that the Secretary of Agriculture was monkeying with an official transcript of the Senate or of a Senate committee.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I do state, regardless of who did it, that somebody in the Department of Agriculture monkeyed with the official transcript; and that monkeying changed the meaning. I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that when this matter was called to my attention by an able Senator on his side of the aisle, I gave the Senator the facts; and he assured me, after studying the facts, that I was correct.

Mr. SCOTT. I thank the Senator.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION FOR EDUCATION OF MIGRATORY WORKERS AND THEIR CHILDREN

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, two bills to alleviate the serious educational problems that have come to light as a result of the investigations of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee's Special Subcommittee on Migratory Labor.

The legislation provides for a modest program of Federal assistance to help overcome the unique problems and added burdens connected with the education of the children of our migratory workers and to help improve the fundamental education of the migratory workers themselves.

I ask unanimous consent that the two bills, together with a brief summary of the bills and a table of State participation, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks and that the bills lie at the desk until Friday evening of this week so that other Senators who wish to become cosponsors may do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills and statement will be printed in the RECORD, and the bills will lie at the desk until Friday evening of this week.

The bills, introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS, of New Jersey, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as follows:

S. 2864. A bill to provide certain payments to assist in providing improved educational opportunities for children of migrant agricultural employees; and

S. 2865. A bill to provide grants for adult education for migrant agricultural employees.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Since August last year the subcommittee has been conducting a full study of the problems besetting the more than 1 million men, women, and children who perform an indispensable service in providing every one of us with the agricultural necessities of life by traveling from State to State to meet the uniquely heavy seasonal demands of the agricultural industry.

The migratory agricultural workers have often been called our most displaced and forgotten people. Although considerable progress has been made in recent decades through the determined efforts of State and local governments, private organizations and the farmers themselves, the migrant workers still suffer many privations in the area of income, housing, health, and community acceptance.

But perhaps the greatest privation lies in the field of education, particularly for the thousands of children who follow their parents from crop to crop and who, in many cases, rarely see the inside of a school building.

Even in the best of circumstances the constant movement of these migrant children is enough to insure a serious lag in their educational lives. When you add to that the problem of their special environment and upbringing, the fact that they often are needed to work in the fields to help supplement the meager family income, the fact that some parents are unaware of the importance of education, the language barrier frequently present, and the financial difficulty confronting many communities which are suddenly overwhelmed for brief periods by an influx of large numbers of migrant children, it is not hard to appreciate the scope and depth of the problem.

The first bill I have introduced attempts to meet this obvious and vital need for providing the children of our migratory workers with better educational opportunities. The other bill is a small program to help provide the workers themselves with a start in practical education.

I have been gratified to note, Mr. President, the number of farmers who have begun to recognize the benefits to them of having educational opportunities available in their area for migrant children.

During the field hearings held last fall through Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota in the Midwest, and in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, I had occasion to talk to many growers who cited, time after time, the major "headache" and expense resulting from a high and rapid turnover in their migrant working force. Not only did many growers suffer from the problem of having to "break in" a whole new migrant population from year to year, but they often had to suffer the cost and loss of efficiency caused by a steady stream of departures during the course of a single season.

They were also faced with the danger of serious accidents to small children left to their own designs in the field and with the problem of providing care for the children or losing the full efforts of their parents.

Against this backdrop, many farmers who were fortunate enough to be located in an area that provided good educational facilities for migrant children told me how many migrant families returned year after year to the same farms because "here our children can get an education."

Personal experience has taught these farmers what a stabilizing influence an educational program can have in their community. It decreases the turnover, and consequently the expense of finding replacements. It provides a happier and more willing work force. And perhaps not least important, it helps give the farmers themselves a peace of mind they might not otherwise enjoy.

Unfortunately, however, despite the manifest value to the migrant, the farmer and the community of providing good educational opportunities, it is often impossible to do so under existing conditions.

States like Texas with approximately 95,000 domestic migrants at the peak season, or California with around 59,000, or Florida with more than 25,000, simply do not have the funds, instructional capacity or classroom space to cope with the educational needs presented by such an influx. The number of children accompanying these workers can be calculated on the basis of estimates by the Department of Labor that there is approximately one child for every five workers.

It is too much to expect States and local communities to be able to absorb large numbers of migrant children into their existing educational systems for relatively brief periods of the year. Most schools are overcrowded and understaffed as it is, and it is hardly surprising that even the most dedicated community can do very little to shoulder this added and heavy burden.

This is true in our hard-pressed urban areas; the problem is even more acute in the rural sections of the country. It is also understandable that many communities find it hard to rouse sufficient concern over what is, to them, a transitory problem.

But it can be emphatically said that this is far from a transitory problem for the migrant children. It is an everyday problem—every day of their lives.

Mr. President, I intend to make these bills the subject of public hearings by the Subcommittee on Migratory Labor during the early part of this session. I am sure that many valuable suggestions will be received from interested witnesses and agency officials for improving this legislation. It is my hope, Mr. President, on the basis of the considerable information already received on the subject and the comments we will receive in the coming hearings, that legislation dealing with the improvement of educational opportunities for the migrant workers and their children will be perfected and reported favorably during the course of this session.

Passage of this legislation would be a small token of recognition for the many years of silent toil by our migratory workers.

EXHIBIT I

S. 2864

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled—

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Migrant Children Educational Assistance Act of 1960".

Findings and purpose of Act

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby reaffirms the principle and declares that the States and local communities have and must retain control over and primary responsibility for public education. The Congress recognizes, however, that the interstate movement of migrant agricultural employees imposes severe burdens on local educational agencies in discharging their responsibilities with respect to the education of the children of such employees who temporarily reside within their school districts. It is therefore the purpose of this Act to provide assistance to local educational agencies in providing education to the children of migrant agricultural employees, and to provide for certain planning grants to the States to improve such education.

Federal control of education prohibited

SEC. 3. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to authorize any department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States to exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the curriculum, program of instruction, administration, or personnel of any educational institution or school system.

Definitions

SEC. 4. As used in this act—

(1) the term "local educational agency" means a board of education or other legally constituted local school authority having administrative control and direction of free public education in a county, township, independent, or other school district located within a State, and includes any State agency which directly operates and maintains facilities for providing free public education;

(2) the term "child" means any child who is within the age limits for which the applicable local educational agency provides free public education;

(3) the term "parent" includes a legal guardian or other person in loco parentis;

(4) the term "migrant agricultural employee" means an individual employed in agriculture, as defined in section 3(f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 203(f)), or performing agricultural labor, as defined in section 3121(g) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 3121(f)), on a seasonal or other temporary basis in a State where such individual does not maintain a permanent residence, and for the purposes of this Act maintaining a permanent residence shall include the ownership of real property by either such individual or the spouse of such individual;

(5) the term "Commissioner" means the United States Commissioner of Education;

(6) the term "average daily current expenditures per public school child" means the total current expenditures for a State's public elementary and secondary schools during a particular year divided by the product of the average daily attendance in such schools during such year times the number of schooldays in such year; the term "current expenditures" means expenditures for free public education in such schools to the extent that such expenditures are made from current revenues, except that such term does not include any such expenditure for the acquisition of land, the erection of facilities, interest, or debt service; and for the purposes of payments under title I for attendance during any academic year the Commissioner shall determine and use the average daily current expenditures per public school child for the year preceding such academic year;

(7) the term "institution of higher education" means any such institution which is accredited as such by a nationally recognized accrediting agency; and

(8) the term "migrant agricultural employee State" means any State which has—

(A) at least five counties with one hundred or more but less than five hundred such employees in each such county;

(B) at least two counties with one hundred or more but less than five hundred such employees in each such county and one county with five hundred or more but less than three thousand such employees;

(C) at least two counties with five hundred or more but less than three thousand such employees in each such county; or

(D) at least one county with three thousand or more such employees;

and determinations for the purpose of this definition shall be made for the most recent year that satisfactory population figures are available from reliable sources.

Administration

SEC. 5. (a) The Commissioner shall administer this Act, and he may make such regulations and perform such other functions as he finds necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

(b) The Commissioner shall include in his annual report to the Congress a full report of the administration of his functions under this Act, including a detailed statement of disbursements.

TITLE I—PAYMENTS TO LOCAL EDUCATION AGENCIES FOR ASSISTANCE IN EDUCATING CHILDREN OF MIGRANT AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYEES

Appropriations authorized

SEC. 101. There are authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960, and for the four succeeding fiscal years, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

Payments

SEC. 102. (a) Upon application in accordance with the provisions of this section for the school year beginning in 1960, or for any of the four succeeding school years, by a local educational agency in any State, the Commissioner shall pay to such agency an amount equal to 75 percent with respect to the school years beginning in 1960 and 1961 and 50 percent with respect to the school years beginning in 1962, 1963, and 1964, of the average daily current expenditures per public school child, for the State in which such agency is located, for each day's attendance in excess of 10 during such school year in the free public elementary or secondary schools of such agency, by a child of a parent who is a migrant agricultural employee.

(b) Payments under this section shall be made for attendance during the regular school year beginning in 1960, and the four succeeding school years, and may be made at such intervals as the Commissioner deems appropriate. Such payments shall me made through the disbursing facilities of the Department of the Treasury and prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office.

(c) An application under the provisions of this section shall be in such form and contain such information as may be required by the Commissioner to carry out the provisions of this section, and the Commissioner may require such additional information and reports at such intervals during the school year as he deems necessary.

TITLE II—GRANTS FOR SUMMER SCHOOLS FOR CHILDREN OF PARENTS WHO ARE MIGRANT AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYEES

Appropriations

SEC. 201. There is authorized to be appropriated $300,000 for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960, and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years, for grants under the provisions of this title.

Allotments and grants

SEC. 202. Amounts appropriated pursuant to section 301 for any fiscal year shall be allotted among the migrant agricultural employee States on the basis of their relative populations of migrant agricultural employees for the most recent year that such populations are available from reliable sources. A State's allotment under this section shall be available during the year for which made and the succeeding fiscal year for payments in accordance with the provisions of this title for the operating costs of conducting necessary summer school sessions for children of migrant agricultural employees. As used in this section the term "operating costs" includes all ordinary costs of operation other than any costs for the acquisition of facilities or costs related to any such acquisition.

Application and payments

SEC. 203. The Commissioner shall approve any application for funds provided under this title if such application—

(1) is from a local educational agency or an institution of higher education within a State;

(2) sets out the summer school program, and the necessity therefor, the operating costs of such summer school, and the amount needed under the provisions of this title to defray such costs; and

(3) provides that such agency or institution will make such reports, in such form, and containing such information as the Commissioner may from time to time reasonably require, and, to assure verification of such reports, give the Commissioner upon request, access to the records upon which the information is based.

Upon approval of any such application the Commissioner shall pay, in such installments as he may deem appropriate, to such agency or institution, out of the allotment to the State in which such agency or institution is located, the amount requested, or in the event requests from agencies and institutions in any State are in excess of such State's allotment, such lesser amount as the Commissioner deems appropriate to carry out the purposes of this Act. Such payments shall be made through the disbursing facilities of the Department of the Treasury and prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office.

TITLE III—PLANNING GRANTS

Appropriations

SEC. 301. There is authorized to be appropriated $250,000 for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960, and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years for grants under the provisions of this title.

Allotments and grants

SEC. 302. Amounts appropriated pursuant to section 201 for any fiscal year shall be populations of migrant agricultural employee States on the basis of their relative populations of migrant agricultural employees for the most recent year that such populations are available from reliable sources. A State's allotment under this section shall be available during the year for which made for payments in accordance with the provisions of this title (1) to survey the need for summer school sessions for children of parents who are migrant agricultural employees; (2) to develop plans for such sessions where needed; (3) to develop and carry out programs to encourage such children to attend school during the regular academic year and such summer sessions, and to improve the quality of education offered such children; and (4) to coordinate programs provided for in this Act with similar programs in other States, including the transmittal of pertinent information with respect to school records of such children. Grants under the provisions of this title shall not be available for the cost of acquisition of any facilities.

Application and payments

SEC. 303. The Commissioner shall approve any application for funds provided under this title if such application—

(1) designates the State agency which will carry out the program for which the funds are to be used;

(2) sets out such program in sufficient detail to satisfy the Commissioner that it carries out the purposes of this title; and

(3) provides that such agency will make such reports, in such form, and containing such information as the Commissioner may from time to time reasonably require, and, to assure verification of such reports, give the Commissioner, upon request, access to the records upon which the information is based.

Upon approval of any such application the Commissioner shall pay, in such installments as he may deem appropriate, to such agency out of its State allotment the amount requested. Such payments shall be made through the disbursing facilities of the Department of the Treasury and prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office.

S. 2865

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled—

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Migrant Agricultural Employee Adult Education Act of 1960".

Federal control of education prohibited

SEC. 2. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to authorize any department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States to exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the curriculum, program of instruction, administration, or personnel of any educational institution or school system.

Definitions

SEC. 3. As used in this Act—

(1) the term "local educational agency" means a board of education or other legally constituted local school authority having administrative control and direction of free public education in a county, township, independent, or other school district located within a State, and includes any State agency which directly operates and maintains facilities for providing free public education;

(2) the term "migrant agricultural employee" means an individual employed in agriculture, as defined in section 3(f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 203(f)), or performing agricultural labor, as defined in section 3121 (g) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 3121(f)), on a seasonal or other temporary basis in a State where such individual does not maintain a permanent residence, and for the purposes of this Act maintaining a permanent residence shall include the ownership of real property by either such individual or the spouse of such individual;

(3) the term "Commissioner" means the United States Commissioner of Education;

(4) the term "institution of higher education" means any such institution which is accredited as such by a nationally recognized accrediting agency; and

(5) the term "migrant agricultural employee State" means any State which has—

(A) at least five counties with one hundred or more but less than five hundred such employees in each such county;

(B) at least two counties with one hundred or more but less than five hundred such employees in each such county and one county with five hundred or more but less than three thousand such employees;

(C) at least two counties with five hundred or more but less than three thousand such employees in each such county; or

(D) at least one county with three thousand or more such employees;

and determinations for the purpose of this definition shall be made for the most recent year that satisfactory population figures are available from reliable sources.

Administration

SEC. 4. (a) The Commissioner shall administer this Act, and he may make such regulations and perform such other functions as he finds necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

(b) The Commissioner shall include in his annual report to the Congress a full report of the administration of his functions under this Act, including a detailed statement of disbursements.

Appropriations

SEC. 5. There is authorized to be appropriated $250,000 for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960, and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years, for grants under the provisions of this Act.

Allotments and grants

SEC. 6. Amounts appropriated pursuant to section 5 for any fiscal year shall be allotted among the migrant agricultural employee States on the basis of their relative populations of migrant agricultural employees for the most recent year that such populations are available from reliable sources. A State's allotment under this section shall be available during the year for which made for payments in accordance with the provisions of this Act for the operating costs of conducting adult education classes for migrant agricultural employees and their spouses. As used in this section the term "operating costs" includes all ordinary costs of operation other than any costs for the acquisition of facilities or costs related to any such acquisition.

Application and payments

SEC. 7. The Commissioner shall approve any application for funds provided under this Act if such application—

(1) is from a local educational agency or an institution of higher education within a State;

(2) sets out a program of adult education classes for migrant agricultural employees and their spouses which provides fundamental education and training for healthful modern living, the operating costs of such classes, and the amount needed under the provisions of this Act to defray such costs; and

(3) provides that such agency or institution will make such reports, in such form, and containing such information as the Commissioner may from time to time reasonably require, and, to assure verification of such reports, give the Commissioner upon request, access to the records upon which the information is based.

Upon approval of any such application the Commissioner shall pay, in such installments as he may deem appropriate, to such agency or institution, out of the allotment to the State in which such agency or institution is located, the amount requested, or in the event requests from agencies and institutions in any State are in excess of such State's allotment, such lesser amount as the Commissioner deems appropriate to carry out the purposes of this Act. Such payments shall be made through the disbursing facilities of the Department of the Treasury and prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office.

SUMMARY STATEMENT

First. The first bill I have introduced would provide a 5-year program of Federal assistance for the education of our migrant children. It is a sound, workable program of modest sum which, I believe, will provide great improvement in this vital area. The proposals are based upon information drawn from the hearings held by the subcommittee and upon the considered judgment of people who have spent many years dealing with the problem.

Briefly, the bill would provide matching funds to help defray the added expense of educating the children of migratory workers for whom there is no direct local school tax during the regular school session, a program of grants totaling $300,000 for the establishment of summer schools, and a program of planning grants totaling $250,000 to promote interstate cooperation, the development of educational programs, materials and demonstrations, and the transmission of school records for migrant children.

To help bear the additional cost of educating these children during the regular school session, the Federal Government would for the first 2 years pay 75 percent of the State's cost of educating the child for each day of attendance. Thereafter, the Federal Government would share 50 percent of the cost.

On the basis of estimates prepared by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, this program would cost slightly more than $2 million.

The grants for the establishment of summer schools for migrant children is, to me, perhaps potentially the most rewarding part of the program, for a well-run summer school averaging from 6 to 8 weeks in duration could well be the longest uninterrupted educational experience that the migrant child will have in a given year. For that reason, a relatively small amount of money spent wisely in the right areas might yield benefits far beyond what normally might be expected.

It is estimated on the basis of pilot projects conducted in Colorado, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey that the average cost of a 6-week summer school is approximately $5,000. The sum authorized in this bill would therefore provide money for the establishment of 60 such schools which could pattern their activities on the projects that have proved so successful thus far.

It is anticipated that the States and local communities will provide the school buildings and maintenance costs, with the Federal Government paying for the administrative, instructional, food, transportation, and other operating costs.

The planning grants, as I indicated earlier, would serve a number of valuable purposes. The grants would provide funds to help stimulate interest and leadership at the State level. They would assist in the preparation of plans and methods for the operation of summer schools. They would encourage interstate cooperation so that the educational pattern of the child will be interrupted as little as possible. And they will help facilitate the transfer of the child's school records so that a teacher will not have to spend so many precious days trying to find out what ground the child's last teacher has covered.

These three programs, when added together and put into operation over a period of years, will, I am certain, achieve tremendous results at a minimal cost.

Second. The second bill I have introduced has been inspired directly by the information arising from the hearings and talks with the farmers. Perhaps the strongest and most justifiable complaint raised by the growers time and time again might be paraphrased something like this:

"Well, I've done a lot of things to improve the living conditions of the migrants who work on my farm. I've built them new housing, put in toilet facilities, new showers, cooking facilities, nice new bedding, plenty of garbage cans—and what happens? They mark up the walls, kick holes in the window screens, stop up the toilets, pull the knobs off the showers and stoves, tear the blankets, and tip over the garbage cans."

Unfortunately many of these things have happened on many farms and one can hardly be anything but extremely sympathetic to the farmer who provides good facilities only to have them abused, damaged, and sometimes wrecked. Sometimes this kind of damage is done by workers who lack the self-respect to care. Sometimes it is the result of a simple lack of knowledge of what the facilities are for.

In both cases the root problem is a lack of fundamental education and knowledge of modern living. It is to this problem that the second bill is directed. A sum of $250,000 is authorized for a program of practical education for the migratory workers themselves.

Based on the experimental programs so far conducted, particularly those held in two counties in Wisconsin in 1957 and 1958, I believe this is an area that could and should be explored more fully as a means for improving the living conditions of the migrants and increasing their self-respect, as well as providing a basis for protecting the interests and expenses of the farmers themselves.

Essentially this program follows along the path so successfully blazed by the Cooperative Extension Service, which now combines the efforts of some 11,000 county extension workers and 1.2 million voluntary local leaders to provide information about home economics and agricultural methods to more than 12 million people.

This bill would provide grants to States with serious migratory worker problems to help organize instructional programs and stimulate local activity and interest. There are, of course, a multitude of ways in which such a program could be of help. It could provide for meetings, demonstrations, and films on such subjects as the relationship between sanitary facilities and personal health, the preparation of family budgets and methods of handling family finances, instruction in clothes care and nutritious and economical preparation of food, and so forth.

The advantages of this program, I am sure, will far outweigh the very modest expense involved.

The following is a table, prepared by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, of estimates of State participation under the Migrant Children Education Assistance Act, provided the minimum standards regarding the eligibility for participation contained in section 4(8) of the act are met:

Estimated cost of ADA payments to States based on 1959 data

	Total migrants	Number of migrant children	Amount paid per pupil	Estimated daily attendance	Amount paid for migrant children
1. Alabama	3,400	680	$1.00	15	$10,200.00
2. Arizona	7,998	1,600	1.25	20	40,000.00
3. Arkansas	4,875	975	1.00	15	14,625.00
4. California	59,680	11,935	1.25	20	288,375.00
5. Colorado	10,056	2,010	1.25	15	37,687.50
6. Connecticut	4,540	905	1.25	20	22,625.00
7. Delaware	4,747	945	1.50	15	21,162.50
8. District of Columbia.[1]
9. Florida	25,347	5,065	1.00	20	101,300.00
10. Georgia	5,300	1,060	1.00	15	15,300.00
11. Idaho	8,875	1,775	1.00	15	26,625.00
12. Illinois	7,499	1,495	1.25	15	28,131.25
13. Indiana	6,989	1,195	1.00	15	17,925.00
14. Iowa	773	155	1.25	15	2,906.25
15. Kansas	20,850	4,170	1.00	15	62,550.00
16. Kentucky	3,450	690	1.00	15	10,350.00
17. Louisiana	5,075	1,015	1.25	15	10,031.25
18. Maine	404	80	1.00	15	1,200.00
19. Maryland	13,038	2,605	1.25	15	48,843.75
20. Massachusetts	1,614	325	1.25	15	6,093.75
21. Michigan	46,543	9,305	1.25	20	232,625.00
22. Minnesota	5,399	1,075	1.00	15	16,125.00
23. Mississippi	1,274	255	1.00	15	3,825.00
24. Missouri	13,155	2,630	1.00	15	39,450.00
25. Montana	7,172	1,035	1.25	15	19,406.25
26. Nebraska	4,052	810	1.00	15	12,150.00
27. Nevada	614	105	$1.25	15	$1,968.75
28. New Hampshire	308	60	1.00	15	900.00
29. New Jersey	13,055	2,610	1.50	20	78,300.00
30. New Mexico	1,506	300	2.00	20	12,000.00
31. New York	27,934	5,585	2.00	15	167,550.00
32. North Carolina	13,707	2,540	1.00	15	38,100.00
33. North Dakota	7,213	1,440	1.00	15	21,600.00
34. Ohio	9,987	1,995	1.00	15	29,925.00
35. Oklahoma	11,050	2,210	1.00	15	33,150.00
36. Oregon	20,176	4,035	1.25	15	75,656.25
37. Pennsylvania	7,355	1,470	1.25	15	27,562.50
38. Rhode Island [1]
39. South Carolina	3,650	730	1.00	15	10,950.00
40. South Dakota	2,000	400	1.00	15	6,000.00
41. Tennessee	477	95	1.00	15	1,425.00
42. Texas	95,610	19,120	1.00	20	282,400.00
43. Utah	1,622	325	1.00	15	4,875.00
44. Vermont	220	45	1.00	15	675.00
45. Virginia	10,595	2,115	1.00	15	31,725.00
46. Washington	18,109	3,620	1.25	15	67,875.00
47. West Virginia	130	25	1.25	15	375.00
48. Wisconsin	11,752	2,350	1.25	15	44,062.50
49. Wyoming	2,241	445	1.25	15	8,343.75
Total					2,044,025.00

[1] No data available.

REMOVAL OF LIMITATION OF EARNINGS UNDER SOCIAL SECURITY LAW

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, on February 26 of last year, I introduced a bill—S. 1168—for the removal of the existing limit on the earnings of persons receiving social security benefits. I hope that within the coming weeks action will be taken by Congress to implement this proposal into law.

It is my impression that considerable public opinion now favors liberalization of our social security system. It is widely recognized that America's senior citizens deserve far better treatment than they have been getting. A full examination of the level and structure of our social security system is definitely needed.

An articulate constituent of mine, in writing to support certain important changes in our social security system cited the following literary reference which I think is extremely appropriate in this connection:

When all the world is young, lad,
And all the grass is green,
And every goose a swan, lad,
And every lass a queen,
Then ho: for boot and horse, lad,
Across the world away—
Young blood will have its course, lad,
And every dog his day.
When all the world is old, lad,
And all the grass is brown,
When every sport is stale, lad,
And all the wheels run down,
Creep home and find your place there,
The spent and maimed among;
God grant you find one face there,
You loved when all was young.

Mr. President, my bill—S. 1168—to remove the earnings limit is, in my mind, of the highest priority in the way of revising and improving the social security system. There is a very important and basically human reason for removing this limit. Many older persons are far more contented if they are are able to continue to work after they have reached retirement age. Under present law, many such persons are deterred from doing so because they feel that they have paid for social security and should not surrender these benefits as a result of the existing limitation on earnings. This most certainly should not be the case. The dignity and self-satisfaction derived from work are of the highest importance and should be permitted to all Americans, young and old alike.

In a recent Gallup survey it was found that the overwhelming majority of Americans favor removing the social security earnings limit. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Gallup's column on this subject be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOCIAL SECURITY EARNING LIMIT HIT

(By George Gallup)

The American public favors the idea of letting its senior citizens work to the full limit of their earning power without losing any of the social security benefits which have accrued to them.

Current limitations, as the public sees it, just do not provide the average retired person with adequate income in today's high-cost-of-living conditions.

Under present law, any person between the ages of 65 and 72 who earns more than $1,200 a year loses at least some of his social security payments. If his earnings are in excess of $2,080 a year, he may get no monthly benefits at all.

The question as to whether existing laws should be changed has raised much controversy and undoubtedly will be injected into the political campaign in 1960.

A nationwide survey by the Gallup poll on retirement benefits finds these are the highlights of the public's thinking on the issue:

A substantial majority of the public (two out of three) believes that the present restrictions on earning should be changed. Chiefly, people believe that the current limits are not realistic in today's economy.

A slightly smaller majority, in fact, would permit persons on social security to earn as much as they wish at a job and still be eligible for all payments.

This is the first question put to a representative cross section of American adults of all ages by Gallup poll reporters:

"A person over 65 who works full time and earns more than $1,200 a year cannot receive social security payments. Do you think this law should or should not be changed?"

Here is the vote:

	Percent
Should be	67
Should not	23
No opinion	10

The next question:

"Do you think persons over 65 should be permitted to earn as much as they can and still get their full social security payments, or not?"

	Percent
Should be able	62
Should not	31
No opinion	7

(Under a law, effective this year, a retired person may actually earn more than $2,080 a year and still get some benefits if the work is not of a full-time nature. For any month in which a person between 65 and 72 does not earn $100, he may qualify for a social security check.

(Theoretically, therefore, a retired person could earn the full $2,080 or even more in any one month and nothing the remaining months of the year and still get 11 social security payments.)

The American public has supported the general principal of old-age benefits from the very beginning of the plan nearly a quarter of a century ago.

In January 1936, for example, as the program was just getting started, 9 out of 10 Americans in a Gallup poll favored the idea of a Government old-age pension. At the end of that year, 7 out of 10 favored the plan as it now works—that is, a joint tax on employers and employees for old-age pensions.

During World War II, when, in 1943, the question of expanding social security benefits to include sickness, disability, doctors and hospital bills arose, a substantial majority of the public backed such a move.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am well aware that there are many who feel that the proposal to completely remove the earnings limitation goes somewhat too far. A constituent of mine, Mr. D. S. Sargent, personnel director of Consolidated Edison, Inc., has called my attention to a similar although more moderate proposal regarding the earnings limitation. I should like to give this Congress the benefit of Mr. Sargent's wide experience and great ability in this field. For this reason, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill encompassing Mr. Sargent's proposal on the social security earnings limit.

This bill would raise what I call the chargeback figure from $80 in present law to $254. This amount, $254, is the maximum family monthly social security payment permitted at the present time.

Under existing social security statutes, an individual can earn $1,200 per year—that is, $100 per month—without losing any social security benefits. If his income is over $1,200, he now loses 1 month's benefits for every $80 or fraction thereof in additional earnings. Should his monthly social security check be greater than $80, he may well lose more than a dollar in benefits for each dollar earned above the $1,200 limit. It is well to note here that most social security monthly benefits are higher than the current $80 chargeback figure.

By making the maximum monthly benefit allowed the same as the chargeback figure, as in the proposed bill, we establish in law the principle that for each dollar earned over $1,200 per year, an individual covered under social security cannot lose more than $1 in benefits. Under this bill, the social security earnings limitation would no longer prevent an individual from continuing to work beyond retirement age.

I believe that this proposal is logical and straightforward. If one understands the mechanics of the social security program, the proposal is not complicated or especially technical.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following figures and brief statement, which further illustrate the impact and intent of this bill, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Explanation of social security earnings limit proposal

	Annual income, man age 65, wife and children receiving maximum benefit [1]
	Present	Proposed
Social security payments (12×$254=$3,048)	$3,048	$3,048
Can earn without penalty	1,200	1,200
Total possible income (including $1,200 in salary)	4,248	4,248
If he earns $1,454 in a year; that is, $1,200 plus the equivalent of 1 social security check ($254):
Social security eligibility	[2] 2,032	[3] 2,794
Earnings from employment	1,454	1,454
Total income	3,486	4,248
Decrease in total income resulting from additional work	[4] 762	0

[1] Maximum benefit is $254 per month.
[2] Four monthly benefits lost (4 times $80, or a fraction thereof, in additional income).
[3] One monthly benefit lost under proposed bill.
[4] Represents 3 payments net loss (3×$254=$762). 1 lost benefit of $254 compensated by the extra $254 in income.

The proposed amendment consists of enlarging the charge-back figure of $80 to one of $254. As the sum of $254 has the individual significance of being the maximum monthly benefit check any individual may receive under the present social security legislation (and that for a beneficiary who has a qualifying spouse and one or more qualifying children), the net result of this substitution of figures is to enable all social security beneficiaries who lose all or a portion of such benefits by accumulating earnings in excess of $1,200 per taxable year to forfeit no greater sum of such benefits than that which they have earned in excess of $1,200 per year. In illustration of this fact consider the individual beneficiary whose monthly benefit is $116, or the beneficiary with qualifying spouse whose monthly check might be $174—both of these beneficiaries are able to earn a greater amount in excess of $1,200 per year than the sum of the social security checks for such year that they lose by such excess earnings.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I want to conclude my remarks on this proposal by reiterating what I said in the beginning of my statement. I strongly and enthusiastically favor the complete removal of the existing limitation on earnings for persons receiving social security benefits. The bill which I have introduced today in my opinion does not go far enough. But if the proposal contained in this bill more clearly reflects the tenor of Congress, then I certainly want to see to it that it is brought to our attention. It most certainly represents a step in the right direction and I urge that it be given full and careful consideration by the Congress in the months ahead.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill which I introduce today be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill—S. 2866—to amend title II of the Social Security Act so as to relax the severity of existing provisions with respect to deductions from benefits on account of earnings, introduced by Mr. KEATING, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) paragraph (2) of section 203(e) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "$80" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$254".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) shall be effective, in the case of any individual, with respect to taxable years of such individual ending after the month in which this Act is enacted.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I came to the floor while my colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] was speaking. I am glad to associate myself with him in the effort to remove the existing limit on the earnings of social security beneficiaries. I have taken up the torch which divine providence caused Senator Langer to lay down. I am delighted that my colleague from New York feels as Senator Langer did about this matter.

CONVENTION WITH CUBA FOR CONSERVATION OF SHRIMP

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to give effect to the Convention Between the United States of America and Cuba for the Conservation of Shrimp, signed at Havana, August 15, 1958. I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Acting Secretary of State, requesting the proposed legislation, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2867) to give effect to the Convention Between the United States of America and Cuba for the Conservation of Shrimp, signed at Havana, August 15, 1958, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON (by request), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
September 12, 1959.

HON. RICHARD NIXON,
President of the Senate.

SIR: There is submitted herewith for consideration of the Congress a draft bill entitled "A bill to give effect to the Convention Between the United States of America and Cuba for the Conservation of Shrimp, signed at Havana, August 15, 1958." The convention entered into force September 4, 1959.

The Bureau of the Budget has informed the Department that it has no objection to the submission of this proposal to the Congress for its consideration.

Very truly yours,

DOUGLAS DILLON,
Acting Secretary.

ELIMINATION OF POLL TAX AS VOTING REQUIREMENT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I introduce for myself, for the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] as the principal cosponsor, and 22 other Senators, whose names I shall read into the RECORD, a bill to eliminate by statute the poll tax and other taxes or property qualifications as a bar to voting in national elections.

I introduce the bill as an original measure and also as a substitute for Senate Joint Resolution 126, a proposed constitutional amendment to do away with the poll tax, which was introduced in the last session of Congress. Seventeen Senators who previously supported Senate Joint Resolution 126 have now joined as cosponsors of the measure I am introducing today, which would substitute for that constitutional amendment a statutory means to achieve the same objective.

The Senators who have joined with the Senator from Illinois and myself are the following: The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], my colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. MOSS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], my colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], who is the present distinguished occupant of the chair, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2868) to protect the right to vote in national elections by making unlawful the requirement that a poll tax be paid as a prerequisite to voting in such elections, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the enactment of the bill would eliminate the poll tax requirements in five States where it still stands as a prerequisite for voting: Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, Texas, and Virginia. Also, it would remove any other economic disqualifications for voting, other than a poll tax which are at present on the books in Florida, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, and South Carolina.

The bill to eliminate the poll tax by statute is also being introduced, as I have said, as an amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 126. It is my intention to substitute it for that constitutional amendment as the parliamentary situation will allow. It is my understanding that floor consideration of both these approaches to the poll tax repeal—that is, the constitutional amendment route or the statutory route—may be imminent, for I understand that Senate Joint Resolution 126 may be offered in the very near future as an amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 39, a constitutional amendment dealing with the filling of vacancies in the House of Representatives in a time of national disaster.

Certainly the objective of constitutional amendment to repeal the poll tax or to eliminate the poll tax is an extremely vital one in regard to the national effort to further secure the voting rights of all qualified citizens. But I cannot support it, for two important reasons, and favor instead the enactment of a statutory means capable of achieving the same result with equal, if not added, effectiveness.

First, as a lawyer, I believe it is most inadvisable to use a constitutional amendment to do what I am convinced Congress is fully capable of doing by statute. It is particularly unwise, moreover, to invoke such practice when dealing with a question, like the poll tax, which has major ramifications in the civil rights field, where it seems inevitable that on many major bills to secure these rights, charges of unconstitutionality are constantly raised with respect to rights which are already, in fact, guaranteed by the Constitution.

Such questions are being raised already, for example, with respect to Federal voting registrars. If once we adopt the idea that we have to proceed in this field by constitutional amendment, it seems to me we handicap ourselves in the normal current of civil rights legislation. Therefore, if we do not need a constitutional amendment—and I think I can demonstrate that irrefutably in the legal discussion which will take place—then we who believe in eliminating the poll tax as a requirement for voting should certainly not seek to do it ourselves.

Then, too, Mr. President, as everyone knows, the constitutional amendment method is a very difficult and cumbersome one; for example, between 1927 and 1959, 1,819 constitutional amendments were proposed, but only 3 of that enormous number were ratified by the States as amendments to the U.S. Constitution. So it seems to me that is another reason why we should not take the constitutional amendment route.

Mr. President, I was extremely heartened to review again the remarks made by the sponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 126, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], the very distinguished sponsor of the constitutional amendment idea, and also the remarks made by the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], and other Members of the Senate at the time when the constitutional amendment joint resolution was introduced on August 6, 1959. They expressed with great sincerity their personal convictions that the poll tax should be removed, so that every citizen—regardless of race, color, creed, or national origin—who can qualify under State law to vote should be able to do so. However, their assurances that they believed this constitutional amendment would speedily be ratified were made before the report of the President's Civil Rights Commission was issued in September of last year. In light of the Commissioners' blanket indictment of the methods used to prevent—because of their race—otherwise qualified citizens from registering to vote in primaries and other Federal elections, I find it impossible to share a sense of optimism over the prospects of fast approval by the legislatures of the several States on such a constitutional amendment.

As the national income and per capita earnings have risen fairly steadily in recent years, there has been a tendency to downgrade the importance of the poll tax as a real financial barrier to qualified citizens who wish to vote; rather, it is decried as an archaic impediment and annoyance. While this may be true in some areas, I have obtained from the U.S. Census Bureau some rather interesting statistics which indicate that in certain States, such as Mississippi, the poll tax requirement could easily absorb at least half the weekly paycheck of a Negro voter who might otherwise be qualified to vote.

In 1957, the most recent year for which statistics are available, the average nonwhite wage earner in the South had an income of about $23 a week. In Mississippi, where the average income of nonwhites is still lower, the State has a cumulative 3-year poll tax requirement which can necessitate the payment by a voter of a total of $9, including $3 to cover each preceding election year during which no poll tax was paid. Thus, if a husband and wife, for example who live in Mississippi wished to vote, and could meet all the other State qualifications, they would have to pay a minimum total of $6, and they might have to pay a maximum of $18.

However, while it probably is true that the poll tax is not necessarily a prohibitive factor in regards to voting in most other States, it is one more well-known technique which is used in many areas of the South to further discourage Negroes from registering and voting at all. Therefore, through the introduction of this proposed legislation today, we are seeking to remedy this situation, through enactment by the Congress of a statute eliminating the use of poll tax and similar devices.

Mr. President, I conclude by saying that if one thing has stood out in the civil rights debates it is the fact that all of us agree that the first and primary thing for anyone to ask, even on a minimal basis, is that the Negro be given the right to vote; and that is what we are seeking by means of this measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments, in the nature of a substitute, submitted by the Senator from New York, on behalf of himself and other Senators, to Senate Joint Resolution 126, will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RESTORATION OF SIZE AND WEIGHT LIMITATIONS ON CERTAIN FOURTH-CLASS MAIL MATTER

Mr. LONG of Hawaii. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to restore the size and weight limitations on parcel post packages mailed to or from Alaska and Hawaii, as those limits existed prior to statehood.

As territories, residents of these two new States could send packages through first-class post offices up to 100 inches in length and girth, and weighing up to 70 pounds. However, statehood brought both Hawaii and Alaska under the tighter limitations which apply to the States of the mainland. These are 72 inches and 40 pounds for first-class post offices, as in Honolulu.

There is pending before this body Senate bill 1306, introduced by the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], which would make these larger limits generally applicable throughout our Nation. I am strongly in favor of S. 1306, because it seems obvious to me that the limits now imposed on parcel post shipments are inadequate and inconvenient for users of the U.S. mails. However, to emphasize the special need for continuing in Hawaii and Alaska the larger limitation which we enjoyed as Territories, limitations geared to our geographical position and completely unrelated to our territorial status, I am introducing this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2869) to restore the size and weight limitations on fourth-class matter mailed to or from Alaska and Hawaii which existed prior to their admission as States, introduced by Mr. LONG of Hawaii (for himself, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. FONG, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. GRUENING), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. YARBOROUGH submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 2436, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION OF COAL—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, at the next printing of the bill—S. 1362—to encourage and stimulate the production and conservation of coal in the United States through research and development by authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, acting through the Bureau of Mines, to contract for coal research and for other purposes, introduced by me on March 10, 1959, I ask unanimous consent that the names of Senators DIRKSEN, MURRAY, RANDOLPH, BYRD of West Virginia, SCOTT, COOPER, MORTON, BEALL, and BUTLER may be added as cosponsors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROMOTION OF ECONOMIC STABILIZATION—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] be added as a cosponsor to the bill—S. 2755—to assist in the promotion of economic stabilization by requiring the disclosure of finance charges in connection with extensions of credit, the next time the bill is printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONSTRUCTION LOANS FOR BRACKISH WATER CONVERSION PLANTS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 14, 1960, the names of Mr. GOLDWATER and Mr. FONG were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 2816) to authorize loans for the design and construction of sea and brackish water conversion plants, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. ALLOTT (for himself and other Senators) on January 14, 1960.

ISSUANCE OF GOLD MEDAL IN RECOGNITION OF SERVICES OF DR. THOMAS A. DOOLEY—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF JOINT RESOLUTION

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, last week I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 148, which would authorize the striking of a medal for Dr. Thomas Dooley for his remarkable services to humanity. I am happy to report there are some 41 Senators who have already joined in sponsorship of this resolution. The authority to join the resolution as a sponsor expired last night, but since that time the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], have indicated they wish to cosponsor the resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of these Senators may be added as cosponsors, and that when the joint resolution is reprinted they be shown among the sponsors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS FOR DURUM WHEAT—MOTION TO RECONSIDER—REQUEST FOR HOUSE TO RETURN BILL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to enter a motion for the reconsideration of Senate bill 1282, which was passed on August 21, 1959, and concerns production of Durum wheat.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion will be entered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the clerk of the Senate be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate bill 1282.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, 5 and 6 years ago type 15b rust virtually wiped out our domestic production of Durum wheat from which macaroni, spaghetti, and similar doughy products are produced. Production fell from more than 30 million bushels to less than 5 million.

With the aid of new irradiation techniques, we developed rust-resistant strains, meantime permitting farmers to plant extra acres to Durum for each acre of allotted wheat acreage they would put in the crop. In Montana, South Dakota, Minnesota, and California, farmers who had once produced Durum were induced to plant the crop again to maintain the semolina products industry, and this market for a farm product.

The bonus for planting allotted wheat acreage to Durum has been reduced with the development of rust-resistant strains. Now we find that we are not keeping up with demand, and that it is advisable to offer a small, 25-percent bonus to wheat producers to shift from types of wheat in surplus to this needed type.

Our carryover, or beginning stocks of Durum in the 1958–59 marketing season were 26 million bushels. This carryover has dropped to 20 million bushels, although we had an unusually high yield of 23.8 bushels per harvested acre in 1958. We had nearly a third increase in acreage in 1959, but our stocks of Durum are going to decline another 6 million bushels this year.

The Department of Agriculture now estimates our crop of 21 million bushels will be 6 million bushels short of disappearance and we will be down to 14 million bushels of stocks on July 1. There will have been a nearly 50-percent decline in stocks—from 27 million to 14 million bushels—in just 2 years.

When the Senate passed S. 1282 last August, we limited the 25 percent extra acreage allowed for planting Durum to growers who planted their entire wheat acreage allotment to Durum varieties. There are some farmers in my own State of Montana, in Minnesota, South Dakota, and California who would help meet our Durum requirements with such an inducement, but they do not want to gamble their entire income by planting their whole acreage allotment to this type of wheat. In the areas outside North Dakota, Durum is not so certain a crop as other wheats.

We believe that we have now worked out some agreement among growing areas on a proper bill and it is desired to recall S. 1282, amend and reenact it so it will be satisfactory to all concerned and more effectively meet our Durum requirements.

To the extent that farmers can be encouraged to produce a variety of wheat in demand, and not plagued by surpluses, we will reduce the production of varieties which are in surplus. Although limited geographic areas produce Durum, its production, instead of surplus varieties, is in the interest of all wheat producers and the Nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that some figures on the Durum wheat situation be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

USDA figures on the Durum wheat situation

[000 omitted]

	1958–59	1959–60 [1]	1960–61
Beginning stocks bushels	26,000	20,000	14,000
Production do	21,679	21,018
Imports do	174	175
Total supply do	47,853	41,193

[1] Calculations based on December Crop Report.

USDA figures on the Durum wheat situation—Continued

DISAPPEARANCE

[000 ommitted]

	1958–59	1959–60]	1960–61
Food	23,000	22,850
Feed and losses	2,442	1,968
Seed	1,767	1,775
Total domestic disappearance	27,209	26,593
Exports:
Grain	0	0
Semolina and flour	498	425
Macaroni and products	146	175
Total export disappearance	644	600
Total disappearance	27,853	27,193
Carryout	20,000	14,000

PRODUCTION STATISTICS

[Actual figures]

Acres planted	932,000	1,283,000
Yield bushels	22.9	16.1
Acres harvested	900,000	1,220,000
Yield bushels	23.8	17.0

PRINTING AS A SENATE DOCUMENT REPORT ENTITLED "FARM PRICE AND INCOME PROJECTIONS, 1960–65" (S. DOC. NO. 77)

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a report, entitled "Farm Price and Income Projections, 1960–65," which report is based upon conditions approximating unlimited production and marketing of agricultural products and which was prepared by the technical staff of the Department of Agriculture and an advisory committee of land-grant college economists be printed as a Senate document. At a session of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on this day I was authorized to make such a request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief comment on the findings. It is an objective, unbiased report. The basic data and conclusions were gathered and prepared by a group of the most competent technicians in the Department of Agriculture, at my request. The conclusions and evaluation were prepared by a committee of experts from several of the leading land-grant colleges. These conclusions, based upon conditions approximating free production and marketing of agricultural products in 1960–65, show that farmers' net income would fall to about $7 billion, which would mean less than 1½ percent of the gross national product at this time. This would be a drop of 46 percent from 1958, or less than half the net income farmers received in 1952, the year before this administration took office.

While it is true that the assumptions underlying these projections do not correspond exactly to the administration's present farm program, the report shows what would result under a program without any acreage controls or similar limitations, such as is apparently advocated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Specialized wheat producers under a wide-open program would find their net incomes reduced by one-half to three-fourths.

Even the largest and most efficient irrigated cotton producers would find their net incomes sharply reduced. Smaller dry land cotton producers would have to give up growing cotton.

Corn Belt feed grain and hog producers, in spite of sharply increased production, would find their net cash incomes almost one-half smaller than in recent years.

Mr. President, I need not go further to demonstrate that the so-called open throttle farm program of this administration is really a program which would throttle the farmer. It is worse than that. It is a program which would force most of agriculture into financial bankruptcy.

For several years now I have asked Mr. Benson to furnish the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with estimates of price and income effects of his recommendations. Now I see why he has been so unwilling to comply with my requests.

This objective report, the basic data for which were gathered by the most competent people in the Department of Agriculture, concludes that production will continue to increase at the rate of about 2 percent a year in spite of a sharp drop in farm prices. This is what many members of the Senate committee have contended by time after time it has been denied by Secretary Benson. Mr. President, is it surprising that farmers have lost confidence in the administration?

This report shows that under the wide-open program such as that advocated by Secretary Benson, wheat prices would drop to 90 cents a bushel, corn to 80 cents a bushel, rice to $3 per 100 pounds, cotton to 25 cents a pound, hogs to $11.20 per 100 pounds, and beef cattle to $15 per 100 pounds. These are the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. The advisory committee in reviewing them concluded that the average level of farm prices in the Department report is somewhat higher than is consistent with the estimated volume of marketings.

In other words these price and income estimates which I have been quoting probably would prove to be on the high side if the Secretary were to put his most recent programs into operation.

I hope that all the people of the United States will read this report carefully.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I congratulate the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I have before me an article from the U.S. News & World Report, dated December 14, 1959, which shows, as does the report the Senator has just presented, the effect on farm prices by 1962 and 1963, if there was no farm program. As the Senator has just stated, according to this study prices would drop even further—wheat to 74 cents a bushel, beef cattle to 11.51 cents a pound, and so forth.

This U.S. News & World Report article entitled "If the Government Gets Out of Farming"—refers to the work and studies of farm economists at Iowa State University.

I congratulate the authority on agricultural matters in the Senate, the distinguished chairman of our committee, for his very fine presentation today.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks the report contained in the December 14, 1959, issue of U.S. News & World Report.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IF GOVERNMENT GETS OUT OF FARMING

(In spite of billions spent supporting farm prices, farmers' purchasing power now is the lowest in 19 years. Would farmers do better without Government help? Look at this study from the heart of the corn belt.)

AMES, IOWA—This idea keeps popping up: Why not get the Government out of farming and let farm prices find their own level in a free market?

What would happen then? A study just completed by farm economists at Iowa State University attempts to answer that question.

The answer this study comes up with: There would be further, drastic declines in prices of farm products.

The table on this page shows you, commodity by commodity, the level of prices that the Iowa State economists would look for within 3 years if Government price supports and crop controls were removed.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture, in its latest price report, showed the level of prices for farm products at this time to be lower in relation to the prices that farmers pay for things they buy than at any previous time in 19 years. In others words, the purchasing power of a unit of farm products is less than at any time since 1940. That is the case in spite of Government price supports now in effect.

If price supports and crop controls are taken off, the study carried out at Iowa State University indicates that the following things would happen, assuming that surpluses now on hand are frozen and held off the market:

Grains: The bottom would drop out of the markets for wheat and corn. The price of corn, assuming normal weather in 1960, would drop down to 79 cents a bushel during the 1960–61 marketing year. The following year it would drop to 77 cents a bushel, and, in the 1962–63 marketing year, corn price would be down to 66 cents a bushel—lowest since 1940. Estimated average corn price for the current marketing year is $1.06 a bushel.

The study assumes that the 1960 wheat crop, much of which already is planted, would be sold with the market propped by price supports. So the first big drop in wheat prices would come with the 1961 crop. That year, the average price would drop to 90 cents a bushel, compared to the $1.71 a bushel estimated for the current year. Average price for the 1962 crop would sink to 74 cents a bushel, lowest since 1940.

Livestock: Price declines in these grains would result in great increases in the production of livestock. Wheat would join corn as a grain widely used to feed livestock and poultry. It is axiomatic among farmers that cheap feed means lower prices for livestock.

The market for beef cattle would hold up fairly well in 1960. By 1961, however, cattle prices would be dropping sharply. The average for the 1961–62 marketing year, without supports, is projected at $14.99 a hundredweight. In 1962–63, cattle prices would drop on down to $11.51 a hundredweight, just about half the average of $21.60 estimated for this year.

A reason given for the steep slide in cattle prices is that farmers now have a record number of cattle and calves on hand, and, with cheap feed, would put large supplies of beef on the market.

Hog prices would improve slightly in the 1960–61 marketing year. Then they would start dropping, reaching an average of $10.80 a hundredweight for 1962–63. That is 25 to 30 percent under present prices.

Milk, poultry, and eggs: Starting at the estimated average of $3.91 a hundredweight for the current year, milk prices would drop to $3.65 in 1960–61, to $3.42 in 1961–62, and to $2.66 in 1962–63. As shown in the table, prices for chickens, for turkeys and for eggs also would move downward over the 3-year period.

The Iowa State University economists emphasize that their study is not to be taken as a prediction of production and prices. Their projections, they state, "are the result of working through the implications of utilizing all grain that probably would be produced with no crop controls and average weather during the 1960 to 1963 period."

It was assumed that U.S. population would increase at the rate of 2.7 to 2.8 million a year during the period of the study and that per capita income would continue to rise.

Farm prices without supports: 74-cent wheat, 66-cent corn?

A forecast of how farm prices would drop if Federal price supports and crop controls were ended is given in an Iowa State University study, as follows:

	Prices now [1]	Estimated prices by 1962–63
Wheat, per bushel	$1.71	$0.74
Corn, per bushel	1.06	.66
Cotton, per pound	.315	.21
Beef cattle, per 100 pounds	21.60	11.51
Hogs, per 100 pounds	13.42	10.80
Milk, per 100 pounds	3.91	2.66
Eggs, per dozen	.327	.272
Broiler chickens, per pound	.167	.130
Turkeys, per pound	.221	.165
Lambs, per 100 pounds	18.62	15.13

[1] Averages, estimated for the 1959–60 marketing year.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON EXECUTIVE I, 86–1, AGREEMENT ON THE IMPORTATION OF EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC, AND CULTURAL MATERIALS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Committee on Foreign Relations, on January 26 at 10:30 a.m., in room 4221, New Senate Office Building, will hold a public hearing on Executive I, 86th Congress, 1st session, the agreement on the importation of educational, scientific, and cultural materials. This agreement, often referred to as the Florence Convention, was signed in behalf of the United States on June 24, 1959, and was transmitted to the Senate by the President on August 25, 1959. While designed to promote education, science, and cultural interchange, the proposed agreement essentially has the form of a tariff and trade measure.

All those wishing to present testimony regarding this agreement should contact the chief clerk of the committee without delay.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. RANDOLPH:

Address on the subject "Let's Help the Small Tobacco Farmer," by Representative KEN HECHLER, of West Virginia, before the Tobacco Division, U.S. Department of Agriculture, January 14, 1960.

Also correspondence between Joe R. Williams, Director of the Commodity Stabilization Service of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and Senator RANDOLPH.

By Mr. BARTLETT:

Correspondence with William B. Macomber, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State, in regard to hiring policies of the Arabian American Oil Co., in New York State.

COMMISSIONER DOMINY DISCUSSES WATER AND PEOPLE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, while we carry out our day-to-day duties in Congress in representing our constituents, we are in contact with the many different agencies, bureaus, and departments of the Federal Government. Despite the fact the executive is controlled by the opposition, I have received excellent cooperation from many, especially the Bureau of Reclamation. This Agency is of vital importance to Montana, because of its many activities in the State.

Commissioner Floyd Dominy has done a fine job in administering this bureau. Both he and the Secretary of the Interior, Fred Seaton, have been most helpful in developing the resources of our State; and they are to be commended. Much of this development has centered around the State's water resources, and water is the key to much of Montana's future.

It was the subject of water and people to which Commissioner Dominy directed the attention of the Great Falls (Mont.) Chamber of Commerce, several days ago. On January 11, when he spoke to this civic group, he outlined the important role that reclamation plays in the growth of Montana, and he placed particular emphasis on water and people as our two important resources. This is a thesis with which I am in complete agreement.

Mr. Dominy is well known in Montana as a friend. He is a resident of our neighboring State of Wyoming. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have his speech of January 11, and also an editorial from the January 13 issue of the Great Falls Tribune, printed at the conclusion of my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Also, I ask that a letter on this matter, addressed to the Secretary of the Interior by my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech, editorial, and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY COMMISSIONER OF RECLAMATION FLOYD E. DOMINY, BEFORE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, AT GREAT FALLS, MONT., JANUARY 11, 1960

I am honored indeed in addressing the Great Falls Chamber of Commerce here tonight. It is always a pleasure and privilege to come to Montana, but under the circumstances of several previous visits in recent months, it is a distinct and signal honor to be invited back. I only hope I am not wearing out my welcome.

I enjoy these meetings with you folks, I consider them part of my job—a very important part—and I assure you that the business of reclamation is so broad and complex that even in four tries we are not going to get everything said on the subject.

It is possible that some of you were present at Sidney last summer when we celebrated the golden anniversary of the lower Yellowstone project and reviewed the accomplishment and far-reaching influence of that oldtimer among reclamation developments.

Others among you were with me in August at Helena when we talked about the physical accomplishments of that growing teenager—the Missouri River Basin project.

The trilogy was completed at Butte in November when we talked about the impact of the entire water resource program on the people it is designed to serve.

Tonight I ask that we look at the basic ingredients of this program—water and people—and consider the future of Montana in the light of some implications which we can draw.

Montana sits astride the Continental Divide. As is the case with all the States along the backbone of the Rockies, Montana is a producer and exporter of water. She is an importer too, primarily from Wyoming on the south and Canada on the north.

Water leaves the State principally near the two northern corners, in the Missouri and Yellowstone Rivers on the east, and the Clark Fork and Kootenai Rivers on the west. These are all very respectable streams.

It was a surprise to me, though it probably will not be to you, to learn that the Missouri, as it leaves Montana, is the smallest of the four. It discharges on the average about 6.4 million acre-feet annually. The Yellowstone contributes about 8.6 million acre-feet annually on the average. These two, combined into the Missouri River are just slightly smaller than the Clark Fork River, which has an average annual flow of 15.2 million acre-feet. The Kootenai River discharges an average of 9.9 million acre-feet annually, with much of the water originating in Canada. In total these four rivers carry about 40 million acre-feet of water away from Montana. By way of comparison that is roughly double the capacity of Fort Peck Reservoir.

It would appear to the casual observer that with this amount of water leaving the State, there should be plenty for all uses and there should be no serious competition for water within the State. As a matter of record this is not the case. Annual averages do not mean that the water will be available for any given year when and where needed and competition for water has been an integral part of Montana history. The first manifestation of this conflict was the outlaw ditch, by which water was put to use illegally in conflict with established rights.

The illegal competition was only a passing phase but soon more significant conflicts developed for which solutions were needed.

For example, in the middle thirties the Bureau of Reclamation was asked to investigate the possibility of developing a supplemental water supply for the Gallatin Valley, where serious water shortages developed. The studies were completed and showed that there was adequate water in the Gallatin River to supply the requirements, and that the water users could probably pay the cost of reservoir construction.

At this point, however, the potential development ran squarely into the established rights of the Montana Power Co. for its hydro powerplants on the Missouri. There was water enough, on an annual basis, for both uses, to be sure, but storing the spring runoff of the Gallatin for irrigation use would have made the powerplants short at certain seasons. Furthermore, this conflict was not restricted to the Gallatin Valley. It precluded any further water development on the Missouri River or its tributaries, above Fort Peck Reservoir.

As a result of the situation uncovered by this investigation, a study of the entire upper Missouri River area was commenced—particularly the area above the uppermost Missouri River plant of the Montana Power Co. The results of the investigation were incorporated into the plan for development of the Missouri River Basin, authorized in 1944 as the Missouri River Basin project.

The crux of the whole plan as far as Montana is concerned, was Canyon Ferry Dam and reservoir, which is now a reality. To many people Canyon Ferry Reservoir is a place to boat or fish; to some, the rising waters in the spring endanger the nesting geese; to others the drawdown period in the fall creates ugly mud flats; some see the power potential created, and the flood damage abated; others, the existing agriculture changed and production insured through irrigation.

Each of these observations and attitudes has some foundation in fact. No reservoir construction can have only a single effect, good or bad; all serve multiple functions with different emphasis. Canyon Ferry Reservoir provides flood control, power, some direct irrigation and municipal water supply, fish and wildlife conservation and recreation—just about everything in the book.

But having said all this we have still missed the real point of Canyon Ferry. Its principal benefit to Montana is that it permits development of the resources of the Missouri Basin both upstream and downstream in Montana, including a potential 170,000 acres of irrigated land, and the use of water for various purposes without interfering with prior rights. It is one of the most valuable river control structures in the State, a fact which is often overlooked. The development of the east bench unit near Dillon—now an integral part of our construction program—would not be possible without Canyon Ferry.

But lest you get the impression that Canyon Ferry is a panacea for all Montana's water ills, let me assure you that it is not. In the first place it affects only the Missouri; in the second place, when one conflict is resolved another usually crops up. This is natural in a dynamic society.

Let me continue the illustration with which I started—the Gallatin Valley. The overall plan of development approved by the Congress in 1944, under which Canyon Ferry Reservoir was built, also included a proposal for providing supplemental water for the Gallatin Valley and expanding irrigation there by diverting water from the Madison River. It was a carefully thought out plan, believed to best resolve the then evident conflicting demands on the river system.

However, when we began more detailed planning, real conflict became apparent in the Madison Basin. The Madison River is a blue ribbon fishing stream. Any suggestion of manipulating or controlling its waters met with vigorous protest. We do not object to such protests. They are one of the privileges of our democracy and one of the ways in which these conflicts are made known. We did, in this case, become concerned over some of the intemperate remarks based on inaccuracies which came into the picture. I am a fisherman myself, and last summer I managed to play hookey for a day of fishing on the Madison. Several nice trout and a grayling were in the creel at the close of the day. I left the stream only a day before it was dammed by nature without consulting anyone.

As a result of the high priority given to the fishery value of the Madison River, our suggested plan for developing the Three Forks area was modified. There will be only local use of the Madison, should conditions ever warrant, and greater use of the Jefferson and Gallatin Rivers in their respective basins. So here we are back at the Gallatin Valley again.

When we made plans for storage at the Spanish Creek site in the 1930's, no question was raised about fish and wildlife conservation. When we studied the same proposition in the 1950's, these conservation values had become of such consequence as to be a major factor in the decision to place storage in a deferred category and not include it in the proposed plan of development.

The implications of this situation are serious. Where conflicts of this magnitude exist some way must be found to reconcile the conflict through compromise, or a choice must be made. Sometimes both processes are used. In the Jefferson River Basin we have been able to reach a compromise at Clark Canyon Reservoir on the Beaver Head River near Dillon, which is soon to go into construction, as a part of the East Bench unit of the Missouri River Basin project and a similar course seems practicable at Reichle Reservoir, on the Big Hole River, now in the detailed investigation stage.

Not everyone is satisfied with compromise, of course, because it always involves a retreat from a preferred and established position. Nevertheless, a compromise represents an important step in the democratic process of government and we bend our efforts to seeking the best compromise in the interests of the Government and the people it represents. In all cases, of course, the final arbitrator is the Congress, the direct representative of the people.

I have used an illustration involving a fishery problem because it is pertinent and carries through a full cycle. I don't want anyone to leave this gathering and report that the Commissioner of Reclamation is sniping at the conservation interests, because that is not the case. Conflict is represented in most of the potential purposes and benefits of multipurpose reclamation development, and it is one of our jobs to reach the most equitable solution.

Recreation in Montana is big business, and it is to a considerable extent dependent on wise use of water to maintain it. Similar groups such as yours constantly working to bring new industry to the State, and adequate supplies of water at reasonable cost will be one criterion of site selection. Your cities and towns are growing, and water supplies must keep pace. There are still hydroelectric power sites in the State, which can be developed economically. You have thousands of acres of land which will respond to irrigation.

The fact that 40 million acre-feet of water leave the State annually will not prevent conflicts among these uses within the States. That there will be conflicting demands beyond the borders of Montana is also a foregone conclusion. So far development of the Columbia and Missouri basins is not far enough along to create a pinch, but the next few years may see some real problems developing.

These conflicts and problems will be affected by the decisions you make in Montana as to future development. There is a potential additional consumptive use of 2 million acre-feet of water annually for irrigation in the eastern part of Montana where most of the arable land lies. To the extent that this development takes place and the water is thus used, it will reduce the 15 million acre-feet leaving the State on the east and available for downstream use, and competition will be increased.

On the other hand, the regulation required in Montana to effect use of this water will be advantageous to all users, within and without the State, because the resulting flow will be more uniform. Similarly as other uses are developed which will not reduce the total flow leaving the State, they will serve to regulate the flows and make them more useful.

This situation also exists in the western part of the State but because opportunities for consumptive use of water are less and the total volume of water is much greater the net effect will be less pronounced.

I mentioned at the outset of these remarks that I planned to talk about two of Montana's most important resources, water and people. Thus far I have dealt only with water and the problems you face in future development. Now, what about people.

I have before me, unofficial population estimates for the last decade. They show that the West as a whole is the fastest growing area in the country and that only the Pacific States, Washington, Oregon, and California, exceed the Rocky Mountain States in population gains.

The Rocky Mountain States show a gain of 32 percent, up 1.6 million from 1950. Montana participated in this increase to the extent of 96,000 people, a gain of 16 percent over 1950. With such a steady increase, should not Montana be concerned with further development of its natural resources, particularly water, for water is the key which unlocks the treasure chest for further economic development and growth?

I say you should and must tie in the planning of water resources development with your planning for population and economic growth. Just because you have experienced some solid growth in the last decade is no reason to rest on your oars.

The new census will probably show a total national population of 180 million people. Within the next 20 years, this total is expected to go to 250 million and by 2010, we can expect it to double, probably ranging around 370 million.

The wide open spaces will feel the impact of this population growth and your State will be under constant pressure to find new economic opportunities for coming generations. You can take advantage of this future growth, indeed live up to the challenge and responsibility it offers only if you maintain a steady pace in development and utilization of your natural resources.

Thus as these pressures grow, as the competition for water becomes keener, there will be new conflicts both within and beyond the State boundaries. Because of them you have an obligation to the State and the Nation to insure that maximum effective use is made of the water you have. I emphasize that word maximum.

No longer can the status quo or personal preference or loud voices of special interest groups be the criterion of priority of development. No longer should a single purpose be permitted to block development which can be clearly demonstrated to provide greater multiple benefits. The stakes are too high in terms of Montana's total best interests.

Neither can the Bureau of Reclamation or any other Federal agency make the decision—nor do we want to. It is your problem—one to be resolved in the light of all available information—in an atmosphere of cool considered judgment—by the best talent you have.

I urge you to create a climate of open-minded public opinion and adequate machinery in your State government to study the facts, and weigh the consequences of the several alternatives. You will then be able to present a united front in support of the wisest use of the natural resources which have been entrusted to your care. No one can do more.

[From the Great Falls (Mont.) Tribune of Jan. 13, 1960]

MONTANA CANNOT AFFORD TO LAG IN WATER USE DEVELOPMENT

No stranger to the West is Commissioner of Reclamation Floyd E. Dominy. Reared on a Nebraska farm, a graduate of the University of Wyoming, and a former Wyoming county agent, his grass-roots acquaintance with life and growth problems in Montana and other Rocky Mountain States was clearly evident to the Great Falls Chamber of Commerce audience Monday evening.

"Water and People" was the subject of Dominy's talk—a combination which if properly brought to bear on Montana's great variety of natural resources will open up a vast wealth of new economic opportunities for today's and future generations in this "Land of the Shining Mountains."

Sitting astride the Continental Divide, Montana is a producer and exporter of water aplenty to supply all possible needs of agriculture, industry, recreation and resident use—current and future. Montana is also an importer of water, primarily from Wyoming on the south and Canada on the north.

As Dominy remarked, it would appear to the casual observer that, with the amount of water that leaves Montana and the amount that flows into the State, there should be no serious competition for water within the State. It is a matter of record, however, that competition for water has been an integral part of Montana history. We have become increasingly aware of that competition in recent years—competition not only between regions but also among the various uses. And as we grow in population and industry that competition will grow inside and beyond Montana.

Two things we must keep in mind with regard to this competition for water in and outside of Montana. We cannot afford to allow our use competition for water within the State to prevent its development in the best interests of all the people. And we cannot afford to lag in our statewide development program, or we will lose in the race with outside competitors while they gain prior rights to the water which arises in and flows unused from Montana.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., January 19, 1960.

Hon. FRED A. SEATON,
Secretary of the Interior,
Department of the Interior,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I want you to know that I was particularly pleased to read the speech made by your Commissioner of Reclamation Floyd Dominy before the Great Falls Chamber of Commerce on January 11. He stated the value of Canyon Ferry Dam and Reservoir to the Missouri Basin as succinctly as it has ever been put. I am sending copies of his speech to some interested newsmen in the area so that more Montanans may have an opportunity to read the Commissioner's statement about Canyon Ferry.

I was also pleased that your Commissioner emphasized that Montanans "have an obligation to the State and the Nation to insure that maximum effective use is made of the water you have." I hope this full development concept is reflected in the Department's report on S. 1226 which would authorize construction of a dam in the Clark Fork-Flathead Basin of western Montana.

With warm personal regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. MURRAY.

GRANGE PLATFORM FOR 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, we have heard a discussion this morning about a remedy in the agricultural situation. The remedy which has been spoken of may be a remedy or it may not be. I doubt very much whether there is any remedy, unless we can, first, curtail production and, second, get distribution.

I happen to have before me a statement about the program of the Grange. As Senators know, I am a member of the Grange, and I have been for a good many years. This program is taken from the National Grange Monthly, and it has no relation to a miracle. It contains a number of suggestions. It bears in mind, which I think is the important feature, the fact that practically every depression we have had has started in the farm areas.

If we start monkeying with farm receipts we shall be in trouble. The farmer is the only fellow in America who does not receive his equitable share of the consumer's dollar for what he produces. That is definite. I could cite a number of instances to prove it.

The real problem we face is how to get distribution.

It was my privilege yesterday to be at the White House, and was my privilege also to have a few words with the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson. We are happy that he has recovered. He told me of a very interesting incident. He said, "Senator, you have been talking about adequate distribution. I want to tell you something. You know, we are educating the Japanese people to eat wheat and to drink milk, which they never did before. We have programs in that regard."

I was in that country myself, and saw that program in action. It seems to me that is the beginning of a solution to the farm problem, which is in the right direction.

Mr. President, as the Congress searches for a solution to our complex farm problems, we turn, as always, to the farmers, themselves, and farm organizations for constructive thinking on ways and means of assuring a healthy agriculture.

Unfortunately, it is not always possible to get agreement, even among those in agriculture, as to what is best for the farm economy. Nevertheless, we must continue to carefully examine the proposals emanating from farmers and their organizations in striving to find ways and means of preventing a further downtrend in farm income. According to USDA reports, purchasing power of the Wisconsin farmer's dollar has dropped almost to depression levels of a quarter century ago.

At its 93d annual convention, the National Grange—one of our great farm organizations—outlined a farm program for 1960. The Grange said that it seeks:

(1) Parity of income for producers; (2) income from the sale of farm products—not from taxpayers; (3) a continued program of abundance; (4) increased producer bargaining power; (5) producer-managed marketing programs; and (6) an expanded expert program that would permit farmers to compete in world markets on the basis of quality and efficiency.

As a strong voice in agriculture, I believe the 1960 platform of the Grange merits the consideration of Congress.

Recently this platform, entitled "On This We Stand," was published in the National Grange Monthly, including programs which the Grange favors and opposes. I ask unanimous consent to have this article printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ON THIS WE STAND—A SUMMARY OF THE GRANGE PLATFORM FOR 1960 AS ADOPTED AT THE CONVENTION

The Grange favors—

Programs to provide increased producer bargaining power.

Orders and agreements to provide farmer control over the marketing of agricultural commodities.

Adequate appropriations for extension and research.

Priority for research relating to utilization and marketing of farm products.

More strict quality control over export wheat.

Increased duty on imported sheep and dressed lamb.

Meat grading program modifications necessary to eliminate undue hardships on producers, handlers, or consumers of meat.

A continuation of the conservation reserve program.

Adequate appropriations for Farmers Home Administration with special emphasis on tenant purchase program.

A continuation of the present tobacco program.

The school lunch and milk program.

Making surplus commodities available to county or State tax-supported institutions as well as to schools.

A continuation of present peanut program.

A continued use of the parity income formula philosophy.

Continuation of the sugar program.

A self-help dairy stabilization program.

Legislation protecting State and individual water rights from Federal preemption.

The continuing development of soil districts.

Increased emphasis on programs for upstream watershed protection.

Tax-exempted farmer contributions to a retirement program.

Official designation of ample supplies of foods as a security reserve.

Legislation permitting farmers to use a 5-year average in figuring income for tax purposes.

Appropriations from general U.S. fund—for completing authorized Federal highway program.

A uniform system of road signs, signals, and markers adopted by all States.

Farmer representation on Interstate Commerce Commission.

Coordinated piggy-back rail-truck service.

Continued private ownership of railroads.

Decisive immediate action to implement a sound and adequate rural civil defense program.

Classroom grouping according to potential ability of students.

Equalization of school support burden.

Establishment of additional junior colleges to meet needs of rural areas.

More adequate rural health facilities, including additional qualified personnel.

Accelerated research to develop pesticides less toxic to humans.

A continuation and fuller use of Public Law 480.

Where possible, the use of farm commodities in place of foreign aid dollars.

EXTENDING AND EXPANDING THE SPECIAL MILK PROGRAM

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, my colleagues will recall that a few days ago, on January 13, I introduced a bill, S. 2797, to extend and expand the special milk program.

As Senators know, the program has provided a great service in the direction of making healthful milk available to children in schools and in other nonprofit institutions, including summer camps, child-care centers, settlement houses, and similar institutions. During its lifetime the program, operated on a cost-sharing basis, has met with real enthusiasm.

Annually, the service has expanded from a modest beginning until in 1959 more than 81,000 institutions were participating in the program distributing about 2.2 billion half pints of milk to the children of the Nation.

Unfortunately, funds have again run short; consequently, the USDA has put out a directive that, as of March 1, the Federal contribution will be somewhat curtailed.

The action has resulted in a great deal of deep concern on the part of school and other officials of institutions operating such programs. Overall, these school and community leaders have made an outstanding effort to provide such service for the children of the community. A cutback in Federal participation now is expected to create real hardship—since, in many instances, milk is provided for children from low income or otherwise less fortunate groups. The action by congressional agricultural committees in scheduling early hearings for consideration of supplemental funds is most commendable.

To illustrate the deep concern with which cutbacks in the special milk program are viewed by our school officials and other leaders concerned with the program, I request unanimous consent to have additional messages relating to the need for supplemental funds to avoid cutbacks of the milk-distribution service printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WISCONSIN SCHOOL FOOD SERVICE ASSOCIATION

Whereas the special milk program in Wisconsin has demonstrated its value in providing essential nutritional benefits to schoolchildren of the State; and

Whereas such program has provided a substantial and ready market for the abundant milk production of Wisconsin's dairy farms; and

Whereas the Secretary of Agriculture has announced by amendment to regulations the reduction in reimbursement rates for milk served under the terms of the special milk program effective March 1, 1960; and

Whereas such reduction of one-half cent per half pint would tend to work a hardship on school districts and children participating in such program; and

Whereas school budgets and finances for the current year have been established and cannot be readily amended to provide for the additional funds which this action would require; and

Whereas this action would in itself tend to discourage the expansion of the special milk program in Wisconsin and deny the nutritional benefits of this worthy program to the many needy children of the State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the executive board of the Wisconsin School Food Service Association do hereby resolve that the association go on record as opposing such action by the Secretary of Agriculture and requesting that the Representatives and Senators in Congress from Wisconsin initiate and support such legislation as would rescind the action taken by the Secretary of Agriculture and reinstate the prevailing rates of reimbursement for special milk, and that copies of this resolution be provided to Representatives and Senators from Wisconsin.

WISCONSIN SCHOOL FOOD SERVICE ASSOCIATION,
R. W. FENSKE, President.

TWO RIVERS PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Two Rivers, Wis., January 18, 1960.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senator from Wisconsin,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: On November 11, 1959, the Secretary of Agriculture issued an amendment to his regulations governing the operation of the special milk program in which the rates of reimbursement are to be reduced by one-half cent per one-half pint of milk beginning March 1, 1960.

The objective of reimbursements for school lunch programs and milk programs is to aid in making it possible for all of our children to have at least one-half pint of milk per day. The present rate of reimbursement is pretty much guaranteed that even where there are several children in one family it has been possible for families to provide this cost.

It is our feeling that additional reimbursement funds should be forthcoming to provide milk for schoolchildren rather than to decrease the amount of reimbursement which could result in many of our children not being able to participate in the milk program.

Yours very truly,

H. G. KNUDTSON,
Superintendent.

GRANVILLE HIGH SCHOOL,
Milwaukee, Wis., January 18, 1960.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We who are involved in the school lunch program are very much disturbed by the recent amendment of November 11, 1959, by the Secretary of Agriculture concerning regulations governing the operation of the special milk program for which the rates of reimbursement are to be reduced by one-half cent per one-half pint of milk beginning March 1, 1960.

The school lunch program in our school district is probably as valuable as any of our curricular programs. We feel that without Government support at even a higher level than previously, the program will suffer.

I am, therefore, urging you to defeat or repeal this amendment made by the Secretary of Agriculture. We need your support desperately in what we feel is a very vital issue in the school lunch program.

Thank you very much for your support in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

D. J. MCDONELL,
Business Manager.

WAUKESHA PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Waukesha, Wis., January 18, 1960.
Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: It has just come to my attention that the Secretary of Agriculture issued an amendment on November 11, 1959, which states that our allowance on milk will be reduced one-half cent per one-half pint beginning March 1, 1960.

This poses a very serious problem for us, because at the present time we can sell our milk with the hot lunch program at 1 cent and milk without the lunch program at 2 cents. If the subsidy is reduced one-half cent, you can see that we will have to charge the children 1 cent more in each instance than we do now, since most children buy only half pints at a time.

If this is going to be a legal policy, that is one thing; however, if the subsidy is reduced for a temporary period and then is increased to normal again, it causes greater confusion and inconvenience at the local level.

I hope you will use your influence to bring about action that will leave the subsidy the same so that we are not forced into an embarrassing situation in local schools.

Cordially yours,

R. G. HEIN,
Superintendent.

PLYMOUTH JOINT SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 8,
Plymouth, Wis., January 18, 1960.
Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: It has come to our attention that according to proposed regulations of the Department of Agriculture the reimbursement on the school milk program will be reduced by one-half cent per one-half pint beginning March 1, 1960.

I suppose it is the usual thing for people to raise a hue and cry whenever a Government subsidy of any kind is about to be discontinued or reduced. It does seem, however, that the reduction of the reimbursement on the school milk program involves more than the ordinary philosophy underlying a Government support program. We have in this consideration, it seems to me, the matter of health of our Nation's children as well as the program of reducing milk surpluses.

As I have discussed the school milk program with parents in our community, I have observed wholehearted endorsement of this particular Federal support program by people in both the city and county. Although the proposed reduction is small, it cannot help but result in a corresponding increase of cost for milk to the pupil, as the milk and lunch programs operate on as close to a just-break-even basis as possible. With an increase in price, it is rather evident that the consumption of milk by schoolchildren will decrease.

At a time when Congress is seriously considering additional school aids, it seems inconsistent to reduce an aid program which appears to be operating effectively and well accepted by the public.

In the interest of a working support program for agriculture, as well as an investment in the physical well-being of the children in this country, I urge that you exercise the influence of your membership in the Congress to restore the proposed cut in school milk subsidy to its present level.

Thanking you for your kind consideration of this matter, I remain,

Very truly yours,

ELDEN M. AMUNDSON,
Superintendent.

PLAINFIELD PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Plainfield, Wis., January 18, 1960.
Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WILEY: Funds for the school lunch milk program are running out and the State informs us that there will be a cutback if Congress doesn't act at once. The health of our young people is our frontline of defense. I know how you stand on this vital issue but we again need your leadership to get something done at once.

There are bills up to construct classrooms with Federal funds. What we need is a place where we can borrow money at 3 percent interest to build our own classrooms. There is enough Federal money wasted to take care of both these programs.

Regarding your letter of December 10, 1958, "When the 86th Congress convenes, I shall introduce legislation aimed at increasing the allowable extra earnings from $1,200 to $1,800 a year" (social security). Social security was not set up to provide a living; $1,200 annually is unrealistic and should be changed at once. Best regards and a Happy New Year.

Sincerely,

C. S. PICKERING.

PLATTEVILLE PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Platteville, Wis., January 18, 1960.
Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: It has come to our attention that, as of March 1, reimbursement for the special milk program in the school lunch program is going to be reduced by one-half cent per one-half pint.

The school lunch and school milk programs have been of very definite benefit to the schools, not only in this community, but throughout the State and Nation. Children are getting milk and lunches where previously they were unable to get them due to the economic conditions of the family at home. In order that we may distribute milk and lunches to all who need them, it has been necessary to keep costs to an absolute minimum and, in some cases, provide free lunches or free milk where the child was unable to pay for the same.

With this anticipated reduction in Federal reimbursement, it will be necessary for us to do one of two things. We must either increase the price that we charge the individual child, or the additional cost will have to be absorbed by the school district and become an increased burden on the local property tax.

I would like to take this opportunity to request you and your office to do what you can to try to get the reimbursement reinstated, or take whatever other measures are necessary to avoid shifting this additional cost to the local taxpayer. We are very much afraid, in fact, in some cases we are positive that if we raise the price, the number of children participating will definitely be reduced.

Sincerely,

DONALD E. DIMICK,
Superintendent.

BOARD OF EDUCATION,
OCONTO FALLS PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Oconto Falls, Wis., January 18, 1960.
The Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILEY: We, the board of education of Oconto Falls, request your support in taking action to continue the existing rates of reimbursement for the special school milk program.

Thank you in advance.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY WOLF,
JOSEPH PORTER,
WINONA DOBRATZ,
HOWARD LEHNER,
STERLING BAUMAN,
AARON RUDOLPH,
HERB BRAUN,
Board of Education.

UPLIFTING TELEVISION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, of all mass media of communications television is the most popular and most powerful. It is the easiest to turn on, it is the most difficult to turn off. It has special appeal to our children and youth because it is dramatic, and combines pictures with words. I believe that some of the sociologists undertaking all kinds of remote and exotic studies would do well to examine a problem in our midst—the impact of television and television philosophies and morals on American youth.

Television presents a tremendous power, which can be either properly used—or else misused. All reasonable efforts must, therefore, be made to maintain it on a level which produces public benefit rather than waste and harm. This, however, is most difficult to accomplish due to the fact that advertisers desire large television audiences and will sponsor programs that appeal to the largest mass of people, without regard to their cultural, moral, or social value.

The public interest in radio and television is demonstrated by the fact that these instruments of mass media are public controlled and government owned in many countries—including Britain, where the BBC is a government-controlled system.

Naturally, we believe in freedom of speech and expression in this country, and have thought it advisable to leave radio and television to the management and competition of free enterprise. Yet, this does not relieve those responsible for American radio and television from discharging their public duty. This they have not always done well—much too often they have imposed on the public programs which appeal to the lowest common denominator of the viewing audience.

How to achieve a higher standard of radio and television without the necessity of Government control is a question not easily answered. Recently, however, Chairman John C. Doerfer, of the Federal Communications Commission, has suggested one way in which television can be upgraded without any control by the FCC over programing. He would have each network and its affiliated stations devote a preferred hour, for 1 week each, to cultural and educational programs. The next week another network would take its turn at presenting upgraded programs. These cultural programs, that the audience will see on the local station, would be divided between network originated programs and locally produced informational or cultural programs.

I believe that Chairman Doerfer should be highly commended for this excellent proposal. He appears to me to provide a solution in the American way—in which Government control is kept to a minimum, while the interested parties are required to show a higher degree of self-restraint and public responsibility.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an editorial from today's Washington Post and Times Herald entitled "Upgrading Television." It is time the television industry recognized more fully its public duty, because, in the words of the Washington Post and Times Herald, "The possibilities for making television a more useful tool of communication remain enormous."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UPGRADING TV

Chairman John C. Doerfer, of the Federal Communications Commission, has suggested one way in which television can be upgraded without any control by the FCC over programing. He would have one network and its affiliated stations carry cultural or educational programs each evening at a preferred hour for 1 week. Presumably the specified half hour would be given to network programs several evenings during the week and to locally produced informational or cultural programs on the other evenings. The next week another network would take its turn at presenting upgraded programs during the same half hour. The net result would be that educational programs would be available at a fixed time on one network or another every evening.

The plan has had a good reception among the broadcasters and it seems to have very promising possibilities. No doubt the individual stations will need a good deal of flexibility in substituting cultural programs of their own for what the networks may offer, but that would not neecssarily detract from the virtues of the plan. If the television industry takes the hint from the FCC Chairman and finds ready acceptance of a "cultural half hour," the next step might well be the development of a "public affairs half hour" worked out on a similar rotating basis. The possibilities for making television a more useful tool of communications remain enormous.

SECRETARY BENSON STANDS UP FOR JUSTICE

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, a recent editorial appearing in the Philadelphia Inquirer contains a fine tribute to one of our truly dedicated public officials, Secretary of Agriculture, Ezra Benson.

It is gratifying to me that Secretary Benson continues to fight to relieve the American taxpayer from the mounting costs of farm subsidies and overstuffed granaries—for the good of the farmer and our economy in general.

I request unanimous consent that the editorial be inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Dec. 16, 1959]

SECRETARY BENSON STANDS UP FOR JUSTICE

Regardless of the political storms that follow Secretary Benson's every move—and will continue to do so in the 1960 election year—he stands out as a man who never fails to rise above partisan attack and continues to advocate what he believes to be in the best interests of the country as a whole.

Governor Rockefeller of New York spoke forcefully in defense of Mr. Benson—and justifiably so, we believe—in denouncing those who would make the Secretary of Agriculture a scapegoat for the multitude of economic ills that plague the farmers of America.

Rockefeller outlined a possible solution to the farm problem—one of many such proposals that have and will be presented and should receive careful study by Congress next year.

The farmers' troubles started long before Benson arrived on the scene. He has done his best, against formidable opposition, to free the farmers from the yoke of Federal controls and free all taxpayers—rural and urban—from the oppressive cost of farm subsidies.

Philadelphians and other city dwellers have good reason to give thanks to Mr. Benson. They pay not only a large share of the subsidy costs but higher food prices that result from the Federal farm program.

With the Government's stockpile of surplus crops now in excess of $9,200 million and expected to reach the $10 billion mark by early next year, it seems to us that Secretary Benson is absolutely right in demanding new legislation to reverse the present trend of ever-larger crop surpluses and constantly rising farm subsidies.

Mr. Benson's stand for what is right and just—regardless of political considerations—deserves greater appreciation and applause from the public than has been heard thus far.

We liked his reply when asked about rumors that he might resign.

"Resign? I am resigned to one thing—to do my duty as I see it."

Secretary Benson should stick to his guns. It will not be easy. But standing up for what is right, instead of what is expedient, never is.

REVIEW OF RECORD OF THE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, 7 years ago, on a wintry day in January, a large assemblage of the American people gathered to hear the new President of the United States deliver a message, the essence of which was that he intended to be guided by a single precept, namely, what is good for all America.

He sent up a little prayer to heaven, for divine guidance in the pursuit of his dedication to his task. On that day, when he and his youthful and well-trained Vice President took the oath of office, I assume that the American people wanted, during the ensuing 7 years and thereafter, to believe that when we should arrive at this day in January 1960, they might be living in a nation which is at peace; that they might be living in a republic which has prospered, and which would have grown in those 7 years, in national wealth and savings, and in the personal welfare of individual Americans.

I believe that as they listened to the distinguished and beloved new President of the United States, they must have wished that the Government would accept and respect its responsibilities, and would accept and live up to the concept that the individual, the local community, and the State also have obligations which they must be prepared to assume in the interest of the only true liberalism, the freedom and dignity of the human individual; and that the Government and the people would effect a working partnership under the guidance of this administration to achieve that end.

It is a very happy day, in this happy land of ours, when, 7 years later, the dreams and aspirations of the American people are, in fact, realized; that indeed, as the people hoped that day, we are living in a land at peace; that indeed we are living in a land where progress goes hand in hand with the development of the individual's aspirations and the continuing recognition by the Government of the need for restraint, discipline, good housekeeping, thrift, and care in the handling of the revenues which it receives from our people.

After 7 years, it can certainly be said that that President and his administration have kept the faith. They have deserved well of the Republic. One evidence of that, among others, is the announcement in the press yesterday that 71 percent of the people approve of this President and of his course of conduct as the chief of the administration, and only 17 percent think otherwise.

We have heard also during these years that our rate of growth has put us behind the Soviet Union; that our rate of growth is only 3 percent, and that the rate of growth of the Soviet Union is 8 percent. Those same people have not bothered to tell their constituents or their listeners that 3 percent of the American prosperity is much greater, in dollars and in goods and good living, than 8 percent of the Soviet equivalent. But I am sure they will be either pleased or discomfited—according to their several natures—to know that when the budget was submitted by the President the other day, the rate of growth for the past year was shown to be not 3 percent, but 6 percent. While we were ahead of the Soviet Union then, in total results achieved, we have now doubled the rate of growth which we were accused of having in earlier years.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will my good friend from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am grateful that the Senator has called attention to this date when President Eisenhower enters upon his final year as our Chief Executive. In his time of service the President has in the truest sense presided over the growth and greatness of our Nation.

We should be especially mindful, on the occasion of this milestone date, of the historic contribution the President has made to world understanding by his journeys to the hearts of men, by his unremitting efforts to project the true image and the true meaning of America to the peoples of foreign lands. Through his inspired efforts, he has torn away the false curtain of propaganda, he has made peace a living word of hope, he has held out the hand of friendship and felt its warm clasp in return.

As he enters his final year in office, the President stands as a global symbol of peace and friendship. We can be sure he will meet the great events and great challenges of the months to come with the same high spirit of dedication that has marked the past years of his office. May we join in wishing him Godspeed on this epochal day.

I am grateful to my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania for permitting me to join him in these remarks.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York. I conclude by saying that the true test of effective leadership is to be found in the judgment of the people. The people of this country have unfailingly today in very great numbers indicated their respect and trust and confidence in that kind of leadership, and have shown that they want to have continued that leadership, which will engender trust, faith, and confidence. It is significant to note that the President has been judged the Man of the Decade from among all the world's leaders. The judgment of the world and the judgment of the people of this country is that we have a good, strong, devoted, faithful, and effective leader. He has been ably supported in his leadership by his administration, by you, sir, Mr. President, and by all those who have the responsibility and obligation of Government resting on them.

FEDERAL REGISTRARS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the decision of the Committee on Rules and Administration, announced this morning, to terminate its hearings on the proposed Federal registrar bills on or before February 5, is good news for all who wish to see real progress in the field of civil rights.

The timely ending of these hearings will insure orderly consideration of civil rights proposals at this session of the Senate. It is my intention as soon as the committee reports a Federal registrar bill to the Senate to offer a comprehensive amendment which will include all seven planks in the President's program plus a provision which will give the Attorney General the right to bring civil injunctive suits in all equal protection cases. This will permit the entire subject of civil rights to be placed before the Senate in a manner which should satisfy even the most sticklish parliamentarian. And it will make possible fulfillment of the promise of a Senate civil rights debate starting February 15 regardless of any action in the House of Representatives or inaction by the Committee on the Judiciary.

None of the bills dealing with Federal registrars which are presently before the committee is entirely satisfactory to me in every detail, although I support the general principle of these bills. I am confident that an effective registrars bill will be drafted in committee which will command the support of the majority of the members of the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. President, in my judgment the action of the committee this morning is an insurance policy against any possibility that consideration of civil rights legislation will be delayed because the other body may not have acted and may not have sent a bill to us before February 15.

THE MEANING OF THE DILLON PLAN

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, there appears in today's issue of the New York Times an article captioned "Foreign Affairs—the Meaning of the Dillon Plan." The article was written by Mr. C. L. Sulzberger, and bears a London dateline.

Again I call the attention of the Senate to this plan; and I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, because I believe the Dillon plan is one of the most significant developments since World War II. By means of the Dillon plan, the United States now is seeking to obtain as partners, in connection with the giving of aid to less developed areas, the principal countries of the free world.

This matter is extremely important, for two reasons: First, we, alone, cannot do the job in an adequate way. That fact has been demonstrated in a practical manner, although we have done a great deal and have done a very fine job insofar as we have been able to proceed. Second, in the United Nations there are not sufficient funds to enable the doing of this job.

Therefore, Mr. President, the Dillon plan is the one to use in order to do the job—namely, use the NATO countries, and add to them Japan, Brazil, Australia, and other countries which can join in giving help.

Again I must report to the Senate that the initiative in this entire effort—commenced as far back as the fall of 1958, and continued in September, 1959—was taken by the NATO Parliamentarians Conference, to which the Congress adheres, and was taken primarily through its Economic Committee, of which I have the honor to be Chairman. I point out that development as one of the fruits of the NATO Parliamentarians Conference; and it is important that we do point out the very worthwhile fruits of that organization and similar organizations, inasmuch as we participate in the many activities of the NATO Parliamentarians Conference, the Interparliamentary Union, the Council of Europe, and similar groups.

Mr. President, the initiative taken by the NATO Parliamentarians Conference, to which we adhere, and which we help support, is worth manyfold, incalculably more, than all that we have spent in time and effort in supporting that organization, and even if we lump together our contributions to all the parliamentary organizations to which we adhere. I believe the Dillon plan is one development by means of which that work has borne extremely fine fruit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCOTT in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—THE MEANING OF THE DILLON PLAN

(By C. L. Sulzberger)

LONDON.—The United States has now accepted the Soviet challenge to an era of competitive coexistence during which there will be increasing emphasis on an economic contest to win the ideological allegiance of underdeveloped lands. This is the real meaning of the developing policy known unofficially in Europe as the Dillon plan.

The decade of the fifties, dominated by the growth of NATO and the anti-NATO Warsaw Pact, was marked by military rivalry between the Communists and the West. The decade of the sixties will almost surely be marked by a similar economic rivalry if the balance of armed strength can be maintained.

Under the Dillon plan, which is only beginning to take shape, the following new departures may be discerned in our policy. We seek to unite the two European trading blocs, North America and Japan in a single organization to coordinate overseas economic aid.

We are quashing an incipient trade war between the European blocs before it can damage Western unity or hurt U.S. commercial interests. And, for the first time, we hope to harness Japan's industry in tandem with that of the West to help backward nations.

This program is a logical successor to the Marshall plan, which put Europe back on its feet. The Marshall plan served as the bony structure upon which NATO was built and also aspired to provide the framework for West European unity. There it failed. Europe split into a continental bloc led by France and West Germany, known as the Inner Six, and a peripheral bloc, known as the Outer Seven and led by Britain, concerned with its Commonwealth interests.

Washington intends to prevent this division from maturing into a political schism that would weaken NATO. It also intends to insure that any arrangements between the Six and Seven are not prejudicial to us. Furthermore, it hopes to join both groups with all other free industrial nations in a program to assist poor lands.

Rich countries have been getting richer and poor countries poorer. Therefore, Africa and Asia need emergency help to avoid eventual chaos. The raw materials, potential markets, and strategic location of these lands make it essential for us to keep them from Communist control.

Inside our administration there has been discussion on the best way to meet the challenge. Some advocated a global aid program in which the free and Communist worlds would work together under the U.N. It has now been decided to reject that idea.

An era of frankly competitive coexistence is therefore accepted with our own and the Soviet coalition each determined to make political and propaganda capital out of eleemosynary efforts. The U.N.'s special programs will clearly be relegated to a subordinate role.

The Dillon plan was developed by the Under Secretary of State after his return from a GATT conference in Toyko last October. Simultaneously Sir Oliver Franks, British economist and former Ambassador to Washington, and Jean Monnet, French economist, were elaborating similar approaches.

Since last month's Western summit meeting the Six and the Seven, without really burying their dispute, have at least agreed to work together, where possible, to curb threats of discrimination against each other and against us, and to join in the overall aid program. Shortly they will accept Tokyo's partnership.

The new organization to be created will therefore be on a free world rather than an Atlantic basis. But the United States and other prospective members expect to name as delegates to it their present envoys to NATO, thus insuring good economic liaison with the latter.

The logic behind the Dillon plan is simple. The United States helped restore prosperity to Europe and Japan. Now it is time for them to join North America in a similar endeavor elsewhere. The war against poverty and confusion is being fought on vast battlefields. Our goal is not only to hoist underprivileged peoples by the bootstraps but to insure them against communism.

This is an infinitely long-range task, likely to endure the rest of this century. Fortunately, and thanks no little bit to the prod of Russia's own increasingly effective aid program, the job has now begun. And fortunately, also, the United States has again begun to assert positive diplomatic leadership.

BETTER CITIZEN UNDERSTANDING OF THE TRUE COST OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, it is unfortunately true that far too many of our people do not know the fiscal picture of our Government. There is one time during the year, however, when almost every one of us thinks about the situation; that is when we figure our income taxes.

There has come to my attention an excellent concise "Fiscal Report to Each Taxpayer in Maryland," prepared by Mr. Louis L. Goldstein, the comptroller of that State. It is published on inexpensive paper on a sheet, 8½ by 11 inches, folded three ways in order to fit in the envelope containing the State tax forms. Three sets of piegraphs are included; they are captioned "Where Your State's Money Came From"; "Where Your Money Went"; and "The State's Bonded Debt Account." I ask unanimous consent that the message on the front cover and the data in the piegraphs be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

I believe that the Federal Government could well emulate the excellent job Maryland is doing in informing its citizens. While I have not had extensive research on the subject done, I imagine that other income tax States are doing this sort of thing, too.

I should like to suggest that Secretary of the Treasury Anderson look into the possibility that a brief report of this nature be prepared and sent to the taxpayers annually, when income tax forms are distributed. As of now, no fiscal report is made directly to our taxpaying citizens. I think one should be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

There being no objection, the excerpts from the pamphlet were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A FISCAL REPORT TO EACH TAXPAYER IN MARYLAND

We are pleased to submit to the people of Maryland this report on the money received and spent by the State during the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1959.

Few taxpayers have the time to familiarize themselves with the amount of money received by the State, nor do they realize how much is collected from each specific tax. Many people in Maryland may not be aware of the numerous services rendered by their State and the cost of such services.

It is our hope that the information contained in this folder will help you have a better understanding of the financial affairs of Maryland.

LOUIS L. GOLDSTEIN,
Comptroller.

Where your State's money came from, fiscal year ended June 30, 1959

INCLUDING BOND ISSUES, $452.5 MILLION

	Amount (millions)	Percent
Income taxes:
Individuals	$81.6	18.02
Corporations	18.1	4.00
Total	99.7	22.02
Retail sales and use taxes	55.8	12.33
Motor vehicle fuel tax	51.0	11.26
Motor vehicle licenses, fines, titling tax	37.3	8.25
Property and franchise taxes	36.0	7.98
Tobacco, liquor, and racing taxes	34.8	7.69
Fees, service charges	25.0	5.51
State revenue	339.6	75.04
Bond issues:
State of Maryland	16.8	3.72
State roads commission	27.7	6.12
Total	44.5	9.84
Federal grants:
Highways	37.8	8.35
Welfare, health, conservation	30.6	6.77
Total	68.4	15.12

EXCLUDING BOND ISSUES, $408.0 MILLION

	Amount (millions)	Percent
Income taxes:
Individuals	$81.6	20.00
Corporations	18.1	4.44
Total	99.7	24.44
Retail sales and use taxes	55.8	13.68
Motor vehicle fuel tax	51.0	12.50
Motor vehicle licenses, fines, and titling tax	37.3	9.14
Property and franchise taxes	36.0	8.82
Tobacco, liquor, and racing taxes	34.8	8.53
Fees, service charges	25.0	6.13
State revenue	339.6	83.24
Federal grants:
Highways	37.8	9.26
Welfare, health, and conservation	30.6	7.50
Total	68.4	16.76

Where your money went, fiscal year ended June 30, 1959

INCLUDING DEBT RETIREMENT, $450.1 MILLION

	Amount (millions)	Percent
Highways:
State roads	$92.7	20.59
Highway tax distributions to political subdivisions	31.1	6.90
Total	123.8	27.49
Education:
School aid to political subdivisions	81.5	18.11
State programs	39.7	8.82
Total	121.2	26.93
Health and welfare:
Health, hospitals, mental hygiene	37.7	8.38
Public welfare	29.0	6.45
Total	66.7	14.83
Legislative, judicial, general government	33.8	7.51
Land, buildings, equipment	21.4	4.75
Correction, public safety	17.4	3.87
Operation and maintenance	384.3	85.38
Debt service:
Debt retirement	23.0	5.11
Interest	7.3	1.63
Total	30.3	6.74
Sundry taxes distributed to political subdivisions	35.5	7.88

Where your money went, fiscal year ended June 30, 1959—Continued

EXCLUDING DEBT RETIREMENT, $427.1 MILLION

	Amount (millions)	Percent
Highways:
State roads	$92.7	21.70
Highway taxes distributed to political subdivisions	31.1	7.29
Total	123.8	28.99
Education:
School aid to political subdivisions	81.5	19.08
State programs	39.7	9.30
Total	121.2	28.38
Health and welfare:
Health hospitals, mental hygiene	37.7	8.83
Public welfare	29.0	6.79
Total	66.7	15.62
Legislative, judicial, general government	33.8	7.91
Lands, buildings, equipment	21.4	5.01
Correction, public safety	17.4	4.07
Operation and maintenance	384.3	89.98
Interest on public debt	7.3	1.71
Sundry taxes distributed to political subdivisions	35.5	8.31

The State's bonded debt account, including highway construction bonds, June 30, 1959

TOTAL OUTSTANDING, $395.8 MILLION

	Amount (millions)	Percent
Public school construction advances to political subdivisions	$80.2	20.26
Highway improvement	189.2	47.80
Buildings and equipment	126.4	31.94

BONDS AUTHORIZED FOR FUTURE ISSUANCE, $292.4 MILLION

	Amount (millions)	Percent
Public school construction advances to political subdivisions	$45.3	15.49
Highway improvement	195.0	66.69
Buildings and equipment	52.1	17.82

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HRUSKA in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ECONOMIC STRIKERS' VOTING RIGHTS UNDER TAFT-HARTLEY AMENDMENTS IN THE LABOR REFORM LAW

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I commend to the attention of the Senate an address by James V. Constantine, Solicitor of the National Labor Relations Board, entitled "Economic Strikers' Voting Rights Under Taft-Hartley Amendments in the Labor Reform Law."

Mr. Constantine served the Labor Subcommittee and the full Committee on Labor and Public Welfare as a technical adviser during the difficult days when both groups were considering labor reform legislation. Jim contributed a great deal to our understanding of the Taft-Hartley law and to our comprehension of what proposed changes in the law would mean in terms of developments within the labor-management field.

Although Jim would be the last to admit it, he is an acknowledged expert on the operations of the National Labor Relations Board and the law it is empowered to administer.

In his address dealing with economic strikers, Jim views with objectivity the problems which face the Board and labor and management in coming to an understanding of the provisions affecting strikers not entitled to reinstatement.

So that every Member of Congress will have an opportunity to read his statement, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ECONOMIC STRIKERS' VOTING RIGHTS UNDER TAFT-HARTLEY AMENDMENTS IN THE LABOR REFORM LAW

(Address of James V. Constantine, Solicitor, National Labor Relations Board, at the Briefing Conference on Taft-Hartley Amendments in the Labor Reform Law, the Sheraton-Park Hotel, Washington, D.C.)

The question of whether economic strikers should be permitted to vote in an election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board has confronted the Board since its inception. At present, the matter appears to be regulated by section 702 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959. This section amends the second sentence of section 9(c)(3) of the National Labor Act, as amended, to read as follows:

"Employees engaged in an economic strike who are not entitled to reinstatement shall be eligible to vote under such regulations as the Board shall find are consistent with the purposes and provisions of this Act in any election conducted within twelve months after the commencement of the strike."

The second sentence of 9(c)(3), prior to the 1959 amendment, read: "Employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement shall not be eligible to vote."

Section 603 of S. 1555 and its predecessor, section 604 of S. 505, as introduced and as reported by the Senate Labor Committee (S. Rept. No. 187, 86th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 4, 31–33, 56) would have deleted the second sentence of 9(c)(3). Such deletion was intended to allow permanently replaced economic strikers to vote. Identical treatment was accorded to the matter by both the Elliott and Shelley bills in the House. (See H.R. 8342, sec. 703; H.R. 8490, sec. 703; H.R. Rept. No. 741, p. 51.)

President Eisenhower also has attacked the problem of disfranchising the economic striker. In his 1952 campaign he characterized it as a "union busting" tactic. He mentioned it in a special labor message in 1954, and he denounced it in his labor message of 1958 to Congress—(S. Rept. No. 187, 86th Cong., 1st sess., p. 32). Finally, the administration's labor bill of 1959 provided for a repeal of the second sentence of section 9(c)(3). (See sec. 507, S. 743, 86th Cong., 1st sess; sec. 507, H.R. 3540, 86th Cong., 1st sess.)

Constitutional questions aside—see Teamsters v. Leedom, 37 LRRM 2791 (D.C.D.C.)—this one sentence amendment seems to be gravid with ambiguities. Resolution of such ambiguities with respect to the second sentence as it stood prior to the passage of the 1959 amendment was had by resorting to legislative history. Union Mfg. Co. v. N.L.R.B., 221 F. 2d 532, 35 LRRM 2348 (C.A. D.C.). In addition, it would seem that the Board's past interpretations of language almost identical in the prior 9(c)(3), i.e., identical as to the words "employees on * * * strike who are not entitled to reinstatement," may command "great weight." See Union Mfg. Co. v. N.L.R.B., supra, 35 LRRM at 2351. Accordingly, it is proposed to discuss some of the more important problems likely to arise under the new amendment in the light of legislative history and prior Board decisions.

In its early days, the Board declared that only economic strikers were eligible to vote and excluded their replacements. A. Sartorius & Co., 10 NLRB 493, 494. In Sartorius, the Board reasoned that if both strikers and replacements voted "possibly twice as many as can be employed may participate in the election. This was not the intent of Congress. Yet the intent that the strikers should remain employees for the purposes of the act is clear. By preserving to employees who go on strike their status as employees and the rights guaranteed by the act, the act contemplates that during the currency of a strike, the employer and the striking employees may settle the strike, with the striking employees returning to their former jobs, displacing individuals hired to fill these jobs during the strike. Strikes are commonly settled in this manner. The hold of individuals who, during the currency of a strike, occupy positions vacated by striking employees is notably tenuous. To accord such individuals, while the strike is still current, a voice in the selection of the bargaining representative of the employees * * * would be contrary to the purposes of the act and the ends contemplated by it" (10 NLRB at 494–495).

But the Mackay case (N.L.R.B. v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333) caused the Board to revise its thinking on this subject. Since the Mackay case held that economic strikers who had been permanently replaced were not entitled to reinstatement, the Board concluded that the replacements should have a voice in the selection of a bargaining representative. Accordingly, both strikers and replacements were permitted to vote. Rudolph Wurlitzer Co., 32 NLRB 163; Columbia Pictures, 64 NLRB 490. In 1947, the amendment to 9(c)(3) was enacted whereby the strikers could not vote if they were not entitled to reinstatement. The 1959 amendment controls the situation since November 13, 1959.

Several problems readily present themselves in administering the 1959 amendment.

1. Does section 702 require adoption of formal regulations pursuant to the rule-making process, or is the Board empowered to develop this branch of the law by adjudication, i.e., on a case-by-case basis? In this connection, Congressman Griffin's remarks do not seem helpful. His contribution in aid of the legislative intent consists of the observation that the Board may limit the right to vote "by regulations consistent with the purpose of the act." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 105, pt. 14, p. 18152.) Senator KENNEDY seems to think that the adjudication approach is proper. He concluded that the amended 9(c)(3) "would permit the NLRB to decide when and under what circumstances it would be desirable for economic strikers to vote" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 105, pt. 5, p. 6411). Senator CASE of South Dakota, who sponsored the amendment to 9(c)(3) as finally adopted, accepted Senator KENNEDY's remarks as stating the situation "well" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 105, pt. 5, p. 6533).

2. May employees who permanently replace economic strikers vote? On this the text of the new amendment is silent. If Sartorius is followed, the replacements cannot vote; if Wurlitzer is adopted, the replacements will be eligible to vote. Legislative history is uninformative. Board decisions since November 13, 1959, seem indecisive. These cases merely provide in stereotyped language that "employees engaged in an economic strike which began less than 12 months from the date of the election who have been permanently replaced and their replacements shall vote by challenged ballot," and "ineligible to vote are employees * * * engaged in an economic strike which commenced more than 12 months before the election date and who have been permanently replaced" (Great A. & P., 125 NLRB No. 36; Porto Rico Refinery, 125 NLRB No. 45; Thompson Weinman Co., 125 NLRB No. 32; Florida Enterprises, 125 NLRB No. 40). They do not decide the question of whether both strikers and replacements shall be eligible to vote, nor the question of what stage of the proceeding evidence relating to eligibility will be received.

3. Whether strike misconduct will render a striker ineligible to vote although he has not been discharged, replaced, or denied reinstatement by the employer. A preliminary question arises as to whether the conduct alleged to disqualify consists of violence or other nonpeaceful acts on the one hand, or nonviolent activities, such as wildcat strikes or strikes in violation of nonstrike clauses. It is possible that the Board may differentiate between violent and nonviolent conduct, denying the franchise to those who have engaged in one or the other conduct.

Assuming, however, that the Board will treat both cases alike, the question is whether misconduct by strikers will disqualify them from voting. Under the Taft-Hartley Act, the Board held that, absent a discharge or refusal to reinstate a striker for misconduct, he remained an employee whose right to vote had not been forfeited (Union Mfg. Co., 101 NLRB 1028, at 1031). Expanding upon this generalization, the Board observed that "where no * * * discharge or denial (for conduct rendering strikers unsuitable for reemployment) of reinstatement takes place * * * or where it occurs after the date of the election has passed, the individual, as an employee whose status has not been altered or challenged as of the election date, is clearly entitled to vote" (101 NLRB at 1031. Union Mfg. Co., was approved by the District of Columbia Circuit, 221 F. 2d 572, 35 LRRM 2349).

4. Another problem which the Board will probably meet involves the question of whether the replacements are in fact permanent. It would seem that, absent other disqualifying conduct, an economic striker who has not been permanently replaced is entitled to reinstatement. At least this result flowed from the Board's reading of the Taft-Hartley Act. (See Belmont Smelting & Refining Co., 115 NLRB 495.) But to ascertain whether a particular replacement is permanent involves criteria which Congress has failed to establish. It would seem that Board decisions under the Taft-Hartley Act, like Belmont Smelting, supra, and the Pipe Machinery, 79 NLRB 1322, 1326 and Triangle Publications, 80 NLRB 835, 836 (temporary replacements became permanent) should be relevant.

5. Another problem is to distinguish between economic strikers and unfair labor practice strikers, for the latter do not seem to be affected by the amendment to 9(c)(3). Unfair labor practice strikers have always been eligible to vote. Times Square Corp., 79 NLRB 361, 364. An economic striker is not defined by either the amended statute or the legislative history accompanying it.

Under the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act an economic strike was described by the NLRB as "a strike not caused by unfair labor practices." Columbia Pictures, 64 NLRB 490, 491. It is probable that Congress intended to embrace this understanding of the term in the amendment to 9(c)(3), especially in view of the rule that reenactment of statutory language may indicate congressional agreement with the Board's practice thereunder. (See N.L.R.B. v. Seven Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 351.)

But the question is how to ascertain whether a strike has been caused by unfair labor practices or by economic considerations. Neither the new amendment nor its predecessor in the Taft-Hartley Act offers any suggestions or even a hint. Legislative history has neglected this aspect of the problem. Prior Board practices may be applicable. These practices follow:

The Board has stated that strikers are presumed to be economic unless they are found by the Board to be on strike over unfair labor practices of the employer (Anchor Rome Mills, 86 NLRB 1120, 1122). Prior to the 1947 amendments, the determination that a strike was caused by unfair labor practices was traditionally made by the Board in complaint cases. But since 1947, that is, under Taft-Hartley, the initial finding in a complaint case can be made only by the General Counsel. Hence a dismissal of a charge by the General Counsel will compel the Board to conclude, "without further examination of the facts," that the strike was economic (Times Square Corp., 79 NLRB 361, 364–365). Accordingly, there has developed the doctrine that whether a strike is an unfair labor practice strike cannot be litigated, and that the determination of the General Counsel on a charge is dispositive (Cooper Supply Co., 120 NLRB 1023).

6. Another problem which Congress has left unsolved relates to employees who strike in violation of section 8(d), i.e., those who strike "within the 60-day period specified" therein. If such persons are treated as are other strikers guilty of misconduct, then the rules relating to misconduct should have some hearing in this area. For a strike within the 60-day period may be assimilated to a wildcat strike or a strike in violation of a nonstrike clause. But section 8(d) enjoins the Board to find that an employee who "engages in a strike within the 60-day period specified * * * shall lose his status as an employee of the employer engaged in the particular labor dispute." Since such a striker has lost his status as an employee, will the Board allow him to vote?

7. Another phase of the problem apparently overlooked by Congress but which may haunt the Board concerns those strikers, even if not replaced, who do not have a reasonable expectancy of being recalled in the near future because of lack of business. Such strikers literally "are not entitled to reinstatement" within the meaning of the amended 9(c)(3). But will the Board permit them to vote? Under the Taft-Hartley Act, the Board denied such strikers the right to vote (Plastic Molding, 112 NLRB 179, 182; Cuttingham Buick, 112 NLRB 386). Whether such strikers will become eligible to vote under the 1959 amendment may depend upon whether the Board will apply the Plastic Molding principle to them.

Closely allied to this problem is the question of whether a position exists because of its permanent discontinuance for economic reasons. (See Pipe Machinery, 76 NLRB 297, 250.) This need not detain us at this point, for it presents no more than a question of fact. But the legal question centers around the problem of deciding whether such discontinuance causes a striker to lose his franchise. Congress has set no guidelines. The Board must decide, in the light of past practices and other relevant materials, whether a striker may vote after his job has been abolished for economic reasons. And if the Board determines that a job eliminated for economic reasons disfranchises a striker, the further question will arise as to what constitutes economic reasons. It would seem that not only loss of business is economic, but also changes in operating methods may be economic. In Meridian Plastics, 108 NLRB 203, 205, for example, subcontracting the work of the strikers was held to have constituted an economic elimination of jobs which rendered the strikers affected ineligible to vote.

8. A few minor problems may be grouped together for summary discussion. If a striker obtains permanent employment elsewhere, may he vote in an election of employees of his former employer while the strike still persists? Under Taft-Hartley such strikers could not vote (Belmont Smelting & Refining, 115 NLRB 495; Union Mfg. Co., 102 NLRB 1626, 1627). Will a replacement be permitted to vote if he was hired after the refusal of an unconditional application by a striker to return? In the past, the Board has not permitted such replacements to vote (Columbia Pictures, 64 NLRB 490, 491). And is a strike considered economic when prohibited by section 8(b)(4)(D), i.e., a strike in aid of a jurisdictional dispute? Columbia Pictures, supra, seems to think it is economic. Must a State-conducted election, which the Board sometimes recognizes (see T–H Products, 113 NLRB 1246), conform to the amended section 9(c)(3) to be accorded validity by the Board?

9. Finally, a serious procedural problem must be surmounted. How will questions of fact be decided—by evidence introduced at the representation hearing or at the time of disposing of challenges following the hearing. In the past, the Board has permitted all factual aspects concerning the voting eligibility of economic strikers and their replacements to be fully developed at the hearing of a representation case. In such cases, the Board made findings on eligibility upon the record made at the hearing and did not permit the strikers and replacements to vote under challenge (Mastic Tile Co., 112 NLRB No. 178; Belmont Smelting & Refining, 115 NLRB 495). But if the facts have not been developed at the hearing, it has been customary to allow both strikers and replacements to vote subject to challenge, leaving resolution of eligibility questions to the investigation of challenged ballots after the election (Pipe Machinery, 76 NLRB 247, 249).

Whether the Board adopts one or the other of the above procedures, or leaves it to the parties to pursue either, cannot be predicted. But it would seem that both avenues may be open, in which case the parties will decide at what stage of the proceeding to introduce evidence on eligibility.

From the foregoing it seems reasonable to conclude that the new section 9(c)(3) is loaded with ambiguities, and that many of them may not be rendered certain until Board decisions in litigated cases have been issued.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION CONCERNING CIVILIANS AND COURTS-MARTIAL

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, yesterday in my remarks in the Senate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 734–744, are included Monday's U.S. Supreme Court decisions holding that American military authorities lack constitutional power to try American civilians by courts-martial overseas in peacetime for noncapital offenses as well as for capital crimes.

Also included as a part of my remarks is a brief statement to the effect that there really is not a vast legal no man's land now as a result of the decisions, as some from time to time have said.

Mr. President, legal problems now exist. They are problems which I am sure we can solve.

I wish to say at this time, Mr. President, that I am engaged in drafting legislation, to be introduced in the near future, to try to clarify this portion of the law. I have asked both the Secretary of Defense and the Attorney General of the United States for their views since they head the Departments directly affected. They are expected to consult with the Secretary of State

Surely, we must guarantee basic constitutional rights of Americans and we should be able to work out procedures—by international agreements and U.S. statutes, if necessary—to provide that Americans who are charged with and convicted of offenses shall be punished, no matter where in the world they commit their offenses; that discipline in connection with American military forces be maintained; and that support be effective for American defense operations outside continental limits of the United States.

The duty of the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, of which I am honored to be chairman, in its continuing study of civilians and courts-martial, is to examine legislative proposals on the subject to see if constitutional rights are adequately protected. This we will continue to do to the best of our ability. We will give all suggestions our careful consideration. We welcome all suggestions from Senators who have an interest in this subject and feel disposed to make contributions to its solution.

Accordingly, I call attention to an editorial entitled "Curb on Military Trials," published this morning in the Washington (D.C.) Post. The editorial suggests methods of dealing with the problem which are worthy of our attention.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include this editorial as a part of my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 20, 1960]

CURB ON MILITARY TRIALS

The only puzzling thing about the Supreme Court's latest pronouncement on the constitutional rights of civilians who accompany the Armed Forces abroad is the fact that it split the Court three ways. Fortunately, the majority held fast to the principle that four Justices had previously laid down in the second Covert case and further projected that principle into new situations. The essence of the decision is that Congress may not deprive American civilians abroad of their right to a trial with constitutional safeguards because they are in some way attached to the Armed Forces.

In its 1957 decision the Court upset the court-martial conviction of Clarice Covert for the murder of her husband, but Justices

Harlan and Frankfurter joined in that decision only because a capital offense was involved. This newspaper took the view at the time that no logical distinction could be drawn between capital and noncapital offenses so far as the constitutional right to a jury trial in a civilian court is concerned. We also surmised that "time will sustain the main thread of their opinion"—the opinion against all military trials of civilian offenders abroad. This is precisely what a majority of the Court has now done. It is interesting to note that all four of the current opinions upholding this view were written by Justice Clark, who had dissented when the issue first went before the Court.

The distinction that Justice Harlan continues to draw between capital and noncapital cases seems to us illusory. If such a distinction were accepted, the military could, as Justice Clark noted, try all civilian cases abroad in military courts by merely reducing the charges. We do not think the Bill of Rights was intended to allow any such latitude. When the Founding Fathers gave Congress authority "to make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces," they meant those forces and not civilians who might follow them abroad.

It is equally difficult to follow the distinction drawn by Justices Whittaker and Stewart between civilian dependents "accompanying the Armed Forces" and civilian persons "serving with" or "employed by" the Armed Forces. To be sure, the employees are more essential to military operations than are dependents. But surely the controlling fact is that both are civilians. If Congress should deem it necessary for civilian employees to be under military discipline, it could put them in uniform.

Since the Court has invalidated the unconstitutional grant of authority to military courts to try civilians abroad, Congress will now have to act. In many instances crimes committed by American civilians in other countries can be dealt with by the courts of those countries. In other instances when the standards of justice are not comparable, perhaps diplomatic arrangements can be made to create American civilian tribunals for handling minor cases and to bring the more serious offenders to this country for trial. However difficult the problem may prove to be, we think the country will be glad to know that the rule against trial of civilians in military courts during peacetime is being rigidly applied.

COMMUNISM AND ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, evidence of Communist direction behind recent anti-Semitic acts in West Germany continues to roll in. Constantine Brown, the distinguished journalist, correctly analyzes the situation in his Washington Evening Star column of January 19.

Mr. Brown points out that the Communists have a vested interest in promoting atheism, and that in this particular instance "Mr. Khrushchev's tactics are not difficult to understand. He wants to create a strong sentiment against the German Republic in order to have a better chance to settle the Berlin question in keeping with his own plans and wishes."

Today's Chicago Tribune carries a news item entitled "Bonn Reports Proof Found of Reds' Plot." This report lends added weight to Mr. Brown's excellent column.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these two articles be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, Jan. 19, 1960]

KREMLIN IMAGE IN ANTI-SEMITISM—PRANKSTERS IN OUTBREAKS BELIEVED USED BY REDS TO PRESSURE WEST ON BERLIN

(By Constantine Brown)

As various pieces of news and information are put together, it becomes clear that the anti-Semitic outbreaks of the last few weeks in the Western World are largely the work of the skillful international Communist apparatus.

There has been no physical attack against persons of the Jewish race and creed. For the time being, at least, the perpetrators of the outbreaks have confined their activities to painting the Hitler swastikas on synagogues and breaking windows of some houses, which happened, however, to be occupied by gentiles.

The swastika painting was not limited to Hebrew houses of worship but also involved Protestant and Catholic churches. This was interpreted by those who are looking into the situation to mean that the so-called pranksters got out of hand and in their ardor to serve the Communist cause they included Christian houses of worship as well.

Atheism does not differentiate between religions. Whenever communism takes over a country the churches and their servants are among the first and principal targets. Churches and synagogues and temples, priests, rabbis, and bonzes all suffer alike.

New political philosophies which manifest themselves by violence as in major revolutions cannot tolerate religion which contradicts their "rational" doctrines. Thus the church suffered as much as the nobility during the French Revolution in 1789. Similarly, since the Communist revolution in 1917, the countries which were taken over destroyed or closed thousands of churches and murdered tens of thousands of pastors, regardless of their creed.

The present outbreaks have a definite political character and are palpably different from those which occur in the heat of a major turmoil. There is evidence that they were inspired by Kremlin agents and executed by crackpots who served as tools. It is strange, indeed, it is pointed out, that a wave of anti-Semitism—as it is falsely described—should take place almost simultaneously in West Germany, Italy, France, and the United States.

Mr. Khrushchev's tactics are not difficult to understand. He wants to create a strong sentiment against the German Republic in order to have a better chance to settle the Berlin question in keeping with his own plans and wishes. And what better platform can he devise to gain to his side the sentiment of the free world for a Kremlin solution of Berlin than to revive the hate and fear of nazism in the hearts of the people of Western Europe and America?

That the Red czar is determined to renew his demands for his own solution of the Berlin question became obvious last week when he entertained the heads of the Western diplomatic missions to the Soviet Union at the Russian New Year celebration. There, after the usual toasts for relaxation of tensions were drunk, Mr. Khrushchev told the American, British, and French Ambassadors separately that he will not tolerate further stalling on the Berlin question, which must be settled according to his lights at the forthcoming summit meeting. He was truculent and aggressive.

The clamor that nazism is not dead in Germany has been one of Mr. Khrushchev's stock accusations against the West German Republic ever since he assumed absolute power in the Soviet Union. He has used it in an effort to disassociate Germany from the NATO and is using it now in expectation of creating a strong anti-German sentiment in the free world which would serve his own purposes of establishing the Communist hegemony in that vital sector of free Europe.

The hooliganism of a handful of crackpots who became unwittingly or otherwise the tools of his agents caused an uproar which may have been fatal to the policies of the free countries. At the same time, in order not to disturb the prospects for a relaxation of tension, little is being said in the West about continuous systematic anti-Semitism which has been endemic in Russia since the days of the czars and has been worsened during the regimes of Stalin and Khrushchev.

Anti-Semitism and Communists work hand in hand. Only the Communists know how to use the anti-Semites in the free world for their own political purposes.

[From the Chicago Tribune, Jan. 20, 1960]

BONN REPORTS PROOF FOUND OF REDS' PLOT—EXPOSES ANTI-JEWISH CAMPAIGN PLAN

BONN, January 19.—The Government asserted Tuesday that it now has proof that "Communist influences were behind the worldwide anti-Semitic incidents of recent weeks."

A Government spokesman said the arrests Monday night of three anti-Jewish slogan scrawlers at Lehrte, near Hannover, confirmed intelligence reports that had been in Government hands for some time.

The spokesman said the information in the reports, part of which was published Monday, said the central committee of the East German Socialist Unity (Communist) Party met last January to lay plans for anti-Semitic incidents to bring West Germany into disrepute.

AN ARSON ATTEMPT

Authorities pressing an investigation into whether East Germany is behind the current outbreak of swastika daubing and hate slogans also announced the arrest of a suspected neo-Nazi student in West Berlin.

An arson attempt on a synagogue in Amberg, northern Bavaria, last Saturday was disclosed. An oil-soaked doormat was set on fire in a woodshed at the synagogue but firemen quenched the blaze quickly.

The three persons arrested at Lehrte were caught in the act of painting the words "Jews get out" on the walls of houses in black ink. Kurt Thomas, 33; Kurt Blank, 25; and Wolfgang Hulitschke, 28, were said to have been carrying a hand-painted poster with the same words on it as well as a swastika.

AT YOUTH FESTIVAL

Police said Blank had taken part in the 1951 East Berlin Communist world youth festival and Hulitschke was arrested in 1951 while illegally trying to travel to East Germany for the festival.

Police in West Berlin announced the arrest of Wolfgang Solondz, 21, a member of the banned neo-Nazi National Youth of Germany organization. He is suspected of having links with East German Communist officials.

MINISTER TO STAY

Theodor Oberlaender, West Germany's controversial minister for refugee affairs, said Tuesday he has no intention of resigning.

The 55-year-old ex-Nazi's minister issued an official statement after the Hamburg newspaper Die Welt appeared with a story that Oberlaender—accused of participating in mass killings in German-occupied Poland in 1941—had given to understand he would leave Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's cabinet. Oberlaender repeatedly has denied the mass death charges.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY TO DR. FRANCIS E. TOWNSEND

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I can congratulate Dr. Francis E. Townsend on reaching his 93d birthday. Not only is this an achievement in itself, but Dr. Townsend has devoted more than the past quarter-century to forwarding the program he founded and he is still going strong. The Townsend Clubs of America urge us to utilize the talents and abilities of our senior citizens. This is an important segment of our population too often forgotten. It is a shame to neglect these people, and to ignore the fine work they can contribute toward our national goals.

Thanks to spectacular advances in nutrition, medicine and public health, today there are 14 million Americans over age 65. These are the retirement years, the golden years, when men and women who have worked hard can settle down in dignity and peace. But far too often, many of our people are finding the "golden years" tarnished with sorrow, pain and poverty.

The problem of our elder citizens is in two areas—ill health and low income. I am pleased that the special Subcommittee on the Problems of the Aged and the Aging, headed by the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA] will continue its work on these problems.

Our most fitting tribute to Dr. Townsend on this occasion would be to give every attention to the urgency of this task. This has been his dedicated work in the past decades. I join in extending him my congratulations and best wishes on his 93d birthday. May he be blessed with continued good health, and happiness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], designated "1-13-60—D," proposing substitutes for certain subsections of the bill.

SOCIAL SECURITY SHOULD BE EXPANDED AND RETIREMENT PAYMENTS INCREASED

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, 25 years ago next August the Congress overwhelmingly enacted the most humane and advanced social legislation in our Nation's history—the Social Security Act. This despite opposition of those who termed it "state socialism."

The man who proposed this legislation and whose signature placed it on the statute books is dead. This is one of the many imprints that Franklin D. Roosevelt has left upon the pages of history.

Today, under the beneficent provisions of this act, more than 72 million Americans, employed and self-employed, have assurance that in their old age they will enjoy a measure of security.

But, I regret to say, Mr. President, it is not enough.

America has never been a Nation content to stand still and rest on the laurels its great achievements have won. It has been our tradition and our history, rather, always to move forward. Always to take newer and ever greater steps in the interests of our Nation and its citizens.

This same tradition, I assert, must continue to be applied in the field of important social legislation.

Since passage of the Social Security Act of 1935, Congress has made changes in the act in keeping with fast-changing times. We have a duty to further expand and liberalize this program for the welfare of the Nation and its citizens.

It is my happy personal recollection that, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, I helped draft the present liberalized and expanded social security program.

However, in the decade just passed, the need for broader, more sweeping changes has outstripped our efforts to meet that need.

Our social security program today does not give enough protection to enough people. It has not kept pace with the times, nor has it kept pace with expanding needs of our elderly citizens.

When the Social Security Act became law, there were fewer than 7 million Americans 65 years old or older.

Today, there are nearly 16 million; and by 1975, many experts believe, there will be more than 20 million.

Because today most of our over-65 population have inadequate incomes, most do not receive private pensions, most cannot afford proper medical care, and many are ill-housed, it is clear that expansion on a broad level in social security must be made now to avoid a catastrophe of sweeping proportions among our aged in the future.

CRASH PROGRAM

Indeed, Mr. President, in this 25th anniversary year and in the 1st year of a new decade of challenge, the time has come for a major breakthrough, a crash program in social security.

Piecemeal, patchwork, and after-the-fact legislation have proved inadequate to meet the needs of America's elderly population. We must learn to anticipate needs, not get tangled in the confusion of interpreting them long after they have swept onto the scene.

Mr. President, this Nation no longer can afford to handicap its elderly with inadequate benefits and inadequate health protection while, at the same time, confining them to an unrealistic, unfair, and unnecessary earnings limit of $1,200 annually.

This limit must be raised to $3,000 to enable many of our older people to enjoy a decent American standard of living without adding extra burdens to the taxpayers.

This present limitation is not realistic. It imposes cruel financial punishment on persons still able to work after 65 and denies them a right they have earned by their own contributions into the social security fund. Their work and money have built this fund.

As a trial lawyer in Cleveland, Ohio, for many, many years, going into court day after day, trying personal injury and other lawsuits, I have, since 1935, seen the life expectancy of American citizens increase by leaps and bounds. Those of us who have experienced tragedy in our own families, as I have, and who have lost dear ones, know that medical science is on the brink of finding a cure for cancer. It is generally known that science also may soon discover how to prevent heart attacks in many cases, which, as Senators know, cause so many untimely deaths to men in their forties and fifties.

UNREALISTIC LIMIT

When those two things have been accomplished by our medical research, then, indeed, life expectancy will go higher and higher, and men and women of 65, 70, and 75 will have the ability to participate in gainful employment after retirement. So it is very unfair and very unrealistic to impose, as the present social security law does, a limit of $1,200 a year. Otherwise, a retired person may not receive the social security retirement payment for which he paid premiums during his active lifetime.

If there is no substantial increase in the earnings limit, the so-called soaring sixties will never leave the launching pad for millions of our elderly citizens.

But more than this is needed if we are to bring our social security program truly up to date in keeping with the expanding needs of our people.

Retirement benefits, which now average only $72 a month, should be increased by at least 10 percent; and the minimum benefit payment, now $33 a month, should be increased substantially. Because of present surplus and premiums constantly coming in, the program will remain actuarially sound. After all, there is now $22 billion in the social security reserve fund. That is $22 billion, not $22 million. So, without impairing the fund in any manner, Congress can certainly increase the retirement payments by at least 10 percent.

It is a fact that we have dealt unrealistically and unimaginatively with the problems of disabled workers.

Crippling disability is no less tragic at 30 than at 50. No less final in destroying the ability to work and earn a decent living.

Once a doctor, or group of doctors, declares a worker to be disabled, it should be possible for him to begin receiving social security retirement payments immediately, no matter what his age. Such payments should continue if periodic medical examinations show that he is totally and permanently disabled and unemployable. The needs for food, housing, and health care are inexorable. They do not wait until a man becomes 50.

I further assert that a disabled insured worker must receive all he is entitled to under the social security law without suffering deduction of funds granted under any other Federal or State administered program.

Mr. President, with these three basic improvements—increased earnings limit, increased benefit and elimination of the arbitrary age 50 before disabled workers can collect benefits—the 1960's could well be the decade the 1950's should have been in the field of social legislation.

TRAVEL BY MULE TRAIN

It seems tragic that a huge, important and deserving segment of our population has been, economically speaking, travelling by mule train while most of our society has traveled by jet.

I refer to our fast-growing population of persons over 65.

Today, three-fifths of all Americans over 65 have less than $1,000 money income annually. Four-fifths have less than $2,000.

Aged widows, most of whom are on social security, are the most impoverished group in America. They receive on the average only $56 a month social security.

Coinciding with these shocking statistics is the fact that life expectancy of Americans is constantly increasing. The consequences of longer life on less money hold out the prospect of an increasingly impoverished, rapidly expanding elderly population.

Only an ostrich would fail to see that care of the aged has become a major national problem. This has been made shockingly clear in hearings conducted by my able and distinguished colleague, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA].

Part of this deep-rooted problem can be met and solved through basic improvements in the Social Security Act. The wage base for coverage and collection of social security tax should be increased to $6,000 and then it would follow that retirement payments would also be higher.

Finally, Mr. President, our social security program should be universal, covering all employed and self-employed, whatever the occupation or profession.

For years, the ruling clique of the American Medical Association, and its powerful lobby in Washington, have stool in the way of inclusion of the medical profession under the beneficent provisions of the social security program.

They have even resisted the strong sentiment within the ranks of the AMA itself to give coverage to doctors.

Wherever doctors have been polled—in Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York and other States—from 60 to 70 percent of them have expressed themselves in favor of compulsory social security coverage.

Notwithstanding this clear-cut evidence that medical men generally desire to be included within the provisions of our social security law, State medical associations and the American Medical Association continue to bar the door.

DENTISTS VOTED FOR COVERAGE

Men of the dental profession are protected by the Social Security Act. They were not dragooned into the program. They voted for coverage in referendums conducted by their various State dental associations.

Lawyers, too, are covered. Responding to the request of the vast majority of lawyers, Congress 3 years ago voted to include self-employed attorneys at law under social security.

Only the American Medical Association, through its leaders—that little group of willful men who rake in money from the medical profession and pay it out in salaries to themselves and in moneys to hire a lobby in Washington—has prevented the same coverage for physicians and surgeons, despite mounting evidence that most doctors themselves want it. The evidence shows that 70 percent of the physicians and surgeons in the United States desire to be included under the social security law.

Since 1935, and at the present time, the American Medical Association has vigorously opposed the inclusion of physicians and surgeons under social security coverage.

About 5 years ago, as president of the Cuyahoga County Bar Association, which is the second largest county bar association in the United States, I was privileged to appear as a witness before the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate and urge that self-employed lawyers be included within the coverage of social security. I do not believe it was because I made a good witness—lawyers never make good witnesses—but it is a fact that shortly after that time Congress voted to include self-employed attorneys at law, responding to the request of the vast majority of lawyers of the United States to have this coverage.

But the attitudes and actions of the American Medical Association keep doctors as the only professional men who are still holdouts.

Physicians and surgeons who helped bring us into the world are not protected by social security by reason of the failure of the small reactionary group of rulers, or dictators, operating the American Medical Association to represent the views of the membership—of the thousands of physicians and surgeons who are the rank and file members of the American Medical Association.

Incidentally, those of the undertaking profession or occupation or business, who help take us out of the world, do have coverage under social security, but the fine medical men of our country, who help bring us into the world, are denied coverage through the action of their own leaders, who are misleading them.

Social security is an insurance system; and it must remain so. This is not a mere pension system. It is actuarially sound.

Our social security system does not compete with private pension plans, but is complementary and supplementary to them.

PAY AS YOU GO

Our social security program is a pay-as-you-go program. We must keep it sound in every respect.

The hope we all cherish is an old age free from care and want. To that end people toil patiently and live closely, seeking to save something for the day when they can earn no more.

There was no more pitiful tragedy than the lot of the worker who had struggled all his life to gain a competence and who, at 65, was poverty stricken and dependent upon charity.

The dignity of every individual is involved. Something deep inside a person is offended if, after a lifetime of productive effort, all he or she gets is a handout.

An adequate old-age insurance program, reasonable aid to the unfortunate, and extension of retirement benefits is not statism, nor is it socialism.

If American industry—big business—can afford to pay huge pensions to retired officials who do not need them, is it state socialism when the people's representatives impose a tax on industry and on employees and self-employed to pay retirement and total disability pensions or social security payments to those who need them?

In expanding the system of safeguards against the hazards and cruelty of penniless old age or crippling disability, new concepts of security and human dignity are involved, as well as a new relationship between the individual and his Government.

Mr. President, I assert that the Federal Government can provide reasonable security for the aged and less fortunate among us without in any way sacrificing that liberty which we know as the American way of life.

The truth is, Mr. President, that the adoption of a modernized and expanded social security program such as I have outlined here today will mean a stronger, more vibrant America, a nation of expanded opportunity for all, where no one is forgotten, where the young have faith and the aged have hope, and where the dignity of the individual is still looked upon as the highest goal of civilized society.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. HENNINGS obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CASE of South Dakota in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] designated "1–30–60–D."

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield, to permit me to suggest the absence of a quorum, so that Senators on this side of the aisle may come to the Chamber?

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I yield to the assistant minority leader for that purpose.

Mr. KUCHEL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CASE of South Dakota in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, yesterday I called up my amendment lettered "D"; and the pending question is on agreeing to that amendment, which would change the definition of the term "political committee," so it would cover intrastate committees.

At that time there was considerable discussion about the aggregate amount which would require a committee to report in any calendar year. The present distinguished occupant of the chair (Mr. CASE of South Dakota) and I have also discussed this matter. I have welcomed his support and consideration and very strong and sincere feelings about the pending proposed legislation.

After further considering the matter with the distinguished junior Senator from South Dakota, I now modify the amendment by striking out on page 1 of the amendment, in line 6, and on page 2, in line 4, the figure "$1,000", as it relates to the aggregate amount; and I substitute therefor "$2,500."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has a right to modify his amendment; and the amendment, as modified, will be read.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, before the clerk reads the amendment, as modified, I wish to make a further modification, by means of language which was contained in my original bill, as introduced in 1955 and in 1957; and, indeed, it was also in the bill which was before the Committee on Rules and Administration during the last session. I make these modifications because I do not feel that they materially or in any substantial way affect the philosophy or the broad purposes of the bill; and especially is that true in the case of the amendment which requires that the committees in a State make a report.

After discussion with the learned junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] and others, and after considerable reflection and further consideration, both last night and today, I believe that these modifications should be made in order that we may not find ourselves parting company upon matters which really are not essential, but relate only—as in the one instance—to the sum of money to be specified; and bearing in mind that, under the provisions of the modified amendment, all amounts of $2,500 or more—instead of the former provision for all amounts of $1,000 or more—must be reported by every committee; and also bearing in mind that the amendment does not contain a provision which would prevent the creation and establishment of any number of functioning committees, so long as they reported within the meaning of the act, so the public might know the number of committees formed and engaging in activity in behalf of any candidate for election to public office.

So, in addition to changing the amount "$1,000" to "$2,500," which modification will to some extent simplify the reporting by some committees—inasmuch as the committees within the States will not in any wise be limited numerically, but will be limited only as to the reporting requirement—I also modify the amendment by reinserting provisions similar to those contained in the bill which I introduced at the beginning of the last session. Therefore, I undertake to further modify the amendment as follows:

On page 7, following line 25, insert the following:

(e) The reports required to be filed by subsection (a) of this section shall also contain a list of the names of candidates in whose behalf contributions were received or expenditures made. In the case of political committees supporting more than one candidate (and State and local candidates), the amount of the total expenditures allocable to each candidate—

(1) shall be in the same ratio as expenditures on behalf of each candidate for printing and advertising, radio time, and television time bears to the total of such expenditures, or

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri have available a copy of his amendment, as modified?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes, Mr. President; and I am about to send it to the desk.

I wanted to explain it briefly, as I went along.

Mr. President, the reason for this amendment is that a number of Senators last night asked a number of penetrating, and I think important, questions relating to the allocation of expenditures where a committee supports more than one candidate; and, in conformity with and in compliance with suggestions, on which my colleague the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] has been consulted as well, it seems to me that it might have an even more salutary effect—as I thought it would in 1955 and 1957 when I introduced bills—to try to allocate, as between candidates, the amount spent.

I understand the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] desires to say something about this modification as well, and for that purpose I shall be very glad to yield to him, or to yield to him for any other purpose, provided I do not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I feel this proposed amendment, which is substantially, though not exactly, the same as the wording of the bill as reported to the floor previously, will greatly strengthen the provisions of the amendment. A possibility that worried many of us was that if a Member of Congress was running on the same ticket with a sheriff, clerk, county treasurer, or other official, under the wording of the amendment as submitted originally, if a political committee—let us say one of the party committees—supported all of those candidates together and spent over $1,000, it would be required to make a Federal report.

I concede some difficulties in the allocation problem, but it seems to me the effect of this proposal is, to put it in possibly oversimplified but approximately correct language, if a Member of Congress were running together with 11 other candidates and the committee supporting them spent the same amount for all, that committee would not have to report unless it actually spent, under the original wording, over $12,000.

I agree with the suggestion for raising this limit, because we certainly do not want to unduly burden the Federal system with reports, and there will be a good many more reports coming in under this amendment than came in today. I support raising the limitation to $2,500——

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to observe, without interrupting the Senator's train of thought on the matter, there is, of course, no magic in numbers. The figure "$1,000" was selected and agreed upon as being a reasonable figure. Having received suggestions, including the principal suggestion emanating from the distinguished occupant of the chair [Mr. CASE of South Dakota], that the amount be raised to $2,500, I can see that it will not appreciably affect the result that is sought, because the reporting provisions are there and the people will know how many substantial committees exist and how much those committees have spent on behalf of the candidates of any candidate or group of candidates.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator from Missouri. I feel this modification will greatly strengthen the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri and that his amendment as modified should command our support.

However, Mr. President, I believe it is necessary, since this proposal amends a different section, to ask unanimous consent, as I now do, that this amendment be considered and voted on with the original amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk would like to have the Chair inquire of the Senator from Missouri if it was the intent of the Senator from Missouri to modify his amendment originally to change the figure "$1,000" to "$2,500" in both places where it occurs.

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes. I neglected to mention the second portion, appearing on page 2 of the amendment at line 4, and I appreciate the Chair's calling that to my attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk now has the amendment.

The modified amendment as provided by Mr. HENNINGS is as follows:

Page 3, strike out lines 3 to 12, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(3) The term 'political committee' includes any committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures in an aggregate amount exceeding $2,500 in any calendar year for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence in any manner whatsoever the election of a candidate or candidates or presidential or vice presidential electors;".

On page 16, strike out lines 3 to 12, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(3) The term 'political committee' includes any committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures in an aggregate amount exceeding $2,500 in any calendar year for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence in any manner whatsoever the election of a candidate or candidates or presidential or vice presidential electors;".

On page 7, following line 25, insert the following:

"(e) The reports required to be filed by subsection (a) of this section shall also contain a list of the names of candidates in whose behalf contributions were received or expenditures made. In the case of political committees supporting more than one candidate (and State and local candidates), the amount of the total expenditures allocable to each candidate—

"(1) shall be in the same ratio as expenditures on behalf of each candidate for printing and advertising, radio time, and television time bears to the total of such expenditures, or

"(2) where no expenditures were made for Federal candidates for any of such purposes there shall be charged to each Federal candidate an amount equal to the full expenditure divided by the total number of candidates, Federal and State;"

except that expenditures specifically designated for an individual candidate shall be charged to such candidate.

Page 8, line 1, strike out "(e)" and insert in lieu thereof "(f)".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] as he has modified it.

Mr. HENNINGS. Has my colleague from New York completed his discussion?

Mr. KEATING. I am through.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, by way of a further brief explanation, and I shall try to make it as simple and understandable as I am able to do, I think the test of the existing law and of the new bill as to whether a political committee is an interstate committee would no longer apply, because, in calling up the amendment yesterday, it changed the definition of "political committee" so that it would cover intrastate committees or committees functioning or operating in a State. It requires, in accordance with the modification of today, any committee which spends in excess of $2,500 in any calendar year for the purpose of influencing Federal elections to report.

By submitting the amendment on primaries, which the Senate adopted late yesterday, I undertook to indicate, Mr. President, that that amendment is closely related to the amendment on political committees.

I should like to say most emphatically that every argument for or against the inclusion of primaries applies to the amendment which would seek to broaden the definition of political committees. The issues involved have been thoroughly debated for 4 days by the Senate. The main question was, and the main question still is, whether we want to be candid and open and forthright in reporting to the American people the uses of money in Federal elections. I think this question has been settled partially by the Senate as a result of the vote yesterday, and I think further discussion on that point certainly would serve no useful purpose at this time.

I wanted to clarify one point, Mr. President.

The able junior Senator from New York and the distinguished senior Senator from California, the assistant minority leader, asked me last night whether the cutoff amount of $1,000, which is now $2,500 because of the modification, was limited to contributions and expenditures for Federal candidates where intrastate committees support local, State and Federal candidates.

I undertook to say last night, and I repeat today, that only contributions and expenditures for Federal candidates are included in the cutoff amount of $2,500. I do not believe there was any doubt about it then, and I think the language in the definition is clear on this point.

The junior Senator from New York further asked me how the Federal portion of expenditures and contributions could be determined in the case of committees supporting candidates on different levels. I should like to undertake to again say that beginning with the original bill which I introduced in 1955 and continuing with the subsequent bills of 1957 and 1959 there was contained in each bill the broad definition of the term "political committee" as it appears in the present amendment. In addition to that, and because of this definition, the bills of 1955 and 1957 included an apportionment provision, to further clarify the point raised by the Senator from New York yesterday.

I have always thought that such an apportionment provision was really a corollary to the broader definition of "political committee," and for this reason I have modified my amendment to include this provision, which would establish rules for separating expenditures made for Federal candidates from those made for other candidates.

The line of interrogation pursued last night further convinced me of the correctness of the original bill and of the position I had undertaken to assume upon it; that is to say, that we should try to have some apportionment provision relating to a committee, when it supports more than one candidate for local, State, and Federal offices. But this does not in any sense change the essential purpose of the proposal.

I think the formula is very simple. The formula would require political committees to report the names of candidates which they support, and would further require that in the case of committees supporting more than one Federal candidate, as well as candidates on a State and local level, the amount to be allocated to each candidate should be determined by a double formula. When the committee made expenditures for printing and advertising, radio and television time, the allocable amount should be determined by the ratio of such expenditures with respect to each candidate. Where no such expenditure was made, the allocable amount should be derived by the division of the total expenditures by the number of candidates supported by the committee.

Mr. President, that seems to me to be about as close as we can approach any fair, reasonable, and honest way of getting at the matter of a committee supporting more than one candidate. It would cover the case where an intrastate committee transferred to another committee a sum of money to influence Federal elections. Furthermore, expenditures specifically designated for an individual would be, under the formula, charged to that candidate and to no other.

Thus I believe, Mr. President, that the modification is logically interconnected with the amendment on the redefinition of the term "political committee."

The questions of the distinguished Senator from California and of the distinguished Senator from New York prove this, I think, beyond any reasonable doubt. I urge that the amendment, containing the modifications which have been made, be agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MORSE in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arizona, or does the Senator yield the floor?

Mr. HENNINGS. I will yield to my colleague, the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri yields to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, has the amendment to the amendment been agreed to by the Senate?

Mr. HENNINGS. I will say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has only been modified; it has not been voted on.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The modification has not been voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not yet.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Arizona. The Senator from Missouri was modifying his own amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Which requires no approval, of course.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is my understanding.

Mr. DIRKSEN. So the pending amendment is the amendment with the $2,500 amount rather than the $1,000 amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Illinois permit the Chair to interrupt?

The Parliamentarian states that it is true ordinarily a modification to an amendment does not have to be approved. In this instance it has already been agreed to that in respect to its multiple parts the amendment should be considered en bloc. The Parliamentarian tells the Chair it can be considered en bloc. Apparently we do have a little different situation from the ordinary situation, when a Senator simply asks to modify his own amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri yields to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the proposed changes by the Senator from Missouri be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Montana. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois reserves the right to object.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall not object. Even with the larger amount, Mr. President, I think the amendment is as offensive as it was before, because the modification of the amount does not affect the principle involved. I thought I uttered my own sentiments on the matter last night, and there is very little I have to offer on the subject beyond that.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, further reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York reserves the right to object.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I withdraw my reservation.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I point out that a modification of the amount is only one of the modifications which have been made to the amendment, the other modification being, in substance, to provide that a report will be required only when the $2,500 was spent for the particular candidate. So if there were a proliferation of candidates it would require an allocation.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, my request was that all modifications be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois reserves the right to object, and is recognized for his reservation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New York, when he used the word "proliferation" he used the best word in the dictionary to indicate precisely what is going to happen.

Mr. KEATING. I learned that from my friend.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We are going to proliferate all of the difficulties, because when it comes time for a county committee or any other committee to set up an allocations scheme on its books, to see how it can separate the money which will come into a common treasury, as to how much is spent for the congressional candidate, how much for the senatorial candidate, how much for the sheriff, how much for the Governor, and how much for the county coroner, that is when the difficulties and prolixities really will begin.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the minority leader has approved the word "proliferation." I have tried to avoid it in the course of the debate, because it is a word which is susceptible of many interpretations. But this amendment would certainly proliferate the opportunity and means whereby the people who vote, the American public, could scrutinize the situation to determine where the money being sent to candidates for the purpose of encouraging and supporting their candidacies is coming from. It would proliferate the opportunity for any candidate adverse to the candidate receiving the funds to discuss the question of the source of the funds, the number of committees, and all other things which may be of cognate or related interest.

So again I say to my friend the able minority leader that we may use the word "proliferate" in many senses. I believe this amendment would create a proliferation, so to speak, by increasingly making abundant the opportunity of the people of the country to know who is behind campaign financing, where the money is spent, who the people are who contribute it, and other facts as to which they are entitled to have knowledge in considering the qualifications of a candidate, together with his other qualifications.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Missouri yield in order that the Chair may submit the unanimous-consent request made by the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD]? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, inasmuch as it seems that the debate on this amendment has run its course, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. Does he yield for that purpose?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MORSE in the chair). Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

THE SPECIAL MILK PROGRAM

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], I have introduced a bill (S. 2751) to maintain the special milk program at its current rate during 1960–61. To continue as at present, the program needs more funds to meet the steady rise in the number of schools and school children.

Mr. President, this situation is graphically pointed out in a resolution I have just received from the California State Board of Agriculture. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ON NATIONAL SPECIAL MILK PROGRAM, UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED BY CALIFORNIA STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE, MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1959

Whereas the Congress of the United States authorized the use of the funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation for the purpose of increasing the consumption of fluid milk by children in nonprofit schools of high school grade and under; and

Whereas, in 1958, Congress authorized a basic annual expenditure of not to exceed $75 million, and in August of this year Congress increased the 1960 authorization to $81 million and established $84 million for 1961; and

Whereas the Director of the Food Distribution Division of the U.S. Department of Agricultural Marketing Service has advised the California State Superintendent of Public Instruction that effective March 1, 1960, the maximum subsidy per half pint would be reduced one-half cent; and

Whereas California schools entered into the program in good faith and have more than doubled milk consumption by school children since 1954. A reduction in the rate of reimbursement in the face of rising milk prices will force schools to increase charges to pupils, which will result in reduced participation. A decrease in the rates in March and a return to the original rates in July will cause confusion and create administrative difficulties at the State and local level: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the California State Board of Agriculture, meeting at Sacramento, Calif., on December 21, 1959, does hereby recommend that sufficient funds be made available to continue the special milk program through this current school year without change; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be furnished to the Governor of the State of California, the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture, and the California congressional delegation.

THE PATH OF WAR OR THE PATHS OF PEACE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article which I prepared for the New Year's edition of the Miami News, entitled "The Path of War or the Paths of Peace," which expresses some of my thoughts about the role of the United States in the coming decade.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PATH OF WAR OR THE PATHS OF PEACE

(By Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY)

The sixties ahead could mean for mankind peace and security, or they could be the years in which man takes the final, irrevocable plunge into disaster. American leadership or lack of it may well be the determining factor.

Every new year gives each man and nation a chance to begin anew; the commencement of a new decade seems to offer the chance to think boldly ahead, to choose new directions, to reach more confidently toward a better and more just world. But mankind enters the sixties weighed down with the terrible burdens of his own creation, carrying into the new decade with him weapons of unimaginable power and sophistication. By comparison with these dark works of man, we have been able to fashion only the most primitive beginnings of new institutions designed for living and not for dying.

Like legendary Prometheus, man is dangerously close to becoming the permanent victim of his own thirst for knowledge and power. For the discovery of the awful secrets of the atom has not been accompanied by a breakthrough in the understanding of man's inner nature and of his social and political institutions.

Other world developments, not confined to the great leaps forward in technology, cast their shadows forward into the sixties. The ferment in Asia, Africa, and Latin America continues. The steady stream of revolts against European domination has been accompanied by an amazing record of successes in overthrowing corrupt and antiquated political and social structures. While the Communists have sought to capture the leadership of these revolutionary movements, they have more fundamental causes. In one sense they are the fruit of those rising expectations first kindled in North America in 1776, fed by a gradually rising literacy throughout the world, and blown into flame by the passionate dedication to freedom of men like Gandhi.

The economic and technological successes of the Communists must continue to be reckoned with through the next 10 years. And it is clearly not the Soviet Union alone that is our concern. Russian rockets, symbolizing the meteoric rise of Soviet power, have tended to obscure an even more massive (perhaps bloodier and more ruthless, to be sure) reorganization of an economically primitive society by the Communists in China. We of the free world must learn to recognize these successes in industrialization as a most fundamental challenge to our survival.

For the Soviet challenge is not confined to blunt, direct military threat and economic competition. The material achievements of communism inevitably make a strong appeal to the billions of people now straining to rise from the mud and filth of centuries of repression in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

At the same time, mankind finds at the end of the fifties immeasurably greater wealth and power at his hand—power and wealth which could transform life for half the world. The spectacular advances in nuclear energy, in communications and transportation, have overshadowed other long strides forward—in agricultural production, for example, in the automation of industry, and in gains in living standards for the working classes in America and Europe through the trade union movement. The creation of huge resources of disposable wealth in North America, and more lately in Western Europe and the Soviet Union, reflects a historic achievement; man in these areas is now capable of producing far more goods and services than he can possibly consume. Few have yet recognized, moreover, that American surplus food and fiber production is real wealth of a uniquely useful and noninflationary character.

In 1960, then, man's state is a paradox. Surrounded by real wealth in some areas, yet fearfully threatened by the weapons of his own creation, man has woefully lagged in organizing his economic and spiritual resources for the primary task of establishing a just peace in the world.

Huge masses of people throughout the world live on the edge of starvation; even in the United States there are large pockets of unemployment and genuine distress. As Aristotle commented, "Poverty is the parent of revolution and crime." And wherever poverty remains in the world—together with the new knowledge that there is no divine mandate for poverty—men may turn to violence. In American slums and in the African bush, in the coalfields of West Virginia and the dry lands of the Middle East, poverty breeds despair and often violence. The more desperate the poverty, the more violent the inevitable reaction. It may take the form of delinquency, or it may take shape in powerfully organized drives to overturn a whole society.

With the rising living standards in the Soviet Union, we have concurrently observed adjustments in the internal and external political policies of the Soviet leadership. The desperate economic straits of the Chinese people, on the other hand, are reflected in the violent and fanatical policies of the Communist Chinese leaders. There is reason to believe that the emerging differences between the two major Communist societies is in part due to the differences in economic well-being between their peoples.

In the coming decade, the one achievement which would contribute most to the freedom and security of America would be the successful launching of a worldwide cooperative attack on the common enemy of every society—poverty, with its evil companions of disease, hunger, ignorance, and fear. In this war on poverty all nations—free and Communist—can be allies. Preferably this cooperative effort should be undertaken through the United Nations and its related agencies. However, if methods could not be worked out rapidly, then we must find new means through other bilateral and multilateral efforts. Peace and security for America are not possible in a world of the hungry, the sick, and the illiterate.

Concurrently, no matter what the cost in energy and capital, we must keep our noses to the grindstone of disarmament. This means not only patient and tenacious negotiating, but also restoring our ability to negotiate effectively from a position of military strength. Paradoxically, in order to achieve disarmament in the next decade, we shall certainly have to increase our bargaining position with our Communist opponents by rebuilding our military capabilities to the point where the Communists are convinced they have nothing to gain by perpetuating the arms race. The very commencement of an intensive 3- to 5-year effort to restore our military position might alone be sufficient to convince the Communists—if the effort is obviously in dead earnest.

The drive toward an essentially disarmed world, and one in which poverty is not constantly churning the political waters is well within the Free World's capability. But it is necessary to decide to make the drive, to make the necessary plans, and to organize the necessary human and economic and spiritual resources. If the American people can be convinced that leadership in the works of peace is the only rational alternative to a world in arms and eventual destruction of all free institutions, they will contribute whatever is necessary to success.

Perhaps greater than the threat of Communist power in the decade ahead is the danger that we of the Free World will fail to see further than the immediate problem of communism, fail to see that mankind is struggling against more fundamental and formidable enemies. The challenge of the coming years is whether we more fortunate nations will choose to do in this world not simply what we are forced to do in order to survive from year to year, but what we ought to do because it is right and just. To follow the compassionate teachings of the great religious faiths of the world by their conscious and consistent application to national policy is the only way to peace, to security, to greatness.

Not fear of communism but faith in ourselves, not mere reaction to the threat from a competing society but bold initiative to seek out and defeat the older and greater enemies of all men—these must be the watchwords of free men and women.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is entitled to the courteous attention of the Senate. Those Senators who wish to converse will please retire to the cloakrooms. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Minnesota.

POLITICAL LEVERAGE FOR ECONOMIC SECURITY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the American Council on Human Rights recently sponsored an address delivered by the Ambassador of the Republic of Panama to the United Nations, the Honorable George W. Westerman. Entitled "Political Leverage for Economic Security," the Ambassador's remarks touch on the importance of internal democracy to insure the full use of national resources in economic growth. The Ambassador explains, "The American political system of representative government with its constitutional guarantees of individual rights played a major role in social and economic growth."

Mr. President, I note that the American Council on Human Rights is a federation of national college sororities whose objective is to fight minority discriminations and to seek human rights through action and education.

To bring Dr. Westerman's text on "Political Liberties and Economic Growth" to the notice of the Senate, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLITICAL LEVERAGE FOR ECONOMIC SECURITY

Address delivered by His Excellency Ambassador Geo. W. Westerman, United Nations Delegation of Panama, under auspices of the American Council on Human Rights, at the Willard Hotel, Washington, D.C., on Saturday, October 17

It is my pleasure to bring you greetings from President Ernesto de la Guardia, Jr., and the people of the Republic of Panama.

Genuine concern about the future of freedom and human rights is a healthy sign in a democracy, and it deserves appreciation. The American Council on Human Rights is to be warmly congratulated for its timely, forward-looking, vital programs of action in keeping the lamps of democracy trimmed and burning. I am indeed happy for this occasion to participate in your workshop and share your fine spirit of friendship and fellowship.

In an unforgettable movie Charlie Chaplin, as a glazier, employs Jackie Coogan to throw stones into shop windows, whereupon he providentially passes by and obtains the job of repairing the damage. The ingenious twist consists here in combining, under a single command, disequilibrating and equilibrating functions. Depending upon one's point of view, the act of window breaking may be regarded as destructive or constructive. I find in it an illustration of what I conceive as the principal roles of Federal, State, and local government, as well as the individual citizen, in helping to provide political leverage for economic security for all of the Nation.

The Government in its executive, judicial, and legislative functions is in a commanding position to initiate democratic social and economic growth through forward thrusts that are meant to create incentives, guideposts, and pressures for further democratic action; and then it must stand ready to react to, and alleviate, these pressures in a variety of areas. The Government must take progressive measures to the end that in the social order human rights and fundamental freedoms are increasingly respected and fulfilled.

The realization of fundamental freedoms for all citizens depends upon the degree of democratic maturity and economic welfare in any given country. These again are dependent on the moral education on one hand, and a high standard of living on the other, are the two indispensable conditions for the achievement of the high ideals expressed in the concept of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The United States has not always been a capitalist democracy. At the time of the Declaration of Independence, the United States was a Nation of pioneer farmers and craftsmen with elements of feudalism in the South and some other areas, and with a class of slaves at the bottom of the social and economic scale. Only some 95 years ago did slavery disappear. With vast resources the American people gradually created for themselves an economic, political and spiritual environment which has been notable in the fact that it generated the birth of constructive ideas in every direction.

North America was the frontier of Europe. Over the centuries immigrants flocked to these shores in search of freedom. An urge toward progress has been part and parcel of American thinking, American social environment from the days of the earliest settlers. The American people tended quickly to throw off the old and seek the new. This questing spirit made itself increasingly evident in the continuous advances in technology, new inventions, new processes, new materials, and new machinery.

This country's representative democratic form of government was the principal factor in promoting fast growth in the early stages of its history. Obviously, the American political system of representative government with its constitutional guarantees of individual rights played a major role in social and economic growth. These are the rights which are found at the core of her growth.

The American economy has grown notably in many dimensions—in total population, total production, total employment and, most strikingly, in the variety of its products, services and occupations. The American standard of living has risen to be unquestionably the highest in the world and it has tremendous potential for providing a progressively increasing level of living for the American people. In order to obtain full advantage of this high potential it will be necessary to overcome certain existing but surmountable forces that place a drag on the dynamicity of growth.

In short, the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms is not a problem to be solved simply by a priori legal definitions and enactments; but by conditions of life, social and individual, which in turn demand the legal recognition and enforcement of certain relationships between the individual and society. Liberty and security for the individual in society are based on reciprocity. His personal, civil and political liberty are secure against the encroachment of the state on one hand and, on the other, the state guarantees his right to the attainment of social and economic security.

It is a fatal misconception to suppose that the progressive establishment of a social order, in which human rights and fundamental freedoms can be fully realized, may be achieved merely by the pursuance of governmental policies. It should not be forgotten that the State does not and cannot and must not control all social and economic life.

Most of us interpret freedom today, not as a frozen, static achievement, but as a process of continuous fight against changing enemies and weapons. Many of us realize now that the very concept of freedom has of necessity been subjected to historical changes, both in its philosophical basis and in its practical implementation. The real question, therefore, concerns the extent to which traditional concepts of freedom are applicable to a world plagued by economic and emotional insecurity alike, and by the constant threat of depression and war.

In this country the U.S. Constitution is regarded as a basic foundation of human rights. As stated in the Preamble, the Fathers of the Constitution set out to "secure the blessings of liberty to" themselves and to their posterity. Consequently, human rights of the utmost importance are set forth in the original articles of the Constitution as well as in the famous first ten amendments known as the Bill of Rights. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of press, right of peaceable assembly and petition, due process of law, to mention only a few of those rights, are well known to us all.

The Civil War amendments, embracing articles 13 through 15, have lately been on the lips of most Americans. The 14th amendment especially has had the attention of the highest courts in the land. These amendments abolished slavery, defined citizenship and rights of Negroes, and provided for the enfranchisement of the Negro.

In this period of worldwide social and political change, it behooves every American to know the fundamentals of the Constitution, which, in times of stress as well as in peace, has provided the American people with as enduring and practical a form of government as has been seen on the face of the earth. Generations gave these human rights to you, and it is for you in turn to "secure the blessings of liberty" to yourselves and to your posterity, strengthened and enriched while in your hands.

There are some rights which are essential for the enjoyment of all other human rights and must, therefore, be thoroughly secured by law and moral force. Civil liberties are generally accepted as one objective criterion of freedom. Civil rights stand high on the list of basic human rights. The right to vote, to work where you are qualified, live where you want, the right to educate your children in the schools of your Nation without regard to color, religion or nationality—these are some of the civil rights for which you are now fighting. Many of your rights in these respects have been misused, abused and neglected. Although denied again and again by arbitrary power, the rights of man have been defended by good American citizens of both races and in the courts for many years. The fight for these rights must continue without interruption.

All too many people—black and white alike—take freedom and democracy for granted. Eternal vigilance is indeed the price of liberty. We must really believe in freedom, equality, and justice—keep a watchful eye on it and be willing to fight for it.

A great need of this Nation like in most democratic states, is more active participation in political life by informed, alert citizens of both races. My country of Panama being no exception. Here in the United States we are aware that not all American citizens have the freedom to function in political parties, become political candidates, or to vote. Legal and quasi-legal tactics, physical intimidation, and economic reprisals are the cudgels used to deprive colored Americans of their rights under the law. This is indeed a sad commentary on American democracy.

It is sadder still to recall the rights and privileges not denied to some segments of the American Negro populace which they apparently do not fully exercise. There are those Negroes who have the right to vote but fail to do so. The failure of Negroes in the Northern, Western, and border States to turn out to vote on election day is largely responsible, we have been told, for lack of representation in city councils, State legislatures and even in your Congress. This situation is most unfortunate as it deprives you of political power so much needed to attain better civil rights status.

All too frequently Negroes for one reason or another are reported to evade jury duty when called upon to serve in this vital capacity. All this at a time when important breakthroughs have been made in some States where Negroes are for the first time in history being allowed to serve on juries along with their white fellow Americans.

Equally important is the development of skills in civic participation and of attitudes of civic responsibility. These factors are of great significance to America's Negro citizens if they hope to close the gaps between the American creed and American practice. Can Negroes expect to win equal footing in civil rights by court action alone? Most assuredly not. They must work where they are needed and where they can as citizens in their communities. Adopting a "let George do it" attitude is a luxury Negroes cannot afford. Positive action is a must for every right thinking American Negro to make this country a better place for all its citizens through support of fine, public-spirited, dedicated organizations such as the NAACP, the National Urban League, the American Council on Human Rights, to name but a few.

Not long ago the name "Little Rock" exploded a racial atom bomb in these United States. The fallout of its publicity dust registered around the world. It was registered in Moscow and Peiping and taken as further evidence that American democracy does not mean what it says. It was registered throughout the 20 Latin American Republics where sentiments of common human decency were grossly outraged. It was registered through Africa and Asia and stirred the resentment of hundreds of millions who felt personally affected by the fortunes of their kin in Arkansas.

The waiting game currently being played in Prince Edward County, Va., has high stakes in a community's public schools and the education of its future citizens. It is a tragic situation. Those who feel that the issue at stake is more important than public education should beware lest one day they awake to find their children intellectually and morally crippled by their diehard defiance of the laws of this great land. The spirit of togetherness uniting the foes of democracy should be channelized into worthwhile pursuits—something more worthy than closing schools. The enemies of freedom are tampering with education—the very foundation of the democratic American way of life.

We have had many lessons that there is a direct and inescapable relation between the bread box and the ballot box. The free labor movement of this Nation should be encouraged to take a more active role in world affairs instead of leaving it up to politicians and diplomats. Labor's war against poverty, hunger, ignorance, and disease must continue and vigorously so. It must purge itself of its detractors and work harder to secure effective legislation in the interest of human welfare. In the same area, labor must abandon discrimination in its ranks. Organized labor more than any other sector of the American scene, can ill afford the specter of injustice, inequality, and discrimination. Full utilization of Negro labor is economically sound.

When any spot on the globe is within a few flying hours of your home airport and the welfare of the so-called heathen in the farthest land affects your community, there is actually harm in pretending you can live behind a Chinese wall. As citizens of this land you are also international citizens. A belief in the United Nations, international economic cooperation, and international understanding are as important to American Negroes as to any other American. Most people give too little emphasis to their duties to the world.

The importance of mutual aid for the economic welfare of the underdeveloped areas of the free world is everywhere recognized among free men. Many share the conviction that a really bold and purposeful program to underwrite economic development should be a main component of the foreign economic policy of the United States and of its Western Allies. A sound program of economic aid and technical assistance capable of giving momentum to economic advancement must be positive, farsighted, imaginative, adequate in size and scope, coordinated, and sustained.

Such a program would clearly be in the interest of the underdeveloped areas. But it would equally serve the vital interests of the United States and the Western members of the free world, because it affords a good prospect of transforming unstable and poor nations dangerously close to frustration into stable, progressive, and responsible states. The security of the West will be undermined if the aspirations of Asia, Africa, and Latin America for economic betterment, independence, and political equality are frustrated by lack of resources to build viable and productive economies.

The importance of the countries of the Western Hemisphere to the United States cannot be overemphasized whether the area concerned is political, economic or cultural. It is, therefore, encouraging to note that several agencies of international repute have, within recent days, all been unanimous in urging a more positive attitude toward Latin America. They advocate identification on a national scale with the aspirations of the Latin American peoples for social reforms, higher standards of living and increased educational opportunities. In effect, they are demanding an urgent and basic tenet of U.S. policy for this hemisphere.

Only today the National Academy of Sciences, meeting in this same city, took into account the rapid political evolution of African nations and advocated to the International Cooperation Administration adoption of a multimillion-dollar technical aid program to help Africa's social progress catch up with its political development. This observation of the NAS is being based on the fact that the new political entities are generally ill equipped to handle the technical and scientific responsibilities so fundamental to their sound future development.

Economic stability sets a goal which challenges the energies of all classes of a nation and provides outlets for the exercise of the talents of a people. The compensations to the United States for supplying aid are very real. They are the satisfaction from participating in a challenging and rewarding task, and the creation of political, economic, and social conditions in the less developed lands likely to make them stable, willing members of the free world.

You represent a substantial segment of this country's voting population. This being the case you can influence to a great extent the political leverage necessary to promote the economic security of which neighboring states of this hemisphere and new emerging countries in Africa and Asia are in dire need. Your duty then, should be very evident in giving political support to President Eisenhower's most recent call for greater technical, financial and material assistance to less fortunate peoples and countries.

The boughs of the Tree of Liberty may be swayed this way and that by recent political gales, but their strength to withstand the wind comes from the depth and toughness of their roots in the past. Our past sufferings are meant to teach us how to build a new future. The American people are faced with an unparalleled opportunity and a high responsibility. It lies within your power to lead the world into a racial utopia which in the past has been a mere dream. It may be a distant goal, but it is within the range of achievement as a practical matter.

The timetable for democracy must be stepped up. The eyes of the world are upon these United States—watching and waiting. North America must take a firm stand on human rights and fundamental freedoms in these trying times of racial tension.

Will anyone here deny that our era is overshadowed by the threat of the staggering destructive power given into human hands? In order, then, to eliminate this ominous shadow the world must unite not only against the horror of war but for the fulfillment of peaceful progress. I repeat, the strengthening of peace in the world requires the coordinated action of democracy, the respect for the principle of international morality and the fostering of economic security of the individual.

It must be a source of personal pleasure to you as it is to me that your country and mine are continuing actively in the United Nations Organization of which they were sponsoring members. As this organization approaches the 14th anniversary of its founding, the world in ferment would do well to reflect upon its growth and development. I am assured that both the United States and Panama will be single in the purpose of urging the entire world to reaffirm its faith in the U.N.'s charter. The aim of this charter, known to everyone, is in conformity with the concepts of social justice and a just application of the principles of settlement of international disputes, to establish peace, and to develop friendly relations among states, thereby ensuring the welfare of mankind.

Sir Winston Churchill in one of his notable postwar addresses cogently observed:

"Laws just or unjust may govern men's actions. Tyrannies may restrain or regulate their words. The machinery or propaganda may pack their minds with falsehoods and deny them truth for many generations of time. But the soul of man thus held in trance or frozen in a long night can be awakened by a spark coming from God knows where and in a moment the whole structure of lies and oppression is on trial for its life. Peoples in bondage need never despair."

Those words are of deep and lasting import. They are also the lesson of history, the promise of today and a beacon of hope for the future. The message is clear and unmistakable. Peoples in bondage do not need ever despair. Negroes need never despair. The knowledge of their right to freedom and justice, the elevation of American ideals and aspirations, the observance of the spirit of the U.N. Charter, and the turmoil which today is taking place in the thinking of all humanity guarantee the eventual triumph of justice and the disappearance of bigotry, tyranny and oppression.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S WHEAT PROGRAM

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, this morning the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] referred to a certain agricultural study which gave us pertinent economic information relating to the plight of the American farmer. Congress has been served notice that the administration will continue to recommend wheat legislation which can result only in an increased supply of wheat and an increased cost to the taxpayer, and still lower prices and income for wheat farmers.

The administration remains adamant in its adherence to theories which have been discredited by reputable agricultural economists. More is at stake than a perpetually depressed agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota will suspend. If the Senate desires a recess, the Chair will see that one is provided. But the Senate will not proceed until there is order.

The Senator from Minnesota may now proceed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I said that more is at stake than a perpetually depressed agriculture. High-production low-price agriculture means diminished purchasing power for farmers. This in turn spells trouble for all who sell goods and services to farmers.

The report described earlier today by the Senator from Louisiana indicates that the projection of agricultural income by the Department of Agriculture is a further depressed income, with reduced net profits for farm producers, reduced farm prices, and a reduction in total farm income. It appears to me that this kind of prognostication on the part of the administration should alert Congress to what needs to be done to stop what will be a real depression in America's farm areas unless some steps are taken of a corrective nature.

Regrettably, the administration has no farm program. The administration's program is to do more of what it has already done; and to do more of what it has been doing will result in reduced farm income, a reduction in the number of farms and farmers, and a rise in farm indebtedness.

Mr. President, a very thoughtful discussion of what the administration's proposal would do for the average farmer appears in an editorial published in the January, 1960, issue of Capper's Farmer, an old and respected farm publication. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial, which is an analysis of the administration's wheat program, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Capper's Farmer, February 1960]

LET'S NOT ABANDON CONTROLS

Secretary of Agriculture Benson has a warmed-over farm program to present to Congress when it convenes in January. The program has the blessing of President Eisenhower.

The Secretary's proposals should be recognized for what they are—a move to kill the wheat program, as he already has done for corn.

Besides the usual promises of increased research and stronger foreign sales effort, the proposals include more conservation reserve and a stepped-up rural development program.

The dynamite in the program is the proposal to remove controls on wheat and fix supports to a 3-year moving average market price. That means abandonment of marketing quotas and the parity principle.

Capper's Farmer believes this move is inconsiderate, ill-timed, and unwise. It is neither to the best interests of farmers nor the American economy.

The Secretary makes his proposal at the time his own USDA economists estimate a $2 billion drop in net farm income for 1959. They predict a further $1 billion drop for 1960. Should the proposed wheat plan be adopted, economists foresee a further cut of $500 million to $1 billion by 1961.

Such a prospect is cause for grave public concern. Not only would the living standards of farm families suffer a disastrous blow, but the depleted purchasing power of rural America would be a serious threat to the Nation's economy.

What Mr. Benson is proposing would put wheat in direct competition with corn and the other feed grains in a few brief years. Hog raisers, already in trouble, would be hurt badly if millions of bushels of wheat were dumped into the national feedbin. Pressure of cheap feed makes more hogs and cheaper hogs.

In short, Mr. Benson wants to put wheat, along with corn, in a free market situation. Economists at Iowa State University recently have completed a study in which they estimate what farm prices might be under a free market with unrestricted production.

Assuming that all feed grains would be used, these men see average price of hogs down to $10.80 by 1962–63. Cattle would average $11.51. Corn would be 66 cents a bushel and wheat 74 cents.

As costly and cumbersome as the present program is, it is probable that the Benson-Eisenhower plan would be even more cumbersome—and costly. For example, C. R. Harris, University of California economist, estimates it would cost U.S. taxpayers some $400 million a year more than the present program costs.

Capper's Farmer does not believe the alternative to our present program is abandonment of production controls and price supports.

We believe there is a growing realization at the grassroots that some sort of a compulsory production control plan is necessary for a stabilized farm income. (See Today's Farming, Washington, p. 16.)

We urge that Congress summarily dismiss this attempt to abandon production controls and supports on wheat. We also urge the congressional agriculture committees to get to the job of writing a workable program that farmers and city people can live with.

A workable farm program must be in parts to fit the various commodities. We doubt that we can find one overall pattern. First, let us work on wheat. It is our biggest worry.

Last May, Capper's Farmer described the domestic parity plan for wheat and suggested that Congress give wheatgrowers a chance to vote on it. We think it is fair to both growers and consumers, and it would be self-financing.

Some acreage in a soil bank would be compulsory, and growers would take part payment in wheat until CCC holdings were reduced to a reasonable reserve.

We favor giving feed grain producers an opportunity to vote on a soil bank plan—one that would take enough land out of crops to reduce surpluses.

In any allotment or self-help legislation, the commodity group should be given a clean-cut, realistic choice to say whether it wants full rein to produce for a free market, or a program whereby it will accept production controls.

Some groups are asking for self-help programs. Let's be daring enough to give them a trial. Some of the supplemental programs are worthy of expansion. Surely we can find some way of getting more food into the stomachs of the hungry and undernourished here at home and overseas.

We have a "Food for Peace" program in Public Law 480. But let's get it out of the hand-to-mouth stage and make it fully effective in aiding developing nations.

As a consuming nation, we have everything to gain by the administration of a farm program that will help farmers obtain their fair share of the national income.

Our economy cannot exist half controlled and half free. Agriculture, too, must thrive if we Americans are to be assured of a continuing abundant food supply.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, many persons have said there appears to be no particular solution of the farm question. I submit that there is a solution. One is before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, a proposal which was discussed this morning, a proposal which I offered last year, known as the family farm development program.

A second possible solution is the use of our food and fiber abundance. I shall be looking forward to the recommendations of the administration relating to the use of our wheat.

I noticed that the President gave a remarkable address at New Delhi, India, and spoke about declaring war on hunger. I fully support that declaration. I await the details of the battle. I simply wonder what forces are to be deployed, what tools and weapons are to be used, and when the trumpet will be sounded, so that we can tell when the battle is under way and what troops will be placed in the field.

It appears to me that it is one thing to make a speech about war on hunger, and it is a second thing to present to Congress a program which will utilize the food and fiber we have as a constructive instrument of American farm policy.

I suggest to the President that he can find some good guide lines for a constructive policy by an examination of the reports of the food and agricultural organization of the United Nations, and an examination of a bill before Congress entitled "Food for Peace," and ultimately, possibly, long-term credits for the nations which need food to take care of their food deficits. I for one will pledge wholehearted cooperation to the working out of such a program, which is necessary if we are to solve our problems in agriculture.

Reducing the number of farmers, cutting down more and more on production, and reducing the number of farms will ultimately place America on the list of food deficit areas. If the present program is continued, that is exactly what will happen.

WILDERNESS BILL DESERVES SUPPORT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I was very much heartened to read an article in the Albert Lea Tribune for January 3, 1960, entitled "Wilderness Bill Deserves Support of All of Us," by Maude M. Koevenig. Maude Koevenig is very much aware that the wilderness bill (S. 1123), which I was proud to introduce, with my distinguished cosponsors, has been the subject of hearings by the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and is pending measure of that committee. I thank the chairman of that committee [Mr. MURRAY], our very eminent colleague, for his interest in this proposed legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILDERNESS BILL DESERVES SUPPORT OF ALL OF US

(By Maude M. Koevenig)

One of the most treasured gifts that Joe and I received for Christmas is a copy of the beautiful book, "America's Wonderlands, the National Parks," published by the National Geographic Society.

In view of the present delay in getting the wilderness bill passed by Congress, one can gain hope by remembering that the National Park Act was 5 years in Congress before being finally passed on August 25, 1916.

At the present time we take this priceless heritage of beauty and history pretty much for granted. However, the same type of opposition that is delaying passage of the wilderness bill, also keeps trying to invade, exploit, and thus destroy our national parks.

As support for the wilderness bill widens, traditional opposition of lumber, grazing, mining, and other commercial users of our public land stiffens.

A REASON

Please keep on reading, because at the end of today's column I'm going to ask a favor and give you a chance to do something important.

Such a magazine as Science, published by the American Association for the Advancement of Science, expresses hope that the wilderness bill will be passed at the next session of Congress.

The Minneapolis Tribune has urged passage of the bill, stating "few things facing the 86th Congress have as much permanent value as the wilderness bill."

Montana Wildlife, published by the Montana Fish and Game Department, expressed its agreement with "principles expressed in the proposed wilderness legislation." An editorial in the June 1959 issue said:

"We look, therefore, to a planned wilderness preservation system as insurance that we may continue to provide outstanding recreational opportunities, so important to Montana and the entire Nation.

